To the Right Honourable

THOMAS Lord LOVELL,

Baron LOVELL of Minsted-Lovell,

Knight of the most Honourable Order of the Bath.

My LORD,

WE might be justly deemed unpardonable, if, amongst the several illustrious Persons who have honoured this Work with their Patronage, we should neglect applying to Your Lordship for YOURS. That universal Knowledge of Men and Books, joined to a distinguishing Judgment and polite Manners, which is Your confessed Character, gives us a Kind of Claim to IT. History, beyond all other Sciences, deserves the Protection of the Great and Good, as its Utility is not of a confined Nature, but diffuses a general Benefit to all Mankind. This Consideration, my LORD, greatly justifies the Presumption of this Address, since Benevolence, and every amiable Virtue, eminently adorn and add a Lustre to Your Rank.

IT must be acknowledged, the following Sheets cannot appear abroad under a greater Recommendation, since Your LORDSHIP has given the Public SUCH early Proofs of a refined Taste for Ancient History; particularly in Your Travels through Italy, where, at a large Expence, You enriched the Republic of Letters with a curious Account of the ETRURIA REGALIS; THAT this noble Example must animate the Youth of Genius and Quality to cultivate so useful a Branch of Learning, and at the same Time reflect no small Honour upon the Professors of it.

BUT

D E D I C A T I O N.

BUT what more immediately obliges us to shelter ourselves under the Sanction of the Illustrious and the Great, and may, we hope, intitle us to the Favour of such unquestionable Judges, is the Resolution we have made of concealing our Names until the Whole is compleated. Under this Obscurity, My LORD, we have received several considerable Hints, (which we might otherwise have been deprived of) that have much contributed to the Improvement of our original Plan, and consequently render the Undertaking more serviceable to the World. From hence arises the Necessity of our submitting each Yearly Production to some Personage of avowed Candour and Judgment, and is the Motive that prevails upon us to solicit Your LORDSHIP's favourable Acceptance of this present Volume. The Reputation that this Work has hitherto obtained in most Parts of Europe, we humbly trust, will incline Your LORDSHIP to indulge us in this Request, and to pardon the Liberty we take in assuming the Honour of subscribing ourselves,

My LORD,

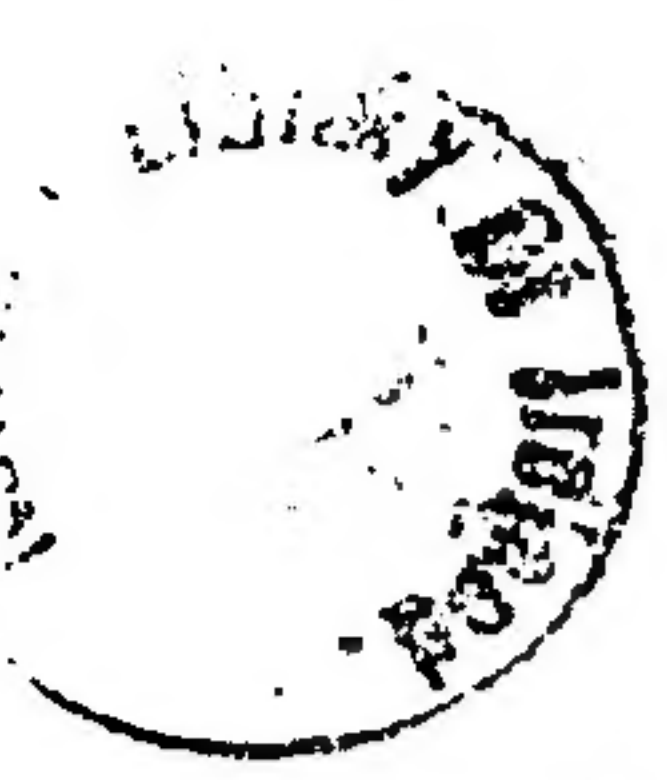

Your Lordship's

Most Obedient, and

Most Devoted,

Humble Servants,

Earliest Account of Time to the Present.

C H A P. IX.

The history of Rome, from the end of the sedition of the Gracchi to the perpetual dictatorship of Sylla.

^a THE civil commotions of the republic being allayed, by the death of the Gracchi and the abolition of their laws, as we have related in the foregoing volume, L. Cæcilius Metellus, the nephew of the great Metellus, surnamed Macedonicus, and L. Aurelius Cotta were, without any disturbance or opposition, raised to the consulate. The latter was sent into Transalpine Gaul, with a consular army to keep the Allobroges and Arverni in awe, and the former into Illyricum to reduce the Segestani (A), who had shaken off the Roman yoke. The consul defeated them in the field, and made himself master of their city and territory ; but, as this expedition was not of importance enough to procure him a triumph, he made war unjustly on the Dalmatians, who, not being in a condition to withstand a consular army, voluntarily submitted to him ; so that he spent the winter in tranquillity at Salona (B), the capital of the country. Nevertheless, he assumed the surname of Dalmaticus, and was honoured with a triumph for his pretended conquest ^b.

In the mean time, a young orator had courage enough to impeach the late consul Papirius Carbo, at the tribunal of the prætor Q. Fabius Eburnus, who had been commissioned by the senate to try state-criminals. The orator's name was L. Licinius Crassus. No Roman had ever been endowed by nature with greater talents for eloquence, which he had carefully improved, though but twenty years of age, by a strict application to study. As he was of the Licinian family, and nearly related to Licina, the wife of C. Gracchus, he resolved to do all that lay in his power to destroy Papirius Carbo, a sworn enemy to the Gracchian party. Papirius had formerly been zealous for the people and the Gracchi, even to madness, and had been suspected of having assassinated the second Africanus. But, having since changed his party; and with it his sentiments, he had devoted himself intirely to the interest of the nobility, who had about ten miles from the gulph. of that name, on the coast of the Adriatic sea, at a small distance from the place where the present city of Spalatro stands. It was once famous for the retreat of the emperor Dioclesian, but is now buried in its ruins.

(B) The ancient city of Salona in Dalmatia stood had promoted him to the consulate, and looked upon him as one of the chief supporters of their cause ; so that he had great interest, and, besides, was himself an orator of no mean character, as appeared in the cause of Opimius, which he defended with uncommon success, having by force of persuasion induced the people to give judgment against their own interest. Nevertheless the love of revenge prompted young Crassus to attempt the destroying of this powerful enemy to the Gracchian faction. He reduced the whole impeachment to these three articles ; 1st, That he had stirred up the elder Gracchus to demand the tribuneship a second year ; 2dly, That he had made a law for this purpose, when he was tribune ; and, 3dly, That he had been, at least, an accomplice in the assassination of the Second Africanus. These were heavy accusations ; and Crassus might have easily proved them, had not his probity got the ascendant over all his passions. For one of Papirius's slaves, being angry with his master, stole the box in which he kept all his papers, and brought it to the accuser. But the generous Roman had such an abhorrence of the treachery, that he sent back the slave in chains, and the box unopened, saying, that he had rather let an enemy and a criminal escape unpunished, than destroy him by base and dishonourable means. On the day appointed, the cause was pleaded before the prætor and a very numerous assembly, all Rome flocking to hear the first essay of a young orator, who had never yet displayed his talents but in the schools. When he ascended the rostra, he was so intimidated at the sight of so crouded an audience, that, his heart failing him, he looked pale, and was ready to faint. The prætor, observing the confusion he was in, adjourned the court to the next day. Then the croud was still greater ; but the young orator took courage, and spoke with such energy and life, that the accused, sinking into despair, did justice on himself. Some say, that he went into banishment ; but Valerius Maximus assures us, that he poisoned himself with cantharides to avoid a more shameful death^b. From this time Crassus gained the reputation of the greatest orator Rome had ever bred. His oration was put into the hands of all young orators, and long after looked upon by Cicero himself as an inimitable performance^c.

Marius tribune of the people.

His intrepidity.

DURING the present consulate, the famous Caius Marius first appeared in a public office. He was of so mean extraction, that even the village where he was born is not certainly known. All that is certain of his origin is, that he was a native of the country of the Arpinates in the territory of the Volsci ; that his father's name was Marius, and his mother's Fucinia. He was a man of an extraordinary size, of great strength of body, of an uncommon understanding, courageous, and enterprising ; but at the same time of a fierce aspect, and, as he had spent great part of his youth in the country, where he had been brought up in rustic employments, in his manners a perfect savage. As soon as he attained to the military age, he entered into the army, and gave the first proofs of his courage and intrepidity at the siege of Numantia. Scipio, with whom he made his first campaign, discovering under a rough outside a great fund of understanding and bravery, told his officers, that young Marius, however clownish, would one day be an honour to the republic, and prove one of her greatest generals. He distinguished himself on all occasions by actions of uncommon valour, but more by an exact observance of military discipline. He went through all the degrees in the army, and every step he rose was in reward of some action, with which he had signalized himself. He now began to solicit civil magistracies, and stood for the tribuneship of the people, which he obtained, and discharged with the same intrepidity he had shewn in the field. He proposed a new law relating to the manner of collecting the suffrages in the election of the curule magistrates : this the consul Cotta opposed, and even cited the tribune to appear before the senate, and answer for his conduct. Marius obeyed the summons ; but, instead of being daunted, threatened to exert his authority, and send the consul to prison, if he persisted in his opposition. Metellus, then prince of the senate, though the patron and friend of Marius, declared for Cotta. Whereupon the bold tribune, without shewing the least regard for that venerable senator, to whom he was indebted for his fortune, and by whose interest he had even obtained the tribuneship, ordered one of his officers to seize him and carry him to prison. His orders had been put in execution, if the consul had not waved his opposition, and the senate given their consent to the law. The boldness of the new tribune surprised the conscript fathers, but gained him great reputation among a among the people, who from this time began to look upon him as their chief protector, against the incroachments of the nobility ^d.

THE tribuneship of Marius expired almost at the same time that Rome chose new consuls. These were M. Porcius Cato, grandson to the great Cato, but by his first wife, and Q. Marcius, surnamed Rex. The former died soon in Numidia, whither he had been sent to watch the steps of Jugurtha, who had usurped that kingdom; so that Marcius remained the sole head of the republic for almost the whole year. The province which fell to his lot was Transalpine Gaul, where he opened a way for the Roman armies from the Alps to the Pyrenees; a work of an immense labour and great danger. For the Stœni, a fierce nation and fond of liberty, whom Stephanus places ^{The courage of the Stœni.} at the foot of the Maritime Alps, took arms, and opposed Marcius's design with great courage. But when they found themselves surrounded by the Romans, they set fire to their houses, killed their wives and children, and then threw themselves into the flames; so that not one of them survived the loss of their liberty. After this, Marcius, to secure his conquest, planted a colony in the country of the Volcæ Tectosages, who anciently possessed all that tract which lies between the Pyrenees to the south, and the present city of Toulouse to the north. The city which Marcius founded was called by his name Narbo-Marcus. Such was the origin of the famous city of Narbonne, which in process of time became the capital of a great country, and a convenient place of refreshment for the Roman armies, when they passed from the Pyrenees to the Alps, or from the Alps to the Pyrenees. The senate thought the reduction of this part of Gaul, the opening of a way from the Alps to the Pyrenees, and the founding of the city of Narbonne, so considerable works, that they honoured Marcius, upon his return to Rome, with a triumph ^e.

THE consulate of L. Cæcilius Metellus and Q. Mucius Scævola proved so peaceable, that the Romans had little else to do, but attend their superstitions, Rome being filled with reports of prodigies. The succeeding consuls, C. Licinius Geta and Q. Fabius Eburnus, had as little opportunity of acquiring glory as their predecessors. In their consulate C. Marius stood for the prætorship, and with great difficulty obtained it by the most bare-faced bribery and corruption. For this he was accused before the ^{Marius created prætor.} people, but, they being divided in their opinions, he was acquitted. As he had a great deal of good sense, and a penetrating understanding, he presided in the court of judicature, which was assigned him as prætor, without reproach. The next year it fell to his lot to govern Further Spain, which he did with great equity and moderation. He cleared his government of the banditti, who had long infested it, and cured those people of their ancient custom of living by rapine ^f. The next year, Æmilius Scaurus and L. Cæcilius Metellus were created consuls. The latter was the son of the famous Metellus Macedonicus, and the former an intrepid soldier, a brave officer, and eloquent orator. Scaurus proposed several laws, and got them passed in the comitia, in spite of the tribunes, who had for some time ingrossed to themselves the prerogative of proposing laws. By one of these he restrained the excessive luxury of the Romans, forbidding them to eat dormice, foreign shell-fish, and such birds as were brought from distant countries. By another he left the freedmen, who had been long confined to the Esquiline tribe, at liberty to enrol themselves in any of the four city-tribes, which they liked best. His zeal for maintaining some order in Rome, in spite of the general depravity of manner, was seconded by the censors, L. Metellus Dalmaticus and Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, who struck thirty-two unworthy senators out of the roll, and among them Licinius Geta the late consul; proscribed games of hazard and concerts of music; and, after having nominated the consul Scaurus prince of the senate, finished their office with a census, in which were counted 394336 citizens able to bear arms. From Rome, Scaurus set out for Gaul, where he subdued ^{The Gentisci and Carni subdued.} the Gentisci and Carni, and spent the rest of the summer in making a good road from Rome to the Alps, for the more convenient marching of the armies, which had been hitherto obliged to march through a miry and almost impassable country. For this important piece of service the senate and people granted him a triumph, which his easy victory over the Gentisci and Carni had not deserved ^g.

THE next year, M. Acilius Balbus and C. Porcius Cato, the grandson of Cato the censor, were raised to the consulate. The latter was sent into Macedon to oppose the Scordisci, a people of Thrace, who had invaded that province. The barbarians were at

at first terrified at the sight of a consular army, but, afterwards taking courage, faced the consul, and, having drawn him into a country full of rocks, forests, and narrow passes, cut off all his army to a man, Porcius alone having saved himself by flight. The republic had not for a long time suffered such a defeat. The historians' speak of it with astonishment, and tell us, that it would have alarmed the city as much as the battle of Cannæ did formerly, if such a misfortune had happened in the heart of Italy. The Scordisci, after so complete a victory, laid waste Macedon, spread themselves all over Thessaly, and advanced to the coasts of the Adriatic, into which, because it put a stop to their incursions, they discharged, in revenge, a shower of darts. But T. Didius, the Roman prætor in Illyricum, soon repaired the loss which the republic had sustained, and drove the enemy back, with great slaughter, to their own country. For this the republic honoured him with a triumph. As for Porcius Cato, though the senate and people did not condemn him for his misfortune, they accused him unjustly of oppression, and under that pretence banished him to Tarracon in Spain, where he spent the remainder of his days. A punishment not so just, as in point of prudence necessary, in order to deter Roman generals for the future from exposing their troops too rashly to the mercy of barbarians^b.

THIS same year an infamous commerce was discover'd between several of the vestals and their gallants. The intrigue was begun by L. Betucius Barrus, a Roman knight, but a professed debauchee, who gloried in corrupting women of the greatest families and best characters. He carried on an amour with a vestal named Æmilia, who drew in two others, Licinia and Marcia, to the like crimes. Upon the accusation of a slave, Betucius and Æmilia were condemned to the usual punishment, but Licinia and Marcia, though no less guilty, acquitted, the pontifices being afraid, lest the condemning of so many criminals at once might bring the whole sacerdotal order into disrepute. This raised great murmurs among the people; and Seduceius, one of the tribunes, revived the affair, shewed the iniquity of the judgment of the pontifices, and brought the cause before the people, who nominated L. Crassus, one of the prætors, to rehear it. Crassus was a man of known integrity, but so severe, that his court was called the wreck of criminals. He, without any regard to the birth of the accused, or the sentence passed in their favour, or the rights of the pontifical college, or the eloquence of the famous L. Crassus, who pleaded for his relation Licinia, condemned the two vestals to be buried alive, and their gallants to be whipped to death. Nor did this satisfy the people: a temple was built at the public expence to Venus, under the appellation of Verticordia, because that goddess was in this temple to be implored to turn the hearts of the Roman women to virtue. So that Venus was now invoked for chastity. The honour of consecrating this temple was conferred upon Sulpicia, the daughter of Servius Sulpicius Paternulus, who, though very young and lately married to Q. Fulvius Flaccus, had given such proofs of an extraordinary modesty, that she was deemed the most chaste woman in *Rome*ⁱ.

IN the mean time, Rome was alarmed with accounts of an inundation of barbarians. The most northern part of Germany was inhabited by a nation said to have been originally descended from the Asiatic Cimmerians, and to have taken the name of Cimbri, when they changed their old habitations. These people were now settled near the ocean, in the peninsula which we call Jutland, and the ancients Cimbrica Chersonesus. But, being tired of cultivating a cold country, shut up between two seas, they left their peninsula with their wives and children, and, joining the Teutones a neighbouring nation, took their journey southward, fell upon the country which the Boii had long possessed, not far from the Hercynian forest. The Boii soon drove them out of their country, and obliged them to carry war and devastation into other parts. They then fell on the Scordisci, whom Didius had just driven back to the banks of the Danube; and from thence, advancing still nearer to the Roman provinces, they penetrated into Vindelicia(C), and there ravaged the country of the Taurisci. The approach of these barbarians made Rome tremble; the new consuls therefore, Caius Cæcilius Metellus, the fourth son of Metellus Macedonicus, and Cn. Papirius Carbo, the son of the the seditious Caius Carbo, were no sooner chosen, than the senate ordered the latter to wait for the Cimbri at the furthest parts of the eastern Alps, and stop the passages against them. As for Metellus, he was ordered into Macedon to finish the war with the Scordisci, whom he drove from post to post, and so weakened by repeated battles, that he put them out of a condition of making for some time any new attempts upon the Roman provinces. Upon his return he was honoured with a triumph, in which there was this most agreeable circumstance, that his brother, who had been consul a year before him, and was now returned from suppressing a rebellion in Sardinia and Corfica after two years labour, was ordered to triumph with him. The consul Papirius was not so successful against the Cimbri, who offered him a peace, which he pretended to accept; but afterwards, by corrupting their guides, treacherously drew them into a snare, as he imagined, and attacked their camp. Papirius promised himself certain victory. But what difficulties cannot a warlike people surmount, when actuated by despair and indignation? They ran to arms, and not only repulsed the legions, but, becoming the aggressors, fell upon them with such fury, that they put them in disorder, and obliged them to betake themselves to a shameful flight. The Romans fled in great confusion to the neighbouring forests, and there lay concealed for three days, without daring to appear in the open country. Upon the news of this defeat, the consternation at Rome was universal. No-body doubted, but the barbarians would immediately pass the Alps, over-run the provinces nearest to the capital, and attempt the destruction of Rome itself. But the Cimbri, upon what motive is utterly unknown, by a kind of miracle turned their arms elsewhere, and marching towards the country of the Helvetii (D), entered that way Transalpine Gaul, which they filled with desolation and slaughter. This miraculous deliverance quickened the zeal of the Romans in punishing all accomplices in the late guilt of the vestals. Among others, the famous orator M. Antonius, the grandfather of Mark Antony the triumvir, was suspected of having kept an unlawful commerce with the condemned vestals. He was then in the flower of his age, had been very lately nominated to the quæstorship of Asia, and was already got to Brundisium, in order to imbarque for Pergamus. But, when advice was brought him that his reputation was attacked, he immediately returned to Rome, appeared before the severe prætor Cassius, and desired, that his cause might be heard without delay. The judge endeavoured to intimidate him by threatening to put his young slave to the torture, who was said to have been privy to his amours; but the slave offered himself to the rack, with an assurance which induced the judge to spare him. Valerius Maximus tells us, that the faithful slave endured the most cruel tortures, with an intrepidity, which surprised the judge^k. However that be, the quæstor of Asia was acquitted, and set out for his province with more honour, than if he had not been accused^l. And now Rome was in such tranquillity, that she had only one war to finish, viz. that with the Scordisci, who were already weakened, but still very haughty, and ready to take arms again, as soon as the Roman armies should leave Macedon. The elections therefore were no sooner over, than M. Livius Drusus, who was raised to the consulate with L. Calpurnius Piso, was sent against them, while his colleague covered Italy against the invasion of the Cimbri, whose return was still dreaded. Drusus prevailed upon the Scordisci, partly by force and partly by capitulation, to quit the country they possessed, and repass the Danube, which river from this time became a barrier between them and the Roman provinces. The Scordisci settle on the other side of the Danube. The consul upon his return was honoured with a triumph. And now the tranquillity was so general, in all the countries subject to the republic, that she would have shut the temple of Janus, if she had not been under some apprehensions from Jugurtha, whose wars make a considerable part of this history, and therefore must be traced a little farther back.

The first contained the cantons of Zurich, Appenzell, Schaffhausen, and Rhintall; the second the cantons of Zug, Glaris, Schwitz, and Uri; the third a small par of the canton of Friburg, and the whole cantons of Lucern, Bern, Solothurn, and Underwald; and lastly, the fourth contained the greatest part of the canton of Friburg, the principality of Neuchâtel, and part of the Pais Romain. The country of the Rauraci, now the canton of Basle, was afterwards added to the Helvetic body.

Masiniſſa, king of Numidia, who had been ſo remarkably devoted to the Romans,^a left three ſons, Micipſa, Manafabal, and Guluffa, joint-heirs of his kingdom, which they long governed in perfect amity. At length Micipſa, ſurviving his two brothers, poſſeſſed the throne alone. This good king had two legitimate ſons, Adherbal and Hiempſal. His brother Manafabal had likewise two ſons, Jugurtha and Gauda, by two different miſtreſſes; and Guluffa had a ſon, named Maſſiva, by a concubine. But, as natural children had no right to the crown, according to the laws of Numidia, Jugurtha, Gauda, and Maſſiva, were by their illegitimacy excluded from ſucceeding to the kingdom, ſo long as Adherbal and Hiempſal, the lawful heirs, were alive. Jugurtha was born before the death of his grandfather Masiniſſa; but that wiſe king never acknowledged him as a prince of the blood-royal. However, Micipſa had^b ſo much regard for his brother Manafabal, that he cauſed Jugurtha to be brought up in the royal palace with the young princes his children. But afterwards, growing jealous of him, he ſent him to the ſiege of Numantia, in hopes of getting rid of him. Jugurtha diſtinguiſhed himſelf at that memorable ſiege in a very eminent manner, and, upon the taking of the place, returned home loaded with glory, and brought with him recommendatory letters from Scipio, under whom he had ſerved. And now age and experience having put a ſtop to his youthful ſallies, he was ſo far from giving umbrage to the king, that by his prudent conduct he gained his favour, and cultivated his friendſhip with ſuch addreſs, that the eaſy prince adopted him two years before his death, and thereby made him capable of ſucceeding, as joint-heir to his^c kingdom, with his own children. No ſooner was the old king dead, than diſputes aroſe among the three heirs of the kingdom. After ſome days had been decently ſpent in mourning, they met to deliberate about the affairs of the new government, when Jugurtha, who was the eldeſt, ſeated himſelf in the middle of the throne, which was prepared for the new kings. Hereupon Hiempſal, who was the youngeſt, thinking himſelf injured by the ſuperiority which Jugurtha aſſumed, ſeated himſelf by Adherbal's ſide, in order to give him the middle place, which was deemed by the Numidians, as by moſt other nations, the moſt honourable; and it was not without much difficulty, that his brother prevailed on him to pay ſome regard to ſuperior age, and remove to Jugurtha's left hand. As ſoon as the diſputes about the ceremonial were^d ended, Jugurtha propoſed the diſannulling of all the edicts the late king had publiſhed within the laſt five years, under pretence, that Micipſa's underſtanding being then impaired by age, he had iſſued many ordinances prejudicial to the welfare of the kingdom. Hiempſal replied with a diſdainful air, I am willing to come into the propoſal; and we will begin with diſannulling the act, whereby you was aſſociated with us in the inheritance of the crown; ſince this was done within the time which you have fixed for my father's dotage. Theſe reproachful words ſunk ſo deep into Jugurtha's mind, that thenceforth he made it his whole buſineſs to find an opportunity of ridding himſelf privately of a young prince, who might thwart his ambitious ſchemes. For we are told, that he had formed a deſign long before, when he^e ſerved in Spain, of extorting the crown by force from his two couſins. At the ſiege of Numantia, he had contracted friendſhips with ſeveral young Roman officers, who had roused his ambition, by ſtirring him up boldly to ſeize the kingdom, as ſoon as the old king's eyes ſhould be cloſed. They told him, that he would find friends and protectors enough at Rome, where any point might be carried with money and intereſt. Jugurtha therefore to gratify his ambition, and at the ſame time revenge the late affront, ſuborned the chief officer of Hiempſal's guard to murder him? which he did to the great grief of the Numidians, who had founded their hopes on his courage and uncommon underſtanding. The head of the young prince, thus treacherouſly aſſaſſinated in the flower of his age, was carried to Jugurtha, who beheld it with pleaſure.^f Though ſuch a notorious piece of cruelty and perfidiouſneſs ought naturally to have driven all the Numidians into a revolt; yet they were divided among themſelves. Thoſe, who hoped to reap advantage from the public confuſions, ſided with Jugurtha, while the wiſe and the virtuous, who had the good of their country at heart, declared for the pacific Adherbal. But, as the latter were by far the weakeſt, the young prince, though not very ſagacious, had penetration enough to ſee, that his only refuge was in the protection of the Romans, to whom his rival could not but be ſuſpected. He therefore acquainted the conſcript fathers with the baſe aſſaſſination of his brother, and at the ſame time, foreſeeing that the deliberations of the ſenate^g would take up much time, he began to levy troops, and put himſelf upon his defence

- a defence against any attempt of Jugurtha. But this warlike prince soon got the ascendant over his surviving rival, and, by taking some cities by assault and forcing others to capitulate, made himself master of almost the whole kingdom. Hereupon Adherbal ^{flee} to Rome. Adherbal, having no asylum but Rome, conveyed himself thither, in order to lay his complaints before the senate. Jugurtha was no sooner informed of his design, than he sent ambassadors to that capital, well furnished with money to gain over the republic to his interest. He was well apprised, that all things were venal at Rome; and therefore ordered his ambassadors to spare no expence in gaining him new friends, and in cultivating the friendships he had formerly contracted, when in Spain. Upon their arrival they found the senate strongly prepossessed against their master, but met with few senators, who were proof against their presents. When the day came, on which Adherbal and the ambassadors were admitted before the senate, it was easy to perceive, by the debates of the conscript fathers, what effect had been wrought by Jugurtha's money. The just complaints of Adherbal were despised, Jugurtha's ^{The corruption of the Roman} courage extolled, and his crimes palliated. M. Æmilius Scaurus, then prince of the senate, declared for Adherbal, and with him a few others; but a great majority were against him. The senate therefore, without taking any notice of the assassination of Hiempsal, or the usurpation of Jugurtha, only appointed ten commissioners to go into Africa, and divide the kingdom between the two rivals. Lucius Opimius, so famous for his zeal against the faction of Caius Gracchus, was at the head of this commission; and, as he had declared for Adherbal at Rome, Jugurtha had reason to fear his arrival and determinations. But this formidable judge, who had avenged the cause of the republic against the Gracchi and their powerful party, was no sooner arrived in Africa with his colleagues, than Jugurtha gained them all over with the immense sums he sent them. They found him innocent, made Hiempsal the aggressor, and declared, that his death had been occasioned by his own rashness. After they had pronounced this iniquitous sentence, they came to the division of Micipsa's dominions, which was made upon the plan proposed by Jugurtha himself. To him were allotted the strongest places and the richest provinces, without any regard to the complaints of Adherbal, who, though thus injured, submitted to the judgment of the commissioners, and thought of nothing but reigning in peace over the subjects which Rome had assigned him^m.

- But the ambitious Jugurtha, finding that there was nothing to fear from the part of Rome, resolved to make himself master of all Numidia. With this view he entered the frontiers of his brother's kingdom at the head of his troops, laid waste the country with fire and sword, pillaged the villages, and committed every-where most dreadful devastations. He hoped by these insults to provoke the resentment of Adherbal, and induce him to use reprisals, whence he might have a pretence to drive him from his kingdom, and to justify his conduct at Rome. But the timorous prince contented himself with sending an embassy to Jugurtha to complain of the injustice of his proceedings. Nor could even the ill treatment which his ambassadors received at Jugurtha's court, provoke him to take arms. Hereupon Jugurtha, without troubling himself any longer about pretences, entered his dominions at the head of a numerous army, and incamped near Cirtba. Then Adherbal, seeing himself reduced to the necessity of taking the field, or flying his country a second time, thought it more adviseable to run any hazards, than trouble Rome again with his complaints. Having therefore assembled his forces and made new levies, he brought an army into the field, but more considerable for its number than courage. As he came in sight of the enemy, when the day was far spent and it was too late to engage, he incamped in haste in order to rest his troops, fatigued with long marches. But Jugurtha, without waiting for the return of day, attacked his brother's trenches in the dead of the night, forced them, and put all to the sword who withstood him. Adherbal's army was dispersed in an instant, and the king himself forced to take refuge in Cirtba his capital. Jugurtha fought every-where for his rival, whom it was his chief business to destroy; but the prince had the good luck in his misfortunes to escape the fury of his enemy. Some Italian cohorts he had in his army covered his retreat, and hindered the conquerors from entering the city with the conquered. Had it not been for this seasonable relief, the war had been begun and ended the same day. However, the siege of Cirtba was not delayed a moment. Jugurtha, who well remembered the lessons ^{Adherbal de- feated.} he

he had learnt of Scipio before Numantia, pushed it on with great vigor ; but the a valour of the Italian troops protracted it longer than he expected. In the mean time, news was brought to Rome of these unwarrantable proceedings ; but the usurper's money had such an effect there, that the senate sent only a kind of mock commission into Africa, to persuade the parties to an accommodation. The commissioners found Jugurtha untractable ; he told them, that he did not doubt but his conduct would be approved by the senate, who were well acquainted with his integrity ; that, Adherbal having made an attempt upon his life, he had been obliged to raise troops to guard against the villainy of a brother, who was an assassin ; and that the republic was too equitable to disapprove of a just defence, which was agreeable to the laws of nations. With this answer he dismissed the deputies, without suffering b them to confer with Adherbal, who was shut up in the besieged city.

As soon as they were gone, Jugurtha pursued the siege with vigor, and, following the method which he had seen Scipio take in Spain, incompassed the place with a wide ditch and a rampart, guarded with towers at proper distances, to keep out succours and convoys. In this extremity Adherbal prevailed on two soldiers of the garison to cross the enemy's trenches in the night, and carry a very affecting letter to Rome. When it was read in the senate, some voted for marching an army immediately against the usurper. But the venal senators, who were most numerous, opposed this motion, and reduced the decree to this single point, that a second deputation should be sent to Jugurtha, consisting of men eminent for their probity, and venerable for their age ; c and that M. Scaurus, president of the senate, should be at the head of it. As the affair required dispatch, the deputies were ready to set out in three days ; soon crossed over into Africa, and landing at Utica, summoned Jugurtha to appear before them.
The prince was thunderstruck with this summons, and long in suspense what to do.
At length he resolved to make a general assault upon the place, and not to appear before the Roman ambassadors, till he had completed his conquest. But he did not succeed in his attempt, his soldiers being repulsed with considerable loss by the Italian cohorts.
In the mean time, Scaurus began to be tired with these delays ; and, as it was dangerous to provoke him, Jugurtha resolved to obey the summons ; and, leaving his camp, came guarded by a small body of horse to plead his cause before the ambassadors. d Scaurus at first broke out into bitter invectives against the Numidian king, reproaching him with having basely assassinated one of his brothers, and shut up the other in his metropolis, with an intention to destroy him by famine ; he ordered him to raise the siege forthwith, under pain of being declared and deemed an enemy to the senate and people of Rome, who had taken the innocent and injured Adherbal under their protection. But the anger of the Roman was soon abated. He heard Jugurtha's excuses with great composure, acquiesced in the frivolous accusations he brought against his rival, and returned home, without so much as ordering the cruel and ambitious king to raise the siege. This sudden departure made Scaurus suspected of having sacrificed the publick good to his private interest ; and his conduct afterwards confirmed this e suspicion. Jugurtha, having got rid of the Roman ambassadors, returned before Cirtba, and shut it up with more care than ever. As the famine began to be very troublesome to the garison, the Italian troops persuaded Adherbal to capitulate, and thereby secure his life, leaving the rest to the Roman republic, which was concerned, both in honour and interest, to re-establish him in the dominions she had allotted him. Adherbal, not thinking it safe to reject the advice of armed troops, began, with the utmost reluctance, to treat with his rival, and agreed to deliver up the place, on condition that he and his garison should have their lives spared. This Jugurtha readily promised ; but he no sooner entered the city, than he put all he found in arms to the sword, extended his fury even to the foreign merchants, and, to complete the scene, f seized on Adherbal, and inhumanly murdered him in his own palace, after having made him suffer the most exquisite torments, his cruel temper and the desire of revenge could invent. The news of this base murder soon reached Rome, where it was heard by all honest men with the utmost horror and indignation. But the friends of Jugurtha endeavoured to get the decree put off, which was ready to pass against him, in hopes that time would abate this first heat. And indeed the villainy of the Numidian king would have escaped public vengeance, had not a zealous tribune, named Caius Mem-mius, acquainted the people in the comitia with the heinous crimes that were laid to that a prince's charge, and bitterly exclaimed against the venality of the senate. The people, convinced by their tribune, that the scandalous prevarication of the patricians was the effect of the money, which the emissaries of Jugurtha had liberally distributed among them, resolved to bring the affair before their own tribunal. Hereupon the conscript fathers, to avoid the reproach of a scandalous censure upon themselves, decreed, that, as soon as the elections were over, one of the new consuls should have Numidia for his province; which was declaring, that they designed to make war on Jugurtha the next year °.

The senate resolve to make war upon Jugurtha.

WHEN the time came for the elections, the assembled tribes promoted to the consular dignity two men of very opposite characters, Lucius Calpurnius Piso Bestia and P. Cernelius Scipio Nasica. The latter possessed all the virtues of his ancestors, had always rejected with indignation the offers of Jugurtha, and shewed a great detestation of the general corruption of the senate. The former was a man of great personal bravery, very active and vigilant, a strict observer of military discipline, and consequently fit to strike terror into an enemy, and command respect from his own troops. But these valuable qualities were tarnished by a sordid avarice; for he looked upon war merely as a trade, and a means to get money. So that Nasica was the more proper man to be sent into Numidia, since the avarice of the generals was more to be dreaded, than the forces of the enemy. But Numidia unfortunately fell to Bestia's lot, and Italy to Nasica's. The former began, without loss of time, to make the necessary levies, and prepare for his expedition. In the mean time, Jugurtha, being informed by his emissaries at Rome, that a consular army was raising against him, and that Calpurnius Bestia was to command it, immediately dispatched his son to Rome, attended by two lords of distinction, with orders to spare no expences in keeping steady his old protectors, and purchasing new ones. Though his crimes had made such a noise, that no-body could so much as take his part openly, yet he did not doubt, but the blow might be still averted by the irresistible power of money. The consul Bestia, who looked upon his African expedition as a glorious harvest, heard with great concern the news of the Numidian prince's arrival in Italy. He was afraid, lest, by his intrigues and presents, he should prevail upon the conscript fathers to postpone the war, from which the consul proposed to reap great riches. He therefore opposed the embassy with all his interest, and got a decree passed, ordering Jugurtha's son and his attendants to depart Italy in ten days, unless they were come to deliver up the king of Numidia, and all his dominions, to the republic, by way of dedition. This decree being notified to them by the consul, they returned, without so much as having entered the gates of Rome P,

UPON their departure Bestia hastened his preparations. As he was not ignorant, that he might one day be called to a severe account for his conduct by the tribunes of the people, he had the precaution to chuse for his council and lieutenants some of the most eminent members of the senate, under pretence, that he stood in need of persons consummate in the art of war and well skilled in negotiations. But his real design was, to throw upon them the odium of his future misconduct, and screen himself under their names and credit against all inquiry. Scaurus, with whose vices he was well acquainted, though the prince of the senate affected to conceal the depravity of his heart, appeared to him a very proper man for his purpose; since both his extreme avarice and his weight in the senate were proper qualifications for it. Scaurus readily consented to follow the consul, promising himself great wealth from a war, which was to be carried on in a country never before entered by any Roman army. And now, all things being ready, the legions marched by land to Rhegium, there imbarqued for Sicily, and from Sicily crossed over into Africa. The consul upon his arrival briskly attacked Jugurtha's dominions, reduced several cities, took some castles, and made a great many prisoners. This he did in order to bring Jugurtha into his measures. And indeed these acts of hostility did not much affect the Numidian king. Though he was not acquainted with the consul's character, he conceived great hopes from the presence of Scaurus, to whose avarice he was no stranger. He therefore sent a deputation to the consul, desiring a conference, and promising to come himself to the Roman camp, upon an assurance of safety for his person. The offer was accepted, and from that moment a suspension of arms took place. And now, to bring the Numidian king to the conference he had desired, and at the same time

time to save appearances, the consul and Scaurus agreed to send the quæstor P. Sextius a to the city of Vacca, where Jugurtha resided, under pretence of getting a certain quantity of corn, which, they said, the king had promised in order to obtain a truce. But their real intent was, that he should be an hostage for the king's safety, who, upon this proof of their sincerity, came to the consul's camp. A council of war was immediately assembled to hear his proposals; but he there only made some excuses, endeavoured to clear himself from the crimes laid to his charge, and dropped a few words about a dedition. The rest was settled between Bestia, Scaurus, and himself, in private conferences; and it is not to be doubted, but Rome was betrayed by these two avaricious men, since they granted the king more advantageous terms, than could reasonably have been expected. They only obliged him to give the republic a certain b number of horses and cattle, thirty elephants, and a very inconsiderable sum of money. Upon these terms they made a solemn treaty of friendship, with one who had basely and treacherously murdered two kings, usurped their dominions, and despised the orders of the senate. All men therefore suspected, that Jugurtha had paid the consul and his lieutenant very dear for a peace, which was so little to the honour of the Roman name. However, the respect which the senators had for Scaurus, their president, kept them in suspense, no one daring to propose the disannulling of the treaty, till they had heard the particulars of the agreement from the consul himself and from Scaurus. In the mean while, Scipio Nasica dying, and the time for the great elections approaching, Bestia, the only surviving consul, was recalled to preside in c the comitia, in which M. Minucius Rufus and Sp. Posthumius Albinus were chosen consuls. Numidia fell by lot to Posthumius, and Macedon to Minucius. The latter marched against the Scordisci, who, though driven back beyond the Danube, as we have related above, repassed that river every winter on the ice, and laid waste the Roman provinces. The Triballi (E), a people of Lower Mæsia, and the Daci (F), of Upper Mæsia, had joined them, and together penetrated as far as Macedon, where they committed most dreadful devastations. But the consul having attacked them among rocks and mountains, put them to flight, and obliged them to cross the Ilebrus, on the banks of which river the battle was fought. As the river was then frozen over, the enemy ventured to cross it on the ice; but that breaking under the d weight of their heavy carriages, the river swallowed up great numbers of them, and the rest dispersed; so that Minucius, after having settled all those countries in peace, returned to Rome the following year, where he was honoured with a triumph⁹.

BUT the people were little affected with the success of these wars in the north. Their whole attention was turned towards Numidia. The peace lately made with Jugurtha was looked upon with detestation at Rome. The senators indeed continued silent out of respect to their head; but Caius Memmius, tribune of the people, addressed himself to the comitia, and, after having bitterly inveighed against the senate, concluded his speech thus: We are told, that the Numidian has yielded up to the republic himself, his troops, his strong-holds, and his elephants. Let us convince ourselves of the truth e of this assertion by summoning Jugurtha to Rome. If he has truly submitted, he will obey your orders; if he does not obey, you may easily judge, that what they call a treaty is nothing but a collusion between that crafty prince and our generals. His discourse stirred up the public animosity to the highest degree. As the people could know with certainty

(F) The country, now known by the name of Bulgaria, was inhabited by the Triballi at the time we are speaking of. Strabo indeed places the Triballi in Thrace; but we have observed in our history of that country, that the ancients extended its boundaries far beyond the river Strymon, which divided it from Macedon, and beyond mount Hæmus, which parted it from Mæsia. Herodotus speaks of Thrace as the largest country in the world, except the Indies; Pliny extends its frontiers to the Danube, and Appian joins it to Illyricum. And hence it is, that Stephanus reckons the Triballi among the Illyrian nations.

(F) Dacia is generally placed by geographers between the Borysthenes and European Sarmatia to the north; Upper Hungary to the west; the Danube to the south; and the river Pruth and the Euxine sea to the east. This vast country is divided by geographers into three large provinces, viz. Dacia Alpestris, Dacia Ripensis, and Dacia Mediterranea. The first contained part of Upper Hungary, Transylvania, Rascia, and the bannat of Temeswar; the second Walachia and Moldavia; and the third the greatest part of Upper Hungary. Dio places in Dacia all the countries on both sides of the Danube, from mount Hæmus to the mouth of that river. Pliny supposes the Daci and Getæ, who inhabited European Scythia near the Euxine sea, to be one and the same nation; and adds, that the people, who were called Getæ by the Greeks, were named Daci by the Latins (1).

certainty only from the mouth of Jugurtha himself, whether Opimius, Scaurus, or Bestia had been corrupted with his money, the people upon this consideration likewise passed a decree, summoning Jugurtha before their tribunal. The prætor Cassius, a Jugurtha man of great address and unspotted probity, was thought a proper person to carry ^{summoned before the people.} the decree of the people into Numidia. Accordingly, he was charged with this important commission, and set sail without delay for Africa, where he found the army universally corrupted. The inferior officers and the private men, following the example of their general, thought of nothing but acquiring riches. Some had sold to Jugurtha the thirty elephants, which he had given to the republic; others had set the deserters at liberty for money, plundered the countries of their allies, and committed every-where most dreadful ravages. But the prætor, without taking notice of these disorders, which it was not his province to correct, applied himself wholly to cure Jugurtha of his suspicions, and to persuade him to come to Rome. The Numidian, after a long struggle with himself, resolved at length to comply with the orders of the Roman people, having for his safeguard the public faith, and, what he chiefly relied on, the word of Cassius. A great honour indeed to the Roman people to see the powerful and warlike king of Numidia come to Rome, in compliance with ^{Comes to Rome.} their summons, and by that act of obedience acknowledge their sovereignty. The king, to raise compassion, entered the city without any pomp or attendance, and dressed in a very negligent manner. He was no sooner arrived, than he had recourse to his usual weapons, money. He knew, that the securing of one of the tribunes was sufficient to put a stop to all proceedings before the assembly of the people. He therefore, without loss of time, gained with a large sum one of the ten, named Caius Bæbius Salca, a man of great boldness and unbounded avarice. Having secured this ^{Gains over one of the tribunes.} point, he presented himself before the people assembled, when the tribune Memmius reproached him with his ingratitude to the family of Micipsa, his cruelty, his excessive ambition, the murder of his two adopted brothers, his disobedience to the orders of the senate, and his private intelligence with those whom the senate had commissioned to carry them, which, he said, was highly criminal and odious to the republic. The zealous tribune ended his speech with these words: You would never have carried your audaciousness to so great a height, if you had not been supported by a Roman faction, which you have purchased with money. We know them all; their zeal for supporting you in your iniquity has betrayed them. But it concerns us to have their names from your mouth. You may hope for all favour from the faith and clemency of the Romans, if you honestly declare to us, without any evasions, the persons whose protection you have purchased. But if you conceal, or disguise, the truth, you are irrecoverably lost. Speak, Jugurtha, speak, and answer the expectations of the Roman people. While Jugurtha was preparing to reply, Bæbius, the mercenary tribune, whom the king had purchased, stood up, and with an imperious tone, Though they press you to speak, Jugurtha, said he, I enjoin you silence. This unexpected opposition raised such murmurs and clamours, as would have confounded a man of less impudence and intrepidity than Bæbius. But he obstinately persisted in his opposition; so that the people, betrayed by one of their own magistrates, were forced to break up the assembly, without having received the least information. Jugurtha, having thus escaped the judgment of the people with impunity, carried his villainy ^{He escapes with impunity.} to an excess scarce to be imagined. We have observed above, that Gulussa, brother to Micipsa, left an illegitimate son, named Massiva. This prince had espoused the cause of Adherbal, as the most just; but, after the taking of Cirta and the cruel death of the king his relation, he had fled for refuge to Rome, where the few men of honour, whom Jugurtha could not corrupt, encouraged him to demand of the senate and people the crown of his ancestors, which Jugurtha had forfeited by the many crimes he had committed. The consul Posthumius Albinus, to whose lot Numidia was now fallen, was his avowed friend and most zealous protector. At his motion the people were strongly inclined to bestow the crown of Numidia on this prince, who, though he had not been adopted by Micipsa, was of the blood-royal, and grandson to Masinissa. But Jugurtha, to defeat at once all the designs of his enemies, caused Massiva to be assassinated, in Rome itself and in the face of the republic. The ^{Causes Massiva to be assassinated.} wretch who executed the villainy was instantly seized, and brought before the prætor, to whom he confessed, that he had been hired by Bomilcar, one of the king's attendants, to commit the murder. Hereupon Bomilcar was cited to appear before the prætor; but Jugurtha found means to convey him privately out of Rome, and send him him back into Africa. Upon the sudden disappearing of Bomilcar, all the odium ^a of the base assassination fell upon Jugurtha. But, as the treating him like a criminal was contrary to the promise made him, he was ordered by the senate to quit Rome immediately; which he did, without taking leave of the conscript fathers, and, for fear of being stopped, made all possible haste to imbarque at the nearest port. As he was on the road, he looked back on the city, and cried out, O mercenary city, thou wouldst even sell thyself, if thou couldst find a man rich enough to purchase thee. He was no sooner gone, than the senate by a special decree disannulled the infamous peace which Bestia had made with him; and then Posthumius Albinus, having raised with all possible expedition the necessary troops, crossed over into Africa, flattering himself, that he should be able to put an end to the war, before the year of his consulate expired; ^b though it was already far advanced. But the artful Numidian found means to amuse him, at one time pretending to be ready to surrender himself up to the Romans, at another declaring, that he would sooner part with his life than his crown. When the consul began to push on the war with vigor, he sent deputies to treat of a peace, and promised to submit to all that was demanded of him; but when he was pressed to perform his promise, he found out a thousand pretences to put off the execution of the articles which he had agreed to. Thus, by one evasion or other, he gained time, which he improved to the best advantage in the regulation of his affairs. And now, the consular year being ready to expire, Posthumius was obliged to return to Rome to ^c preside in the comitia for the new elections; so that he left Africa without having concluded any thing, either by action or treaty. Upon his arrival at Rome, he was loaded with the curses of the people, and strongly suspected of having betrayed his country, as his predecessors had done. No-body believed, that the Numidian could have found means, by artifices alone and without any connivance in the general, to suspend the motions of a large army, which Rome maintained in Africa at a vast expence ^r.

The Licinian
luxury.

THE consul on his return found great disturbances in Rome, occasioned by some tribunes of the people. Licinius Crassus had passed a law against luxury and expensive tables, and C. Manilius another for erecting a tribunal to try those whom Jugurtha had corrupted. The law published by Licinius was in substance this; that on the ^d days of the calends, nones, markets, and great games, any one might lay out on his table thirty asses, that is, 1 s. 11 d. but that on other days no man should have more than three pounds of fresh meat, and one of salt, at a meal; but as to pulse, herbs, and fruit, every one might have what quantity of them he pleased. This, though a severe edict, met with so ready a compliance from the citizens, that they put it in execution, even before it was confirmed by the people. Upon the merit of this law, Licinius endeavoured to get himself continued in his office; as did also his colleague Manilius. But this ended only in protracting the elections, which at last came ^e on, when Q. Cæcilius Metellus and M. Junius Silanus were chosen consuls. During their administration, the commissioners, appointed to try those who had been corrupted by Jugurtha, pursuant to the law passed at the motion of Manilius, ended their inquiries, after they had been two years in that commission. Scaurus, prince of the senate and the most guilty among them, was artful enough to get himself nominated at the head of the commission, which he discharged with the utmost severity, punishing ^f many, who were less criminal than himself. He condemned to banishment several consular men, and even one pontifex, a thing never heard of before. He did not even spare his accomplice Lucius Calpurnius Bestia, but banished him with the late consul Sp. Posthumius Albinus, and the famous prosecutor of the Gracchi, L. Opimius, who died of want at Dyrrachium. Cicero never mentions the banishment of Opimius, but with indignation. To the shame of the Romans, says he, this great man, who had just saved his country from the fury of the Gracchi, could not find a quiet retreat for his old age in the city he had preserved. Rome proclaims the importance of his services by a famous monument erected to his memory in the forum; and yet forces him to seek a sepulchre in a foreign country. Thus Scaurus, who had been himself most scandalously bribed by Jugurtha, not only escaped punishment, but judged and punished others for having suffered themselves to be bribed.

The Romans
defeated by the Cimbri.

THE new consuls having drawn lots, Narbonne Gaul fell to Silanus, who marched against the Cimbri and Teutones; but his army was routed at the first onset, and, in consequence

- a consequence of this defeat, all Narbonne Gaul exposed at once to the ravages of those barbarians. Rome only continued mistress of those cities, which the Cimbri could not take for want of skill in carrying on sieges. As for Metellus, it fell to his lot to make war in Numidia, where he was attended with better success. Jugurtha had gained a considerable advantage over the Roman army, after the departure of the late consul Posthumius Albinus. That general, before he left Africa, had given the command of the army to his brother Aulus Posthumius, whose only qualification was his being the consul's brother. He no sooner saw himself at the head of forty thousand men, than he resolved to take advantage of the consul's absence, in order to gain himself both riches and glory. Though the troops were in winter-quarters, and the month of January was a very improper time for military expeditions, he assembled all his forces, marched into the field, and, through roads almost impassable, brought them before Suthul, a strong-hold in Numidia, where the king's treasures were lodged. This was the lure that drew him; but the castle stood upon the brow of a hill, and was surrounded by marshes, which in the winter made it altogether inaccessible. However, Aulus, blinded by his avarice, ventured to besiege it. Jugurtha, overjoyed to see him lose his time and tire his troops, in so difficult an undertaking, caused several proposals to be made to him, as if he dreaded the success of his arms. To keep up his presumption, he sent deputies from time to time to beg peace, in as submissive terms, as if he had been under the greatest apprehensions. He did not, however, neglect to advance with his army, as if he intended to throw succours into the place.
- c As he drew near Suthul, he pretended to be terrified at the sight of the Roman forces, and, in order to increase the confidence of the general, he retired from post to post through difficult roads. Aulus, quitting Suthul, pursued him close, lest he should find means to make his escape. But the crafty Numidian, who was well acquainted with the country, drew him insensibly into narrow passes, and then returned to his usual artifices. He held the general in so great contempt, that he did not think it worth his while to bribe him: but he applied himself to the officers and soldiers of the army, and gained over, by his emissaries, not only two cohorts of Thracians and one of Ligurians, but many of the legionaries themselves, who basely agreed to sacrifice the good of their country, and the lives of their fellow-citizens, to their private interest. As Jugurtha's camp was not far from that of the Romans, the king ordered his light-armed Numidians to mount the enemy's ramparts in the dead of the night; which they did with inconceivable swiftness, and filled the camp with terror and confusion. In the mean time, the chief officer of the third legion, pursuant to his agreement with Jugurtha, opened to him two gates of the camp, and, being joined by the Ligurian and Thracian cohorts, covered the Numidian army as they entered. The Romans with their general abandoned the camp, and fled in the utmost confusion. The slaughter was not great, the darkness of the night favouring the retreat of the fugitives; they fled through the two other gates of the camp, and, taking different roads, gained a neighbouring eminence, and posted themselves there.
- e When it was day, Aulus found scarce any of his men wanting, except those who had sold themselves to the enemy; but the greatest part of them had thrown away their arms, that they might fly with more expedition.
- EARLY next morning, Jugurtha surrounded the hill, on which the Romans were posted; and then Aulus, seeing himself besieged by a victorious enemy, sent a shameful deputation to Jugurtha, demanding quarter only, and offering a lasting peace, which he would undertake to get ratified by the senate and people. The Numidian answered, that he would grant the Romans life and liberty, upon condition, that they should all pass under the yoke, and quit Numidia in ten days. To this the timorous general submitted, and marched with all his army between two posts set up for that purpose, amidst the taunts and shouts of the Numidian soldiers. The Roman troops, thus disgraced, disbanded themselves, and retired into the African province, that is, the ancient dominions of Carthage, which were now possessed by the republic. The senate was no sooner informed of this shameful peace, than they declared it void, and recalled Aulus, who was soon after tried by Scaurus, and condemned to banishment. Metellus, to whose lot Numidia was fallen, as we have related above, hastened the necessary preparations for carrying on the war with the utmost vigor. He was a senator of great virtue and integrity, and, besides, had given proofs of uncommon valour and prudence in the command of armies ; so that all things seemed to promise success to his enterprise. The Romans, fully persuaded that it would not be in Jugurtha's power to corrupt him with offers, readily decreed him the recruits he desired, and at his request even disannulled some laws which reduced the pay of the legionaries. In short the people refused him nothing which he thought necessary for the carrying on of the war, and wiping off one of the most shameful reproaches, that had ever been cast on the Roman name, since the disgrace of the Caudine Forks. As for Metellus himself, his chief concern was, to chuse such subalterns as he could confide in, and whose skill in the art of war had been already proved. Among these was the famous Marius, who, as he had neither birth, fortune, nor eloquence sufficient to raise him to the first dignities, had continued quite idle at Rome, ever since his prætorship. He therefore joyfully accepted the offer Metellus made him, of being one of his lieutenant-generals. When all things were ready, the consul set out without delay, and, landing in Africa, spent the whole summer in disciplining his troops, which lived dispersed about the province in the utmost disorder, declaring, that he would not suffer them to engage, till they had learnt how to conquer. And now Jugurtha, finding he had to deal with a general, whom he could neither over-reach nor bribe, sent an embassy to him, with all possible marks of a sincere submission, begging only quarter for himself and children. But Metellus, suspecting the Numidian of double dealing, opposed artifice with artifice. He took each of the ambassadors aside, and prevailed upon them to promise, that they would deliver up to him the usurper, dead or alive. But this project being disconcerted by the circumspection, vigilance, and suspicions of the king, the consul resolved to attack him with open force. Accordingly, he entered Numidia, and, though no enemy appeared, he kept constantly upon his guard against a surprise. His troops always marched in order of battle. Metellus himself led on the advanced guard at the head of the archers, slingers, and light-armed troops ; Marius commanded the cavalry of the legions in the rear, and Rutilius, another of Metellus's lieutenants, the foot in the centre. In this fine order the consular army appeared before Vacca, a trading city full of Italian merchants, which upon the first summons received a Roman garison. From Vacca the consul still kept advancing, in the same order, towards the heart of Numidia. In the mean time, Jugurtha, having drawn together all the troops he could, lay in ambush for the Romans, waiting to engage them as they should come down from a mountain, which stood directly in the consul's road. Metellus no sooner reached the top of the mountain, than he discovered men and horses concealed among the bushes, which were not thick enough to cover them, ; and being fully satisfied, as he drew nearer, that the enemy was in ambush there, he changed both the rout and disposition of the army. In the first place, he ordered Rutilius to march down the hill another way, and pitch a camp on the banks of the Muthullus, about twenty thousand paces from the hill. This was a wise precaution to secure water for his troops in that dry and burning climate. As he was resolved to leave the hill on his right hand, he altered the disposition of his troops, and made his right wing three times as strong as usual, knowing it would be most exposed to the enemy. In the centre he placed his infantry, intermixed with some manipuli of light-armed troops, and ordered his cavalry to cover the army in the flanks. In this order he marched down the steepest part of the hill, and advanced slowly towards the plain. Marius commanded in the centre ; and Metellus himself in the right wing, which must naturally be first attacked. As soon as the consular troops had got below the top of the hill, Jugurtha began to move, and, having ordered two thousand men to take possession of the top of the mountain, which the Romans had quitted, he founded the charge. The Romans faced about, but could not bring the Numidians to a close engagement. As they had got above the consular troops, they discharged showers of darts upon them, and wounded them at a great distance. If they were pursued by the Roman cavalry, they dispersed and fled singly, entering the coppices, whither the enemy durst not pursue them. They then rallied, and, falling out again, fell unexpectedly on the consular army in different quarters. Never was a more extraordinary battle fought ; they all engaged in small parties, every one attacking the enemy, or defending himself, as occasion offered, without any rule or order. The day was far advanced, before it could be known which side had the advantage. Both armies were equally tired and exhausted with heat and fatigue ; and many had fallen on both sides in the several attacks, which had succeeded one another, without intermission, from morning to night. At length the Numidians, towards the close of the day, being a being briskly attacked by the Roman legionaries, and pursued from post to post, dispersed, and no more appeared".

WHILE Metellus was thus engaged on the mountain, Rutilius, who had been sent by the consul to pitch a camp on the banks of the Muthullus, was vigorously attacked by Bomilcar, one of the king's generals. But that brave Roman repulsed the enemy with great slaughter, and having pursued them, took four of their elephants, and killed the rest to the number of forty; so that the consul gained two victories on one day. Metellus continued his march all night, and arrived before day-break with all his troops at the camp on the Muthullus, which he found finished. There he rested four days, to refresh his men and have their wounds dressed. In this camp he received intelligence, that the Numidian, being abandoned by his army, had retired to a distant place, covered with woods and rocks, and was there forming a new one. Desertion was no crime amongst the Numidians, who, after the first defeat, were at liberty to return home, or continue in the army, as they pleased. However, the Roman general did not think it adviseable to follow the fugitive king, but contented himself with sending out parties to plunder the country. On the other hand, Jugurtha behaved with the address and ability of a great commander. He seemed to be in all places, appeared, when least expected, at the head of a flying army, and falling upon the Romans, dispersed about the fields, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and then retired to the mountains and forests. In the mean time, news being brought to Rome of the victory gained by Metellus and his lieutenant Rutilius, the temples were opened, and supplications made by way of thanksgiving to the gods, for the success which had attended the arms of the republic in Numidia. The probity, disinterestedness, valour, and wisdom of Metellus were in the mouth of every Roman".

In the mean time, Rome raised Ser. Sulpicius Galba and Q. Hortensius to the consulate. But the latter, who was father to Q. Hortensius, Cicero's rival in eloquence, either declined the burden of the office, or was prevented by death from enjoying that dignity; it being certain, that another was soon after chosen in his room, viz. *M. Aurelius Scaurus. At the same time Metellus was continued general of the Roman army in Numidia, with the title of proconsul. As for the new consuls, Italy fell by lot to Galba, and Narbonne Gaul to Scaurus, whither he repaired to make war upon the Cimbri, who had reduced almost that whole province. But to return to Numidia: Marius, whose ambition was awaked by the applauses Rome had given his general, was now become his rival, narrowly watched all his steps, and laid hold of every opportunity that offered to defame him. We are told by Plutarch, that Marius carried his ingratitude so far, as to boast, that he was not so much indebted to Metellus, as to fortune, which had led him into Africa, as to a great stage, where he should, in the end, display those talents with which nature had liberally endowed him. And indeed the point he had now in view was, to raise himself at the expence of his general and benefactor. He was impatient of getting the consulship, that he might put an end to the Numidian war, and be honoured with a triumph. His pretensions were supported by all those qualifications which are requisite in a great commander. For he was famous for an heroic valour, a great love of discipline, a strange ascendant over the soldiers, a temperance carried to the severest abstinence, great intrepidity in sudden dangers, an uncommon coolness and presence of mind in battle, and an extraordinary readiness at expedients after bad success. But as for those virtues and dispositions of mind, which form the character of an honest man, Marius was quite destitute of them. Honesty and ingratitude are incompatible. Metellus, who saw into the designs of his lieutenant, began to be jealous of him, and to fear least he should be supplanted by him at the end of the year. He therefore took great care not to give any advantage to his malicious rival by ill conduct. He took care to have his convoys strongly guarded, and always sent out his whole cavalry together, ordering them not only to pillage the country, but to destroy whole towns with fire and sword. The Numidian, seeing his country utterly ruined by this new way of making war, at last left his fastnesses, and followed the Romans, being always intent both on surprising and avoiding the enemy. He burnt up the forage, and poisoned the waters in all places, where the legions were to pass. He was every moment harassing either Metellus or Marius, and as soon as he had attacked them vigorously in the rear, he immediately regained the mountains. Metellus, finding he could not draw Jugurtha to

to a battle, resolved, if possible, to force him to it. In order to this, he resolved to besiege Zama; but Jugurtha, upon the first notice of his design, flew thither, got to the place before him, and placed a strong garison in it of Roman deserters, on whom he could depend. Then he hastened to Sicca, whither the proconsul had detached Marius for provisions. He was very desirous of entering the lists with that commander, who had been his intimate friend, and had learnt the military art with him under Scipio, at the famous siege of Numantia. He arrived just as Marius was marching out of the city with his convoy, and fell upon him with a fury not to be expressed. But the Roman repulsed him, and, though surprized, behaved with such presence of mind and intrepidity, as made him ever after dread the very name of Marius. When the convoys came up, Metellus invested Zama, and made a general assault upon the place: but the besieged repulsed the aggressors, and discharged such showers of darts, stones, and fire-brands upon them, that they were obliged to retire in the utmost confusion. During the heat of the action, Jugurtha appeared on a sudden, and as most of the legionaries, left to guard the Roman camp, were gone out to see the attack, he made himself master of one of the gates. Hereupon some of the Romans, who guarded the tents, ran to their arms, others betook themselves to flight; but a small body of forty men only, posting themselves on an eminence within the camp, defended it with surprizing valour, till Marius came to their relief. For Metellus no sooner heard, that the king had surprized his camp, than he detached that brave commander with all the cavalry to drive him out. Marius flew with joy to a second engagement with the Numidian, forced his way into the camp, and obliged the king to fly out of one of the gates, and shelter himself among the rocks. As for Metellus, after a vain attempt upon the town, he retired to pass the night in his camp. The next day he renewed the attack, but with no better success, the besieged, who were all Roman deserters, repulsing the aggressors with unparallelled bravery. During the assault, Jugurtha appeared anew, but, after a sharp conflict, was put to flight by the cavalry, which Metellus had posted with some manipuli on the road the king had taken the day before. In the mean time, night coming on, the proconsul returned to his camp; and, as the season was far advanced and the garison made a resolute defence, he thought it adviseable to raise the siege, and put his troops into winter quarters in the Roman province. d

As Metellus did not doubt, but he should be continued in the command of the army till all Numidia was reduced, he employed his time in making the necessary preparations for the next campaign. He found means to have a private interview with Bomilcar, who, as we have related above, had been the chief agent in the murder of Massiva. Bomilcar was greatly attached to Jugurtha; but, as he was a Numidian, Metellus did not despair of prevailing upon him to betray his master. He therefore not only promised him impunity, but assured him of the protection of the republic, in case he should either dispatch Jugurtha, or deliver him up alive into his hands. The Numidian hearkened to the proconsul's offers, and treacherously persuaded Jugurtha, that it was absolutely necessary for him to surrender himself up to the Romans without reserve: Prevent, said he, the fatal designs which your own subjects may have on your life. Have recourse to the Roman clemency, and depend on the sincerity of their offers. Metellus has even more honour than bravery. The king, not suspecting any treachery, was easily prevailed upon to dispatch an embassy to the proconsul, acquainting him, that he was ready to submit to such conditions as he should think fit to impose upon him. Upon this Metellus, having assembled from all the places, where the army was quartered, such officers as were of senatorial families, held a great council of war, in which it was agreed, that the king of Numidia should, by way of preliminary, send the Romans two hundred thousand pounds weight of silver, with all his elephants, and a certain number of horses and arms, and deliver up all the deserters. The king complied with these hard conditions, and immediately ordered all the deserters, to the number of about three thousand, mostly Thracians or Ligurians, to be seized and sent to the proconsul, by whose orders some had their hands cut off, others were set in the ground up to their waists, and shot to death by the Roman archers, and the rest burnt alive. The other two articles were likewise executed with great punctuality; the elephants, horses, and arms, required by the proconsul, were delivered up, and the money paid down. And now the king, having stripped e

- a stripped himself of his money, his elephants, his horses, and his deserters, in whom consisted the main strength of his army, the proconsul ordered him to repair in person to Tifidium, a city in Numidia, there to receive further directions. He started at this last step, began to hesitate, and spent several days, without being able to come to any resolution. The remembrance of his enormous crimes stung him with fresh remorse; he dreaded the severe punishment, which his guilty conscience represented to him, in a very strong light, as due for so many murders; the charms of a crown, and the horror of falling from a throne into slavery, made so deep an impression upon his mind, that he resolved, at all adventures, to try once more the fate of war. A sceptre, said he, is not so heavy as chains. To arms! to arms! let us renew the war. But afterwards resolves to pursue the war.
- b It is better to perish at the head of an army, than to fall at once from empire to slavery. And from this time he never shewed the least inclination to peace. He was now wholly intent on raising a new army, on fortifying the places which continued faithful to him, on providing arms, and endeavouring to surprise those cities which had surrendered to the Romans. Vacca was an important post, of which Metellus had made himself master soon after his arrival in Africa, as we have related above, and given the government of it to Turpilius Silanus, a citizen of Collatia, a man of known equity and moderation, and his intimate friend. Turpilius, quite free from all pride and avarice, gained the affections of the inhabitants by the mildness of his government; but their aversion to a foreign yoke prevailed over the esteem they had for their governor. The chief men of the city suffered themselves to be gained over to the interest of Jugurtha, and plotted among themselves the massacring of the Roman garison. To compass their treacherous design, they took the opportunity of a public festival to invite the officers to feast at their houses; and, when they had eat and drank plentifully, every man, as had been agreed on before-hand, stabbed his guest. Such as got into the streets, were overwhelmed and killed with stones from the tops of the houses; so that Turpilius was the only man who escaped the common massacre. The proconsul no sooner heard of the revolution in Vacca, than he ordered the legion, which was quartered near him, to arms, and, joining with them a great number of those Numidians who had submitted to Rome, marched in person to avenge the blood of his Romans. The inhabitants had shut their gates for fear of a surprise; but when they saw from their ramparts a body of Numidian cavalry advancing towards their city, without committing any devastations, they concluded, that Jugurtha must be at the head of them, and upon this presumption marched out to meet him. But their mistake proved fatal to them: the Numidian cavalry fell upon the disarmed multitude, and cut them in pieces; and, in the mean time, the Roman legion coming up seized the gates of the city, retook, and plundered it. Thus the treacherous inhabitants of Vacca, after having enjoyed their liberty but two days, were brought again under subjection, and treated with the utmost severity. Tho' Metellus was fully convinced, that Turpilius was no-ways guilty, he was obliged, by the clamours of the army, contrary to his own inclination, to have him tried by a council of war. Marius, who was one of his judges, merely out of spite to Metellus, became his accuser. He charged him with having sold the town and the lives of the Romans under his command, laid great stress on the distinction shewn him in having his life alone spared, and prosecuted the affair so warmly, that he got him condemned to be first beaten with rods, and then beheaded. Soon after the execution of the sentence, the innocence of Turpilius plainly appeared; and then the other officers made their apologies to the proconsul for the sentence they had pronounced, and bewailed with him the unfortunate end of a man, whom he had judged worthy of his friendship; but Marius publicly rejoiced at the death of the innocent Turpilius, and had even the insolence to boast, that he had found means to torment Metellus with a perpetual remorse and an avenging fury, which would be continually requiring of him the innocent blood of his friend^a.
- c The Romans massacred in Vacca.
e Marius's insolent conduct.

AND now, upon the news that the senate and people were inclined to continue Metellus in the command of the army, till the war with Jugurtha was ended, Marius's hatred to his general broke out into open attacks upon him. He began with decrying and calumniating him among the soldiery; he represented him as an ambitious man, who prolonged the war, only to keep himself the longer in power and command; he pretended, that the natural sloth and timorousness of Metellus, which were increased by age, made him incapable of opposing an active and vigilant enemy; he

he bragged among the common soldiers, with whom he made himself very familiar, a that, with half the troops Metellus had in his army, he would undertake, in one single campaign, to bring Jugurtha to Rome dead or alive. Whatever Marius said, the soldiers wrote to their relations and friends at Rome; and these letters, being communicated from house to house, prejudiced the people against Metellus, and at the same time raised the reputation of his lieutenant, who, not content with advising the soldiers to send bad accounts of their general to Rome, went so far as openly to beg the votes of the Roman merchants at Utica, for chusing him consul at the next election, in order thereby to enable him to supplant his general and benefactor. He also prevailed on Gauda, the brother of Jugurtha, but by a different mother, whom Metellus had disobliged (G), to write to the senate against the proconsul, and much in his b favour. These solicitations proved very advantagious to Marius, who being informed, by his emissaries at Rome, of the favourable inclination of the people towards him, publicly desired leave of the proconsul to return to Rome, to make interest for the consulat. Metellus, tho' a man of great honour and probity, was not quite free from that pride, which is almost inseparable from noble birth. He therefore received this application with haughtiness, and answered Marius with a kind of raillery; It will be soon enough for you, Marius, to stand for the consulat, when my son shall be old enough to be your colleague. Young Metellus was then scarce twenty years of age; whereas a man was to be at least forty before he could be chosen consul. In short, the proconsul told his lieutenant in plain terms, that he would not give him his discharge, so c long as he had any occasion for his service. At the same time he applied again to Bomilcar, putting him in mind of the promise he had made of delivering up Jugurtha to him dead or alive; but Bomilcar, who had been suspected by the king ever since he advised him to surrender, applied to Nabdalsa, a Numidian lord of distinction, and one of the greatest favourites the king had. He communicated to him his design of sacrificing the king to the welfare of his country. Nabdalsa, who was one of the most wealthy lords of Numidia, readily entered into the plot, which would secure his great estate, and both his own life and the lives of his children. The two traitors agreed to surprise their king, and carry him to the proconsul; the time was fixed for the execution of the design, and the ambush prepared. On the day appointed, d Bomilcar came to the place agreed on; and if Nabdalsa had performed his part, an end had been put at once to the Numidian war; but Nabdalsa not appearing, Bomilcar wrote a letter to him, putting him in mind of his promise, and representing to him, that the affairs of Jugurtha were desperate; that he must soon perish, either by their hands, or the hands of the Romans; that it was not worth their while to sacrifice their estates, their liberty, the lives of their wives and children, for an usurper and assassin; that, by delivering him up to the Romans, they would save their country from impending ruin, secure their lives and estates, and gain the favour of the powerful republic, &c. This letter was delivered safe into Nabdalsa's hands, while e he was lying on a couch, resting himself after a violent exercise. After he had read it, he laid it on his pillow, and, musing upon the contents of it, fell asleep. In the mean time, his secretary coming into the room, and finding a letter open, read it, in order to answer it; but, being shocked at the proposals of Bomilcar, he went immediately to acquaint the king with the plot. Nabdalsa soon after awaked, missed the letter, and finding, upon inquiry, that his secretary alone had been in his room, and had suddenly disappeared, he dispatched without delay some of his attendants after him; but, as he had got the start of them, the letter was already in the king's hands.

(G) Metellus had not treated this prince with that honour and respect which he expected. When he first came to the Roman camp, he desired two marks of distinction, viz. that in all public assemblies he should be placed at the general's right-hand; and that a troop of Roman horse should be assigned him for his guard. Metellus refused him both; the first, because it was a mark of distinction, which the Romans shewed to those only whom they acknowledged to be kings; and the second, because he thought it an affront to the Roman knights, to make them in a manner Numidian guards. Marius therefore, applying himself to the young prince, in the heat of his resentment, endeavoured to exasperate him against the proud proconsul, whom he represented as taking delight in seeing the sons of kings groveling at his feet. He likewise assured him, that, if he was general, he would treat him with all the respect due to his character, and soon place him on the throne of his ancestors, as the next heir to the crown. By these discourses Marius easily attached Gauda to himself; and the Numidian wrote to the republic, in terms of great bitterness, against the proconsul, and as much to the advantage of his lieutenant (2).

- ^a Hereupon Nabdalsa flew to court, and assured the king, that he would have discovered the plot, if his treacherous servant had not prevented him. Jugurtha, for fear of raising a sedition, for Nabdalsa was greatly beloved by the soldiery, seemed to be satisfied with the excuse; but condemned Bomilcar and most of his accomplices to die ^b. The loss of Bomilcar frustrated the hopes of Metellus, who thereupon resolved to take the field. As he was now quite tired with the importunities of Marius, he gave him at length leave to go to Rome, but only twelve days before the election. ^c Ambition gave Marius wings; for he reached the city in six days after his setting out, and there made the best use of the little time he had left to gain the favour of the people. He calumniated the proconsul, accused him of timorousness, assured the people, that, as he was well acquainted with the country, and, without all doubt, more vigorous and active than Metellus, he would, with half the troops the proconsul commanded, in one campaign, take Jugurtha dead or alive; in short, he omitted nothing, that could either discredit his general, or gain himself a great reputation. As the nobility had of late constantly chosen two patricians to the consulate, contrary to the ancient law, that one of the consuls should be a patrician, and the other a plebeian, the people were highly displeased with the patricians in general, and wholly bent on promoting Marius, who bore an irreconcilable hatred to the nobility. All the mob of Rome crowded to his house, the artificers left their shops to attend him, and nothing was heard in the comitia, but the praises of Marius and invectives against Metellus. In short, he was raised to the consulate by a great majority, with L. Cassius Longinus. His next business was to supplant his benefactor, and get himself nominated to succeed him in the command of the army in Numidia. The senate had already, by a special decree, appointed Metellus to be proconsul in Numidia for the third year; but Marius applied to the people by their tribune Manilius Mancinus, and at his motion they determined, that Marius alone should carry on the war with Jugurtha. His colleague had Narbonne Gaul for his province, where he fell into an ambush laid for him by the Tigurini. L. Calpurnius Piso, one of his lieutenant-generals, a man of great resolution, prudence, and courage, endeavoured to rescue him; but perished with his general in the attempt. Then the Roman army was left wholly to the conduct of the other lieutenant-general, by name Popilius, an officer of no valour, and very little merit of any other kind. He, to save his life, offered to capitulate, shamefully surrendered his arms and baggage, and, with his whole army, passed under the yoke. As soon as he returned to Rome, where his name was become odious, he was accused before the people, and prosecuted with uncommon zeal; but he, to save his reputation, went into banishment of his own accord, before sentence was pronounced against him ^c. Æmilius Scaurus, prince of the senate, got himself elected consul in the room of Cassius, for the remaining part of the year (H).
- BUT to return to Marius; his being obliged to preside in the comitia for the election of the new consul, kept him longer in Rome than he desired. Being now invested with the supreme magistracy, he treated the nobility with the utmost contempt, declaring publicly, that it was matter of greater glory and triumph for him to have humbled the conscript fathers, by obtaining of the people the command of the army in Numidia, which the senate had given to Metellus, than it would be to subdue that kingdom, and lead Jugurtha in chains. He insulted all the patricians he met, and abused them in the grossest manner. All his speeches to the people were filled with his own praises, and with most bitter invectives against the nobility and the senate. He was no orator; but every thing was well taken from a man, who was become the idol

(H) Scaurus had one P. Rutilius for his competitor; but got the better of him by a piece of chicanery. He accused Rutilius of bribery in canvassing for the consulship; and, in proof of his accusation, produced a note under his hand, whereby Scaurus pretended, that his competitor had promised a citizen money for his vote. The note contained only these four letters, A. F. P. R. which Scaurus interpreted thus; Actum fide P. Rutilii, that is, P. Rutilius promises to perform the obligation. But C.

Cannius, a Roman knight, who was present at the trial, gave a very different interpretation to the four letters, making them stand for the following sentence; Æmilius fecit, plectetur Rutilius, that is, Æmilius made the note; but Rutilius will be punished for it; which was accusing Scaurus of forgery, and at the same time shewing the folly of laying stress on the interpretation of initial letters, which are capable of many senses. However, Rutilius was excluded, and Scaurus promoted (3).

idol of the people. This encouraged him to demand with insolence a greater number of troops than the consuls had been usually allowed, and to send, of his own authority, to demand auxiliaries of the nations and kings who were in friendship with the republic. At Rome, he made his levies with the utmost rigor, obliging those who were famed for valour in all parts of Italy to come to Rome, and take the military oaths, tho' they had already served the time required by law; but the people took all the severities of their plebeian consul in good part, and were so zealous to follow him into Africa, that his legions were soon completed, and mostly filled with men of the lowest classes, who were exempted by their poverty from the service. These Marius preferred to any others, as if he had been afraid of having any soldiers in his troops, who were of a better condition than himself^a.

In the mean time, Metellus, ignorant of what passed at Rome, and not doubting, but he should be continued in the command of the army, till the intire reduction of Numidia, took the field; and having, after long and tedious marches, found out at last Jugurtha, posted in places which he thought inaccessible, he forced him to a battle, in which the Numidians were defeated and dispersed. The king escaped by flight through vast deserts and roads, with which he alone was acquainted, and retired to Thala, a place well fortified, where he had lodged his jewels and treasures. Metellus followed him cross the desert, which was about fifty miles in extent, carrying with him corn enough to support the army fourteen days, and a vast number of skins and barrels filled with water. The inhabitants of Thala, who thought their city inaccessible, were struck with terror at the approach of the Roman army. The king, dreading to be shut up in the place, immediately abandoned it, and rambled from desert to desert, his fear of being betrayed keeping him from fixing any-where; but the garison, consisting mostly of deserters from the Roman army, made all the resistance that could be expected from brave men driven to despair. But when, after forty days siege, the Romans had made a large breach in the wall of the city, the garison, finding it impossible for them to avoid destruction, carried all the valuable things they could find to the king's palace, set fire to it, and perished all to a man in the flames. The proconsul had scarce entered the place, when he was informed, that one Hamilcar, a citizen of Great Leptis, was labouring under-hand to draw over his countrymen to Jugurtha. Hereupon he immediately detached thither four Ligurian cohorts, under the command of Caius Anicius, and by that means kept the neighbouring country in a state of tranquillity. Jugurtha, having now neither troops nor a place of refuge left, determined to go and treat in person with a people, who had never yet heard of the Roman name. These were the Getuli, a barbarous nation, who inhabited the inner part of Africa, and led their flocks from pasture to pasture, living always in tents, without any fixed habitation. The king, having found means to induce them to follow his standards, assembled the scattered shepherds, and taught them to keep their ranks, and obey the officers he set over them. From Getulia the Numidian king advanced to the confines of Mauritania, where Bocchus reigned over an African people, somewhat less barbarous and better disciplined, than the Getuli. As that prince had married one of Jugurtha's daughters, he was easily prevailed upon to enter into an offensive and defensive league with the Numidian. And now the king, being joined by the Getuli and all the forces of Bocchus, appeared anew in the field, and approached Cyrtha, the capital of Numidia, which Metellus had formerly taken, and made a magazine of arms and provisions for his army. This obliged the proconsul to alter his conduct; he no longer offered battle, or bid defiance to the enemy, but kept close within his intrenchments, and there watched the motions of the two kings, being determined to venture nothing, for fear of losing all^e.

SUCH was the state of affairs in Numidia, when news was brought to Metellus of the promotion of Marius to the consulate, and likewise to the command of the army. The proconsul, tho' a great and wise man, was thunder-struck to hear, that a mean plebeian, an ungrateful creature of his own, raised by his family from the dust, had found more credit and favour at Rome, than himself, notwithstanding his nobility and exploits. He was so much affected, that he could not forbear weeping, forgetting in a manner the dignity of his character; and indeed what could be more mortifying, than to have a conquest so far advanced snatched out of his hands, by one of the

- a the meanest of the people, drawn out of obscurity by himself? But, after all, he was not so much grieved, as Sallust informs us, at the glory he lost, as at the advancement of Marius, who had decried his conduct, only to raise himself upon the ruins of his reputation. However, as in great minds the public good prevails over private resentment, the proconsul spared no pains to draw off Bocchus from Jugurtha, tho' this would greatly facilitate the reduction of Numidia for his rival. He spent the whole time he remained in Numidia in private negotiations with that prince, who thereupon was less pressing to give battle, which was partly what the proconsul had in view. At length advice came, that Marius was landed at Utica, with a very numerous body of Romans and allies. Hereupon Metellus, not being able to bear the thoughts of paying his homage to the new consul, who had so treacherously and basely supplanted him, instantly left the camp, which he had pitched near Cyrtba, and returned to Italy, after having appointed Rutilius, one of his lieutenants, to deliver up the army to his perfidious and ungrateful rival. His presence at Rome, and the account he gave of the success of his arms, of the towns he had taken, of the provinces he had conquered, and of the battles he had fought, soon wiped off the calumnies, which had been cast upon him. The esteem and respect, which the people had formerly shewn for that great man, revived; he was received every-where with loud acclamations, and the people, to make him some amends for the injustice done him, decreed him, with an unanimous consent, the honour of a triumph and the glorious surname of Numidicus. Velleius Paterculus observes here, that there were, at this time, above twelve persons of the family of Metellus in Rome, who had been successively raised either to the consulate or censorship, and many of them honoured with triumphs, in less than twelve years. But, notwithstanding his nobility, his exploits, and his great reputation for probity, a tribune of the people had the boldness to accuse him of having plundered the province from which he came; but when he produced his books in his defence, the Roman knights, who were judges in these civil causes, refused to examine his accounts, declaring, that they thought the whole course of his life a stronger proof of his innocence, than the wax, on which he had set down his disbursements and receipts.
- d In the mean time, Marius put himself at the head of the army; but, as the troops he had brought with him were for the most part new levies, he did not care to run the hazard of a general action. He only watched the motions of the two kings, besieged some weak places, and prevented the enemy from making incursions into the countries which had submitted to Rome. Marius, having thus spent the summer, without any considerable exploit, his troops began to despise him, and to look upon Metellus as a much better general than his successor. To remove these prejudices, which began to prevail, he resolved on an enterprize, which would be sufficient to raise his reputation, and eclipse the glory of his predecessor. The city of Capfa stood in the middle of the burning sands of Africa, surrounded on all sides by a vast desert, which made it in a manner inaccessible, especially by great armies. This city he resolved to besiege; and having provided corn and water, which he knew he should want in the desert, he set out on his march, without communicating his design even to his own lieutenants. He marched only by night, the rays of the sun being so strongly reflected by the sand, that his men could not bear the heat by day. In this manner he crossed that inhospitable country, which was inhabited only by serpents of an enormous size, which heat and hunger made very troublesome. After three nights march, with what danger and fatigue the reader may imagine, the army came within two miles of Capfa before day-break. They then halted among some hills, which covered the city and intercepted the sight of the legions, and there waited, as in an ambush, till the sun appeared; when Marius detached his light-armed infantry to seize the gates, and, appearing at the same time with his whole army before the place, struck the inhabitants with such terror, that they offered to surrender, upon condition that they should have their lives spared; but Marius, to fill all Numidia at once with the dread of his name, entered the place sword in hand, levelled it with the ground, put all the citizens, who were able to bear arms, to death, and sold the rest for slaves. This barbarous instance of severity spread terror far and near; the people, where-ever he came, submitted to him, and many, without waiting for his presence, sent deputies to him, imploring his protection, and offering to supply his army with all sorts of provisions.

provisions, He marched to the utmost confines of Numidia, and, in that long march, a met with one place only which refused to submit to him. This was a castle called Mulucha, situated on the summit of a rock, and perhaps the strongest fortress then in the world. It was of no larger extent than the top of the rock, which was one intire body of flint, standing quite by itself, and naturally so very smooth; that there was not the least hold for the hands, or projection for the feet to rest on. The only way up to it was what the inhabitants had cut in the rock, so narrow, that two men could not, without difficulty, walk a-breast in it. However, Marius undertook the reduction of the place; but the besieged threw such a quantity of firebrands from the tops of their ramparts, and rolled down the rock such vast stones, that the machines were burnt, and those who managed them dangerously wounded. The b attempt was often renewed, but always proved fruitless; besides, the castle was so well stored with provisions and ammunition, and the season so far advanced, that the Roman general could not entertain any hopes of reducing it by famine: yet he persisted; and at length mere chance did more than his utmost efforts could have effected.
A Ligurian soldier, having observed some snails creeping along the rocks, as he was filling his pitcher at a neighbouring fountain, took it in his head to climb up after them. The higher he went, the more snails he found in the cracks of the rock, which was moister on this side than any other. In the mean time, the attack was carrying on on the opposite side; and this encouraged the Ligurian to mount up to the very top of the rock. When he came to the foot of the wall, he found it quite deserted c on that side by the garison, who were all engaged in repulsing the aggressors on the other. Being therefore under no apprehension, his curiosity led him to get up upon the wall, which he did by the help of an old oak that grew close to it. When he had, from the wall, taken a view of the place, he slid down the rock, without being discovered, and returned to the camp. He did the same thing a second time, and particularly examined, whether it were possible to introduce a company of active and intrepid men into the place that way. In the mean time, Marius, discouraged by the ill success of his attempts, was in suspense, whether he should give over the enterprize and put an end to the campaign; but when the Ligurian acquainted him with his exploit, he conceived some hopes of making himself master of the place, and imme- d diately sent experienced officers to view the rock, and report their sentiments. Of these some thought the thing impracticable; but others, more bold and enterprising, declared, that, in their opinion, the attempt, if well conducted, might succeed. As the loss, at all adventures, could not be great, the opinion of the latter prevailed; and the Ligurian was put at the head of four centuries of chosen men, provided with hooks, cramping-irons, nails, and hammers. These filed off in the night, and lay in ambush near the fountain, till the attack was renewed the next day. Then, while the garison was engaged on the opposite side, with the help of their tools they got up, not without great labour, to the foot of the wall, which they easily mounted.
Marius had sent a company of trumpets with them, ordering them to sound the e alarm, as soon as they got on the ramparts; which they did accordingly, and with that unexpected noise so terrified the besieged, that they abandoned the attack on the other side, and by that means gave the legionaries an opportunity of advancing up the narrow path to the gate, which they broke down, and entering the fortress, joined their companions. Being thus masters of the place, they put both the garison and inhabitants to the sword without distinction, seized the king's treasures, and then went into winter-quarters, loaded with glory and bootyⁱ.

The character of Sylla.

Soon after the reduction of Mulucha, Lucius Cornelius Sylla landed at Utica, with a reinforcement for the consular army. He was by birth a patrician, and descended from one of the most illustrious families in Rome. He had something very engaging f in his conversation, was of a graceful aspect, a noble air, easy manners, affable, infinuating, and ever ready to oblige all, even at the expence of his own fortune, which was but very small; for his branch of the Cornelian family had been long eclipsed.
One of his ancestors, by name Publius Cornelius Rufinus, a senator of great reputation, having been degraded by the censors, for keeping in his house, contrary to law, ten pounds weight of silver in plate, his disgrace descended to his posterity, who continued long in obscurity, and were excluded from honours and public offices, as Plu-tarch informs us, to the sixth generation. Sylla, in his youth, fell in with the customs

ⁱ SALLUST. ibid. FRONT. Strat. l. iii. c. 9.

- a of the young patricians of his time, and gave himself intirely up to pleasures and debauchery, keeing company only with lewd women, stage-players, and buffoons ; in short, he was reckoned one of the most debauched and effeminate young men in Rome. A young courtesan, named Nicopolis, taken with his graceful person, supplied him plentifully with money, which was the fruit of her debaucheries ; and, as the young Roman proved constant to her, she left him great wealth at her death. Soon after his mother-in-law likewise died, and left him a plentiful estate. From that time, as he was fatiated with pleasures, he began to be tired with a private life, and, his wealth rousing his ambition, he demanded, and obtained the quæstorship, the same year that Marius was raised to the consulate. The people, whom he easily gained by
- b his gentle and obliging carriage, appointed him to serve under Marius, who was then ready to set out for Africa ; but that general, thinking, that a man of pleasure could never prove a good soldier, or that a body, enervated by vice and debauchery, could bear the fatigues of war, was highly displeased with the quæstor allotted him, and therefore left him behind in Italy, under pretence of raising a reinforcement of auxiliary troops among the allies, but in reality to get rid of a man, of whose conduct in war he had but a very mean opinion. The quæstor, tho' very sensible of the contempt shewn him, obeyed, and came not to the army till after the reduction of Mulucha, when the troops were ready to go into winter-quarters. The moment he arrived in Africa, he threw off the man of pleasure, was always ready to under-
- c take the most painful and laborious duties, contented himself with the food of the common soldiers, and, by affecting to imitate Marius, gained both his esteem and friendship : so that nothing now seemed wanting to the quæstor, but an opportunity to give proofs of his valour. It was the quæstor's province to supply the troops with provisions, and the necessary sums for carrying on the war ; but this office did not exempt him from partaking of the dangers, or prevent his commanding the troops. In an action the quæstor performed the office of the first lieutenant general of the army, immediately under the chief commander ; and in this office Sylla signalized himself, as we shall see in the course of this war, and carefully improved the opportunities that offered of recovering the time he had lost^k.
- d Marius, after the taking of Mulucha, retired towards the sea-coast, with a design to put his troops into winter-quarters in the maritime cities, that by this means they might be the more easily supplied with provisions. But in his retreat his army was surprized by the united forces of the two kings, who, coming unexpectedly upon them towards the close of the day, charged them with great fury. As the Romans were neither upon their guard, nor armed for fighting, nor drawn up in battalia, the legionaries, being hard pressed by the Mauritanian and Getulian cavalry, began to give ground. But, in the mean time, the Roman cavalry, arriving very seasonably, made head against the enemy, and sustained the shock of their cavalry, till the legionaries drew up, and put themselves in a posture of defence. Then a tumultuary
- e battle, or rather a great fray, ensued : none of the soldiers repaired to their colours ; but fought, as they could, horse and foot mixed together, without any rule or order. Both Marius and his quæstor distinguished themselves on this occasion in a very eminent manner ; the latter fell, like a lion, on a troop of barbarians, who had already surrounded one of the manipuli, and cut most of them in pieces ; the former seemed to be in all places at once, and, being attended by a body of choice troops, obliged the enemy to give way where-ever he appeared. When it began to grow dark, Marius retired by degrees to two neighbouring hills, and, having there rallied his troops, fortified in all haste that which was least steep, posting his men on the declivity of the two hills, and in the valley between them. At the foot of one of the hills was a
- f plentiful spring of fresh water, a great refreshment to troops fatigued with a long march and a warm battle. The two kings surrounded the hills, on which the Romans were posted, with numberless multitudes of Numidians, Mauritanians, and Getulians, who all looked on this action only as the beginning of a certain victory, which they should complete at the rising of the sun. Jugurtha did not doubt, but he should be able to extinguish the Roman name in Numidia ; and the African soldiers, looking upon the consular army as a certain prey, kindled great fires, danced round them with loud shouts, and passed the best part of the night in feastings and rejoicings. Marius, who saw, from the eminence on which he was incamped, all that passed, kept within his intrenchments, trenchments, till the enemy, tired with dancing and revelling, retired to their tents ^a

to refresh themselves with sleep, that they might be able to renew the attack at break of day with more vigor. He then drew out his legions in order of battle; and, placing all the trumpets in the first line, advanced in silence and good order towards the enemy. When he was within reach of them, the trumpets sounded the charge, and made so terrible a noise, that the barbarians, who were most of them asleep, had not in that surprise the courage to take up their arms, but fled, many of them half naked, in the utmost confusion. The Romans pursued the fugitives, and made a dreadful slaughter of the disarmed multitude. We are told, that Jugurtha and Bocchus lost more men in this surprise, than in any other action. Four days after this defeat, they again came up with the Roman army, hoping to find them once more ^b off their guard. But Marius, who was ready to receive them, made such a slaughter of the barbarians, that he had reason to believe the war near ended. The enemy's army, which had been just reinforced by a numerous body, under the command of Volux the son of Bocchus, and consisted of ninety thousand men, was almost intirely cut off. Jugurtha on this occasion gave uncommon proofs of his valour and conduct. At the head of his cavalry he broke through the first line of the Romans, and, shewing his bloody sword to the legionaries, cried out in the Latin tongue, which he had learnt at the siege of Numantia, Marius is dead. This sword is stained with his blood. Hereupon the second line of the Romans began to give ground, and the Numidians, animated by the example of their king, renewed the charge with more ^c fury than ever. But, in the mean time, Sylla, having routed the numberless forces of Bocchus and Volux, arrived very seasonably at the head of the cavalry, revived the courage of the legionaries, and falling upon the enemy's flank robbed them of a victory, which they thought certain. The Numidians, in spite of their utmost efforts, were forced to fly before Sylla, who, laying hold of all opportunities to efface the prejudices entertained of his effeminacy, performed wonders. The king himself, who retired with his Numidians, narrowly escaped falling into his hands. Thus Sylla displayed for the first time his courage and intrepidity greatly to his advantage. Marius had the honour of conducting the whole action with the prudence of a great commander, and Sylla that of executing the orders of his general with uncommon valour ^d.
THE labours of the campaign were succeeded by negotiations. Bocchus, who had been long inclined to peace, sent an embassy to the consul, desiring him to dispatch some persons to him, to whom he might safely communicate his thoughts. Hereupon Marius immediately appointed Sylla his quæstor and Manlius one of his lieutenants, to wait upon the king. In their first audience, Sylla endeavoured, not only to draw off Bocchus from Jugurtha, but to prevail upon him to deliver up the Numidian king alive into the consul's hands. But Bocchus, without taking any notice of what Sylla had said on that head, only begged leave to send an embassy, first to the consul, and then to Rome, to negotiate a peace and alliance with the Roman senate and people.
This the quæstor readily granted, and then set out with his colleague Manlius for Cirtba, ^e where Marius then was in winter quarters. They were soon followed by five embas-sadors, all men of great distinction, from the king of Mauritania; but, Marius being gone from Cirtba to surprise a castle at a great distance, which was said to be full of Roman deserters, the ambassadors proceeded to Utica, where Sylla commanded the main body of the army in the consul's absence. Sylla received them with the highest marks of honour; and, upon the return of the consul, who failed in his attempt upon the castle, their proposals were accepted, a truce was agreed on between the Romans and Mauritanians, and two of the ambassadors sent back to carry the news to the king, while the other three imbarqued for Italy, with the second quæstor Cneius Octavius, who was lately come from Rome, with large sums for the payment of the troops and other ^f expences of the war. When they arrived at Rome, they found C. Attilius Serranus and Q. Servilius Cæpio in the consulate. The latter had Narbonne Gaul, and the former Italy, for his province. Marius was continued in the command of the army in Africa in quality of proconsul, and Sylla confirmed in his office with the title of proquæstor. The senate, when they had heard from the ambassadors the request of their master, returned them the following answer: The senate and people of Rome are not easily reconciled to those who have dared, without any provocation, to bear arms against them. Nevertheless, the repentance of Bocchus disarms us. Let him enjoy the truce with

a which Marius has favoured him, and the peace which we now grant him. But as to an alliance with Rome, it is incumbent on him first to deserve it by some important services. By this Bocchus well knew was meant his delivering up Jugurtha, and being resolved to comply with the desire of the senate, he intreated Marius to send Sylla to him, in order to facilitate the execution of his design. Sylla, ready to run all hazards in the negotiating of an affair, which would put an end to the war at once, willingly accepted of the office. Jugurtha, in the mean time, though in want of every thing, still supported himself by his courage. When he heard of the treaty which the Mauritanian had just concluded with Rome, he sent one Aspar, a faithful and able minister, to Bocchus, not doubting, but he should be able, by well-conducted negotiations and by the mediation of his son-in-law, to get himself included in the treaty, and save both his person and part of his dominions. As Aspar arrived at the Mauritanian court before Sylla, he insinuated himself so much into the king's affections, that he had very like to have gained him over entirely to his master's interest. A Numidian prince, named Dabar, grandson to Masinissa by a concubine and greatly attached to the Romans, being then at the court of the Mauritanian, employed all his interest in favour of the republic, and with much ado kept Bocchus wavering between Rome and Jugurtha.

Sylla was already upon the road to Mauritania, with a pretty numerous guard of cavalry, light-armed infantry, archers, slingers, and a whole cohort of Peligni. After five days march he was met by Volux, the son of Bocchus, at the head of a thousand chosen men. The pro-quæstor received the king's son with all the politeness and address that was natural to him, and marched with him the first day without the least appearance of distrust. When the sun was down, they incamped together; and then Volux, entering in great haste the Roman commander's pavilion, told him, that he was informed by his scouts, that Jugurtha was near with a body of troops far superior to theirs when joined together. This, with the advice the Mauritanian gave Sylla, made the Roman suspect both him and his father of treachery. Let us fly, said the young prince, and leave our camp and men to the mercy of the enemy. I will take upon me to conduct you to a place of safety in the dark. The brave pro-quæstor, shocked at this proposal, replied resolutely, Shall I fly before an enemy who has been so often vanquished? Shall I be coward enough to abandon my men without a leader? I know the valor of my troops; and either they shall conquer with me, or I perish with them. However, Volux prevailed on Sylla to decamp immediately, and pursue his march in silence. But Jugurtha, being informed of what had happened, got before them, and posted himself on the road through which the Romans were to pass. When the Romans, after having marched all night, observed early next morning Jugurtha's army incamped about two miles from them, they cried out, We are betrayed; Volux has sold us to Jugurtha; let us kill the traitor. But Sylla, putting on an air of security, encouraged his men to behave like Romans; and then taking Volux aside, I am fully convinced, said he, that you have betrayed us; but that I may not be as wicked as yourself, I will save your life. Be gone from the camp this minute, and join the army which Jugurtha has brought against us. The Mauritanian, astonished, in appearance, at these words, replied, I cannot think Jugurtha so imprudent, as to insult an ambassador who is under the protection of the son of the only friend he has in the world. His only aim in stopping the way into Mauritania is, to make a merit with the republic of giving Sylla a free passage through the midst of his troops. You will see him embrace with pleasure the opportunity that now offers of making his court to you. Let us go together, without any troops; he will let us pass unmolested. Sylla thought this a dangerous experiment; but nevertheless resolved to run the hazard of it; and accordingly, followed only by his attendants as ambassador, he passed through Jugurtha's army without molestation. The Numidian, by thus suffering Sylla to pass unmolested, hoped to gain his friendship, and by that means be included in the peace. But be that as it will, Sylla from this extraordinary piece of good fortune was ever after called The Fortunate. After he had thus happily escaped the hands of Jugurtha, he proceeded with Volux to the court of Bocchus, where he was received in the most respectful manner. The king, who was still wavering between Rome and Numidia, gave audience to Sylla, and Aspar the king of Numidia's agent, at the same time. The former delivered his message with all the pride of a Roman, in these words; I only come to know whether you will have war or peace. Take your choice, that I may be gone. This stopped the mouth of the Numidian ambassador; and Bocchus made only this short reply; I am not yet determined. I will take ten days to consider of it, and then declare my resolution. Bocchus was inclined to favour Jugurtha; a but, on the other hand, he dreaded the power of the Romans; and therefore made it his business to deceive both ambassadors. However, he seemed to pay most deference to Sylla, with whom he had, the night following, a private conference in his own apartment; when he declared, that his arms, auxiliaries, money, and in short the whole power of his kingdom were intirely at the disposal of the senate and people of Rome. I give up, said he, Jugurtha to your resentments, and am determined to lend no further assistance to a prince who has incurred your displeasure. What more can you desire? Sylla, on the other hand, justified the proceedings of Rome against Jugurtha, magnified the favour shewn to the Mauritanian by the peace, and then, with regard to the most material part of his commission, went on thus: The most powerful kings cannot obtain b an alliance with Rome, but by some very extraordinary piece of service. Seize then the opportunity which fortune offers you. It is now in your power to seize and deliver up Jugurtha to us. Your sacrificing that perfidious usurper will procure you the friendship of our republic, and establish you on the throne of your ancestors for ever. Nor is this all: the best part of Numidia will be the reward of your bringing to punishment a wicked, ungrateful, and treacherous wretch, whose hands are yet stained with the innocent blood of his brothers. Assist Rome then in executing the vengeance of the gods; deliver up Jugurtha into my hands before my departure, and depend on the perpetual protection and friendship of the Romans. Bocchus, pretending to be surpris'd at the proposal, cried out, What! betray a father-in-law, a neighbouring king, a friend, an ally! What will all Africa think c of such a black treachery? But Sylla, who was very eloquent, by pressing and urging in the strongest terms, that nothing else could procure him the friendship of Rome, obtained at length an express promise from him to deliver up the king of Numidia into his hands. The expedient they agreed on to insnare him was, to give him some hopes of being included in the treaty of peace with Rome, and by that bait draw him to the court of the Mauritanian king. Accordingly, the next morning Bocchus sent for Aspar, and, with an unusual air of gaiety, told him, that the Roman ambassador seemed inclined to include his master in the treaty of peace. Inform him therefore, said he, that the critical time for putting an end to so destructive a war is come, and advise d him to hasten hither, and finish the negotiation in person. With this good news Aspar immediately set out for Jugurtha's camp, and in eight days returned to Bocchus's court with this answer; that his master was very desirous of putting an end to so troublesome a war; but that, as the senate often disannulled the treaties concluded with their consuls, no wise man would enter into negotiations with them, unless he had some security for the performance of the articles; that in the present case he saw nothing that could secure to him the peace which Marius was negotiating, except the delivering up of the proconsul's ambassador into his hands; that if he were detained, this would be a powerful motive for the senate to confirm a treaty, which they could not break but by sacrificing so illustrious a patrician. The Mauritanian was so struck with this proposal, that he immediately came into it; so that he had now basely engaged to e deliver up the Roman to the Numidian, and the Numidian to the Roman. As he had solemnly given his word to both ambassadors, they both equally expressed their satisfaction. There was no distrust or jealousy between them; each depended on the promise made him, and looked on his rival as insnared and sacrificed by the treacherous king. As for Bocchus himself, he still continued wavering; his heart was with Jugurtha; but his interest inclined him to favour Sylla. In short, he did not determine which of the two he should betray to the other, till the very night before the appointed conference between himself, Sylla, and Jugurtha. For the latter, depending upon the promise of his son-in-law, had left his army, and was already incamped with a small body of chosen troops within reach of the court. When Bocchus f received advice of the approach of Jugurtha, he fell into greater perplexity than ever; he could not prevail upon himself to betray Jugurtha, his relation, his friend, and his ally; and, on the other hand, he was afraid to seize Sylla, and by that piece of treachery draw upon himself and his posterity the vengeance of the powerful republic. He passed the night in great anxiety, and was observed to walk to and fro in his apartment with unusual agitations of body; to change colour often, and to fall into deep reflections. After having spent some hours in private, he at length came to a final determination; and having sent for Sylla, entered into measures with him for drawing Jugurtha into the snare. A very high hill was appointed for the place of the conference; and thither Bocchus, by the advice of Sylla, sent some troops before day-

- a day-break, with orders to conceal themselves among the neighbouring rocks, and invest the hill as soon as Jugurtha should appear upon it. This done, Bocchus and Sylla, upon advice that the king of Numidia was drawing near, set out together to meet him. After the first civilities, the two kings and the Roman ambassador proceeded towards the hill. Jugurtha was so fully persuaded, that his father-in-law was going to deliver the illustrious Roman into his hands, that he took no other guard with him but some few friends. As soon as they arrived at the top of the hill, the Mauritanians came out of their ambush; but this sight did not in the least affect the king of Numidia, though naturally very suspicious. He believed they were coming to seize Sylla, and therefore expressed great joy in seeing himself, as he imagined, at length b b sure of his prey. Nor was he undeceived, till the detachment, falling upon his attendants, cut them in pieces, and then surrounded and seized him. He scarce believed his own eyes, till he was delivered into the Roman ambassador's hands, who loaded him with chains, and set out with him, under a strong guard, for Cirta, which Marius had chosen for the usual place of his residence. When Sylla entered that city with the captive king, the Roman army received him with loud shouts, and such demonstrations of joy and marks of esteem, as cannot easily be described. They looked upon him as the chief conqueror of Numidia; and this raised the envy of his general, who could not help shewing his displeasure at the praises, which the soldiers so liberally bestowed on the pro-quæstor. He burnt with envy in seeing his subaltern thus honoured by the soldiery, and in a manner preferred to himself. And indeed c c it was but just, that Marius should have the mortification of seeing the glory of the campaign divided between a subaltern and himself. He had supplanted his predecessor for Metellus by secret artifices and public calumnies; and providence now raised up one to avenge his quarrel. From this small beginning the famous wars between Marius and Sylla took their rise, and did not end, as their mutual jealousy daily increased, but with the destruction of the republic^m. Never was there more universal joy in Rome, than at the sight of the illustrious captive whom Marius had sent them from Africa. By the taking of Jugurtha the war in Numidia was at an end, and that great kingdom intirely reduced. As for the captive king, he was kept in close confinement, to grace the triumph of the proconsul, when he should return from Africa. d d DURING these transactions in Numidia, the consul Q. Servilius Cæpio, to whose lot Transalpine Gaul had fallen, as we have observed above, recovered the city of Tolosa, now Toulouse, the capital of the Tectosages, from the Cimbri; but stained the glory, which this conquest deserved, by his avarice and rapines. For he gave the city up to be plundered by his soldiers, though the inhabitants themselves had delivered it up into his hands, and robbed the temples of those immense sums which the Tectosages were said to have brought thither, after having plundered the famous temple of Delphos. Those writers among the ancients, who are the most modest in their computations, make the sum, which Cæpio found in the temple of Apollo in Toulouse, amount to a hundred thousand pounds weight of gold, and as many of silver. Some e e writers tell us, that the Tectosages brought from Delphos a hundred and twenty thousand pounds weight of gold and five millions of pounds weight of silver, which they lodged in their temple of Apollo. But Strabo, Pausanias, and Polybius, assure us, that not one of those Gauls, who were concerned in the plundering of the temple of Delphos, returned home, both gods and men having in a manner combined to extirpate that sacrilegious race. The immense treasures therefore, with which the temples of the Tectosages were enriched, could not have been brought from Delphos; but were most likely, according to Strabo and Pausanias, dug out of the silver and gold mines, with which the country of the Tectosages formerly abounded. But from what part soever f f these treasures were brought, it is very certain, that they were immensely great, and that the general and his troops enriched themselves by the sacrilege, without suffering the republic to reap any advantage by it. The consul pretended to set apart a considerable share for the public treasury, and sent it away under a small guard to Marseilles; but at the same time he placed a numerous body on the road, who seized it, and privately conveyed it to him. However, as he had retaken Toulouse from the Cimbri, he was continued in the government of Narbonne Gaul with the title of proconsulⁿ. During the present consulate, two great men were born, who will furnish

how divided.

THE following year, P. Rutilius Rufus and Cn. Mallius Maximus were advanced to the consulate; the former a patrician of known abilities and unspotted reputation; the latter a man of no birth or talents. Nevertheless it fell to the lot of Mallius to carry on the war with the Cimbri in Transalpine Gaul, at the head of a new army, while his colleague continued inactive in Italy. As for Marius, he was continued proconsul in Numidia, where he divided the dominions of the deprived king in the following manner: That part which lay next to Mauritania, and was known by the name of Masfelia, was assigned to Bocchus, and from this time took the name of New Mauritania. Numidia, properly so called, was divided into three parts; one was given to Hiempsal, another to Mondrestal, who were, without all doubt, the next heirs to Masiniissa; and the third, which lay next to the Roman province, the republic reserved for herself, and subjected it to the prætor, whom she annually sent to govern the African province.

Cæpio and
rel.

IT the mean time, the consul Mallius hastened into Gaul to assist the proconsul Cæpio, who was not strong enough to stop the inundation of the Gauls, who were marching from all parts to join the Cimbri, with a design to cross the Alps and invade Italy. The Ambrones the Tigurini, the Tugenés, the Urbigines, and in short all the nations that inhabited the country now known by the name of Suizzerland, were in motion to join the Northern Gauls, who had already made themselves masters of almost all the country between Narbonne and the Pyrenees. Mallius soon after his arrival quarrelled with Cæpio. Perhaps the latter, who was far superior to the consul with regard to birth and knowledge in military affairs, did not pay him the respect which was due to his character. However that be, it is certain, that their disputes were carried to such a height, that the officers of the two armies, finding they could not by any means agree, advised them to separate: A fatal advice, which brought the republic into greater danger, than had ever threatened her since the foundation of the city. The barbarians no sooner saw the Roman forces divided, than they fell upon a strong detachment of the consular army, which was commanded by M. Aurelius Scaurus, a lieutenant-general of great distinction, who had been consul three years before, cut them all to a man in pieces, and made Scaurus himself prisoner. Mallius, greatly intimidated at this defeat, thought proper to call Cæpio to his assistance. But the proconsul answered in a haughty manner, We have each our province; let the consul take care of himself. However, he afterwards drew nearer the consular army, fearing the consul might conquer the Gauls without his assistance, and by that means have all the glory of the campaign. To prevent this, he incamped in the way where the Cimbri must pass to fall on the consular army, hoping, that he should be able to withstand the enemy with his own troops, and thereby deprive his rival of the opportunity of sharing the honour of the victory. As for the Cimbri, when they saw the two generals draw near each other, they concluded, that they had made up their differences, and were in perfect union and friendship. They therefore sent deputies to the consul to propose a peace. As these deputies could not help passing through Cæpio's army, he ordered them to be brought before him; and finding that they were empowered to treat only with Mallius, he treated them like spies, and would have put them to death, had not both the legionaries and officers of his army restrained his fury, and even forced him to go to the consul's camp, and confer with him about the proposals which the enemy had sent to the republic. But, as he went to the consul's tent against his will, he opposed him in all things, contradicted him with great obstinacy and rudeness, and insulted him in the grossest manner. This increased the hatred between the two commanders; and the Gauls and Cimbri, being informed by their deputies of the misunderstanding between the generals, laid hold of this opportunity to give battle. The Gauls attacked Mallius's camp, and the Cimbri Cæpio's. The slaughter they made was exceeding great. Four score thousand men, Romans and allies, with the two sons of the consul, and forty thousand servants and sutlers, perished on this fatal day. Of the two Roman armies only ten men escaped, with the two generals to carry the news of so dreadful a defeat to Rome. Among these was the famous Sertorius, who, being yet very young, was making his first campaign under Cæpio. As he served in the cavalry and was well mounted, he saved himself by swimming cross the Rhone. The conquerors destroyed all the spoils they took, pursuant to a a vow they had made before the battle. The gold and silver they threw into the Rhone, drowned the horses they had taken; and put to death all the prisoners. Thus they revenged, without avarice, the injuries done to Apollo; whose temple the sacrilegious and covetous Romans had plundered^p.

THE news of this misfortune filled Rome with fear and consternation. At the same time advice came from Spain, that a prætorian army had been cut in pieces there by the Lusitanians. As both these melancholy accounts arrived on the eve of the nones of October, the senate ordered, that this should for ever be reckoned among the unlucky days. In this general consternation, all the shops in the city were shut up; and the citizens, laying aside the toga, put on the military habit. They saw themselves threatened with a new deluge of Cimbri and Gauls, numerous enough to over-run the whole country. Two consular armies, which were their chief dependence, were utterly destroyed, and Rome in so imminent a danger left quite defenceless. The people, highly incensed against Cæpio, issued a decree, deposing him, and declaring him incapable of any command in the Roman armies for the future. As no Roman general, how faulty soever, had suffered so great a disgrace since the beginning of the republic, the decree of the people did not pass without opposition. The nobility and senate exclaimed against it as a novelty, and a blow which affected the whole body of the patricians, and raised such disturbances in the comitia, that C. Junius Norbanus, tribune of the people, was forced to drive the patricians by force out of the assembly. In the fray which happened on this occasion, M. Æmilius Scaurus, prince of the senate, was wounded on the head with a stone. The nobility being driven out of the assembly with two of the tribunes, L. Cotta and C. Didius, who protested against the law their colleagues had proposed, the sacrilegious Cæpio was deposed (I)^q. Upon his deposition the whole government of the republic for the rest of the year fell to P. Rutilius Rufus, who, being impowered to guard Rome against the misfortunes that threatened her, raised a new army with incredible expedition, no citizen, who was of age to bear arms, being exempted. The consul would not dispense even with his own son, whom, though scarce seventeen, he obliged to serve as a common soldier in one of the legions. Rutilius on this occasion first introduced fencing masters into the Roman camp, whose business it was to teach the young soldiers how to handle their arms, attack the enemy, and defend themselves. By this means the consul, who was a skilful commander, prepared for his successor an invincible army^r.

IN the mean time, the Cimbri and Gauls held a council of war, in which some were for passing the Alps, descending into the plains of Insubria, and advancing towards Rome. Others thought it more adviseable to reduce first the new Roman province. But before they came to any resolution, they thought it proper to bring into the council their prisoner Aurelius Scaurus, and ask his opinion of their descent into Italy. The Roman with great constancy and intrepidity told them, that they were not to expect from him any advice, which could be prejudicial to his country, but that he would give them such as might be useful for themselves. He then advised them to lay aside all thoughts of passing into Italy, where they would meet with the same misfortunes which had formerly befallen Pyrrhus and Hannibal: Enjoy, said he, the glory fortune has given you in your first battle. You have gained a victory by the disagreement of two bad commanders; but when you come to engage the forces of the

(I) Cæpio, according to some authors, was condemned to banishment; according to others, he died in prison. His body, if we believe Valerius Maximus (4), was cut in pieces by the public executioner, and exposed to the view of all the Roman people. He had been honoured with a triumph, with the dignity of pontifex maximus, and the title of Protector of the senate. But notwithstanding his former honours and deserts, he was treated like a common criminal on account of his having been the chief cause of the defeat of the Romans by the Cimbri and Teutones. Some writers even tell us, that his body was dragged to the Scalæ Gemoniæ, and there barbarously abused by the incensed multitude. But Cicero says in express words (5), that Servilius Cæpio, being banished Rome, retired to Smyrna; whence some writers, in order to reconcile the ancients, have imagined; that he was by the interest of his family and friends recalled from banishment; but that the tribunes, having revived the old accusations against him, prevailed on the people to sentence him to death for having sacrificed the interests of his country to his avarice and ambition.

the republic under the conduct of an experienced general, you will find them invin- a cible. Scaurus had scarce done speaking, when Bojorix, one of the kings or leaders of the Cimbri, thinking this too insolent a speech from the mouth of a captive, drew his sword and stabbed him. In the mean time, the republic chose new consuls, and raised to that dignity C. Fulvius Fimbria and C. Marius a second time. Two laws were urged against the promotion of the latter, one forbidding the choice of any absent person, the other enacting, that no one should be raised to the consulate a second time, till ten years after the first. But the people made the laws give way to the public good. This news was a very agreeable surprise to Marius, who was busy in regulating his conquests in Africa, and thought of nothing less than his new promotion. He b left Numidia without delay, and, returning to Rome about the end of December, on the first day of January both entered on his office and triumphed on account of his Numidian conquest. His triumphal chariot was preceded by the riches which he had brought from his province, consisting of three thousand seven hundred pounds weight of gold in ingots, 5775 pounds weight of silver in bars, and 287000 drachmæ, or silver denarii, in specie. But nothing struck the spectators so much as the sight of the captive king, who with his two sons was led in chains before the conqueror's chariot.
After he had been made a shew to the insulting populace, he was used with the utmost insolence by the soldiery after the procession. They tore his ears in a barbarous manner in snatching away his pendants, with which insult the unhappy prince was deeply affected. After he had been abused in the grossest manner by the rabble, he c was thrown into a dungeon, in which he soon perished. Livy, Eutropius, and Oro- sius tell us, that, as soon as the ceremony of the triumph was over, he was carried back to prison, and there strangled. His two sons survived him, and spent their lives in captivity at Venusium ^s.

As soon as the victor came down from his chariot, he went to the senate-house in his triumphal robes, either by mistake, or out of affectation. But, as the thing was new and the senators expressed their resentments by their looks, he went out immediately, pulled off his triumphal robes, and returned in a prætecta, the usual dress of consuls. The people had already decreed, that Marius should manage the war d beyond the Alps, and that Sylla should serve under him as his lieutenant-general. As for Fimbria, he was ordered to continue in Italy, to oppose the barbarians, in case they should cross the mountains. All that remained was to divide the two armies now on foot between the consuls. Marius had his choice, and he readily preferred the new legions, which Rutilius had instructed, to the old troops which he had brought from Africa. So many honours heaped on a plebeian were a great mortification to the patricians, and encouraged four of the tribunes to make attempts in favour of the people, and greatly to the disadvantage of the senate and nobility. Domitius Abe- nobarbus, the great grandfather of the emperor Nero, Cassius Longinus, Servilius Glaucia, and Marcus Philippus, all proposed new laws, tending to the diminution of e the power of the senate, and the three former succeeded. The first transferred the power of electing the pontifices from their own college to the people. The second got it enacted, that every citizen, degraded by a plebiscitum, should for ever be deprived of his seat in the senate. This took away from the senators the power of reinstating those in their honours, whom the people had disgraced. The third prevailed on the people to pass a law, in virtue of which, the allies of Latium, who should accuse a senator, and prove their charge, were to enjoy all the privileges of Roman citizens. As for the tribune Marcus Philippus, he attempted to revive the law of Tiberius Gracchus concerning the distribution of the lands; but this was thought a seditious attempt, and therefore not seconded by the generality of the people ^t.

In the mean time, Marius set out for Transalpine Gaul, but finding that the enemy, f after the defeat of Cæpio and Mallius, had, instead of passing the Alps, marched into Spain, being drawn thither by the hopes of booty, he applied himself wholly to the perfecting of his troops in discipline against their return. He taught his troops frugality by his example, and by the severity that appeared in his whole deportment.
There was a wildness and fierceness in his looks not to be described. The very tone of his voice was so rough and harsh, that whenever he gave orders, he made those who received them tremble. This kept his men in exact obedience and subjection.
In order to inure them to the dangers of battles, he sent most of the young soldiers under a under the command of Sylla to make war on all the enemies of the republic, who were dispersed from Narbonne to the Pyrenees. Sylla on this occasion maintained the reputation he had acquired in Numidia, defeated in several battles the Tectosages, and took one of their kings, named Copillus, prisoner of war. Notwithstanding these advantages, Marius, not thinking the troops he had brought from Italy sufficient to withstand the numberless multitudes of Cimbri, Teutones, and Gauls, who would fall upon him on their return from Spain, sent for succours to the most remote parts of the east. Nicomedes, king of Bitbynia, to whom, among others, his deputies applied, answered, That his dominions were quite exhausted of men by the vast numbers of his subjects, who had been carried away and kept in slavery by the Roman knights, who

b farmed the revenues of the republic in the Levant. The senate had regard to this just complaint, and passed a decree, ordering all men of free condition, brought from the country of any ally, to be set at liberty. But this decree, however just, gave rise to a new war, of which Marius was the innocent occasion.

The occasion of the war with the slaves.

UPON the first news of this decree, the unhappy slaves, without waiting for further orders, broke their chains and set themselves at liberty. The first commotion was raised at Nuceria, a city of Campania on the banks of the Sarnus; but the tumult was there soon suppressed. A more violent storm was raised at Capua by a young Roman knight, named Vettius. After he had squandered away his fortune in debauchery, he fell violently in love with a beautiful slave, whom he bought upon credit

c for seven Attic talents. But when the time came, that he was either to pay the price agreed on, or return the slave to her former master, to avoid both, he made an insurrection among the slaves, who cultivated the lands of the public in his district, making use of the decree of the senate to seduce those unhappy wretches. He soon drew together four hundred of them, and his first exploit was to murder those who had pressed him to pay for his mistress. He then led his small company to the neighbouring villages and farms, which he put under contribution, being every-where joined by the slaves whom he set at liberty. When he had assembled about seven hundred of them, he posted himself in an advantageous situation, got himself proclaimed king by his followers, who in a short time amounted to three thousand five hundred, and

d fortified himself in his post, which he made an asylum for all fugitive slaves. The senate, upon the first news of this insurrection, dispatched Lucius Lucullus the prætor against him, who, taking four thousand six hundred regular troops with him, attacked Vettius, but was repulsed with great loss. The prætor, finding he could not prevail by force, had recourse to artifice, gained over one Apollonius, who was general under Vettius, and by his means made himself master of the place, which the rebels had fortified. But Vettius, seeing himself betrayed, escaped the punishment due to his crime, by laying violent hands on himself. But this was only a prelude to a more

e important war in Sicily, which was at this time governed by a prætor, named Licinius Nerva, a weak and timorous man. He at first obeyed the decree of the senate, set at liberty four hundred of those unfortunate men, and ordered all, who had any remonstrances to make concerning their slavery, to repair to him at Syracuse. The number of these poor wretches was much greater than he imagined. He found, that the publicans had, under various pretences, reduced many thousand freemen to slavery, especially in the east, and sent them into Sicily to cultivate the lands which they farmed of the public. The prætor, quite surprised at such villainous proceedings, resolved to set all those at liberty who were of free condition, pursuant to the decree of the senate. This alarmed the publicans, who thereupon had recourse to the prætor, and by rich presents prevailed upon him to suspend the execution of the decree, and to turn his compassion into cruelty. Being corrupted by the Roman knights, he began to f look upon this multitude of people, who had been carried away by force from their respective countries, only as a troublesome mob, and sent them back to their masters. But they, instead of returning home, retired to a sacred grove, and there took a resolution of recovering by force the liberty which had been unjustly refused them. They then seized a castle in the neighbourhood, and laid the adjacent country under contribution. The prætor marched against them; but, being too weak to attack them, he prevailed on one of their leaders, named Caius Titinius, to deliver up the castle to him, which he entered in the night. The slaves, though thus surprised, made a vigorous resistance, and perished all to a man, either by the swords of the Romans, or by throwing themselves down from the top of the walls. Licinius having suppressed this first commotion, instead of keeping the field, disbanded his troops, which gave the slaves an opportunity of rising again. They assembled in a few days to the number of six thousand, and, thinking it dangerous for so great a multitude to continue together without a head, they chose one Salvius, a flute-player, for their general, and gave him the title of king. Salvius immediately divided his people into three parties, which he sent out under three leaders to pillage the country, and bring all the slaves they could find to his camp. These expeditions succeeded beyond his expectation ; for his parties brought him so many men and horses, that he was soon in a condition to form a numerous army, consisting of twenty thousand foot and two thousand horse. He then laid siege to Morgantia, a strong city on the banks of the Simæthus. But while Salvius's troops were engaged before that place, the prætor Licinius, with an army of ten thousand men, partly Italians and partly Sicilians, surprised their camp, which he found almost deserted, and seized the booty which they had brought from the neighbouring farms and villages. From thence the prætor before day-break advanced to the besieged city, and attacking the enemy in the dark, slew great numbers of them and dispersed the rest. But before sun-rising, the new king, having rallied his troops, returned the surprise upon the Romans, who, thinking themselves victorious, were no ways upon their guard, attacked them with great vigor, and having defeated the prætor in his turn, killed six hundred of his men, and took four thousand of them prisoners ^a.

THIS victory encouraged Salvius to renew the siege of Morgantia with more vigor than ever. The slaves of the place, upon their masters promising them their liberty, if they repulsed or tired out the aggressors, performed exploits which could hardly be expected from men of their condition ; inasmuch, that Salvius was at length obliged to raise the siege. But the Morgantines, at the instigation of the base prætor, refused to grant the deliverers of their country the liberty they had promised them ; which so incensed these brave men, that they abandoned their masters, whom they had defended with so much gallantry, and went over to the enemy. Thus the evil daily increased, and the contagion spread through all parts of Sicily. A slave, born in Cilicia, and named Athenio, made a fresh insurrection among his fellows in the neighbourhood of Egesta and Lilybæum, and, having killed his master, put himself at the head of the two hundred slaves he had in his service ; and, his party being soon increased to the number of ten thousand, he had the confidence to lay siege to Lilybæum, at that time by far the strongest place in the island. After he had spent much time in this fruitless attempt, he pretended to be advised by the gods to abandon the enterprise, crying out, as in a sudden transport, Let us, my friends, be gone this instant from a place where a melancholy fate is preparing for us. If we persist in this attempt, we shall be undone. Let us then make our advantage of the knowledge that is given me from heaven. While his army was decamping, a fleet arrived from Mauritania, sent by Bocchus to the assistance of the Romans, under the command of one Gomon, who, entering the port of Lilybæum, landed his troops, and fell upon the rear of Athenio's army. The head of the rebels had, without all doubt, been informed of the approach of this fleet ; but his soldiers looked upon him ever after as a man highly favoured by the gods. On the other hand, Salvius, finding his army to be thirty thousand strong, resolved to make Triocala the capital of his new dominions, and accordingly built a citadel there on the ruins of an old demolished castle, raised himself a fine palace, surrounded the place with a wide ditch, and even settled a kind of polity in his city, choosing himself a council, consisting of his friends and the most prudent of his subjects. When he had settled all things in his new colony, he invited Athenio to come and partake of the pleasures of the place, and to deliberate about the proper measures for promoting their common interest. Athenio accepted of the invitation, and came attended with only three thousand of his men. But he no sooner entered Triocala, than Salvius caused him to be seized, and clapped up in his new castle. Such were the beginnings of this war, which cost the Romans a great deal of blood ^b. But to return to Marius.

WHILE he was waiting for the return of the Cimbri to Narbonne Gaul, he kept an exact discipline in his camp, and punished vice with the utmost severity. From the following instance we may judge of the abhorrence he had for the most infamous of all debaucheries, which licentiousness too often introduced into the Roman armies. His nephew Caius Lucius, having made a scandalous attempt upon a young soldier,

- a by name Trebonius, was killed by him. As he was a military tribune, his death made a great noise. But the consul, though much affected with the death of his nephew, not only acquitted Trebonius, whom some vile flatterers warmly accused; but rewarded him for his courage, putting with his own hand one of those crowns on his head; which generals only bestowed on soldiers who had signalized themselves by some valiant action. The applauses the army gave Marius on this occasion soon reached Rome, and greatly contributed towards continuing him in the consulate, and in the command of the army in Transalpine Gaul. Though absent, he was, without opposition, proclaimed consul a third time. Even his most inveterate enemies, Crassus Metellus and Marcus Scaurus, approved of his election; sacrificing their private sentiments to the public welfare. The colleague the republic gave Marius was L. Aurelius Orestes, who continued some time at Rome, where he was employed in trying T. Albucius, prætor of Sardinia, whom the people condemned to banishment, for vainly decreeing himself a triumph in his province, without the consent either of the senate or people, though he had done nothing that deserved it. During these transactions at Rome, Marcus Fulvius, the prætor in Spain, gained great reputation by his conduct against the Cimbri. Though he had but one legion under his command, he found means to harass those barbarians in such a manner, as made them leave Spain and return to Gaul. But, before their arrival, a swarm of Marsi appeared there, with a design to join the Teutones, and enter Italy with them. The Marsi were natives of Germany, and inhabited the banks of the Lupia, or, as Strabo calls it, the Luppia. This river rises at Lipsprink, a village of Westphalia, and falls into the Rhine after having watered the dutchy of Cleves. Marius detached Sylla to oppose this new inundation of barbarians; and he chose rather to make use of persuasion than force; he desired a conference with their leaders, in which he prevailed upon them to change their resolution, and come over to the Romans. From this time we find no farther mention made of Sylla in the army of Marius, but in that of the colleague the republic gave him the next year. Perhaps Marius was glad to get rid of a subaltern, who began to eclipse the glory of his general. Towards the end of the present year, the consul Aurelius Orestes died in his camp, at the foot of the Alps on the side of Italy; so that the republic was obliged to recal Marius to preside at the new elections. He left the command of his army to Manius Aquilius, and returned with joy to Rome, where he acted a part very suitable to his ambition. The point he had in view was, to get himself nominated consul for the next year. But this was a tender point, and might give offence to the people, it being a thing unheard-of, that the same person should so often be chosen consul successively. He therefore publicly declared, that he would not even suffer his name to be entered among those of the candidates. But, at the same time, Lucius Apuleius Saturninus, one of the tribunes and his creature, being in the secret with him, acted a very different part. He in all his harangues exhorted the people to force Marius to accept of the consulate. But the more pressing the people were with him, the more determined he pretended to be not to comply with their request. The tribune in one of his speeches even called him knave and traitor, for resisting the will of the people, and refusing to serve his country when threatened with great danger. In short, the game was so artfully played, that the people nominated Marius consul the fourth time, and forced him, much against his will, as they imagined, to accept of the dignity. The nobility indeed laughed at his sham modesty; and saw through the disguise; but thought his assistance necessary, at a time when the state was in the utmost danger; and therefore did not oppose his election. The colleague given him was Q. Lutatius Catulus (K), a man greatly esteemed both by the senate and people.

(K) Cicero, in different places of his works, gives us the character of Quintus Lutatius Catulus. His good nature, says he, and his polite behaviour prejudiced all men in his favour. His eloquence, his agreeable manner of speaking, and the purity of his expressions gained him the hearts of his hearers. He was an orator, an historian, and a poet. He wrote historical memoirs of his consulate after the manner of Xenophon, whom he took for his model. He employed his leisure hours in poetical performances; but, according to Ovid and Pliny the younger, the levity of his muse did not become the gravity of his character. Aulus Gellius has preserved one of his epigrams on a child named Theotimus, which he produces as a master-piece of elegance and politeness (5). Cicero quotes another wrote by Catulus on young Roscius (6), whose beauty he greatly extols, though the youth squinted, as Cicero observes. Tho' Catulus was much beloved by the people, and highly esteemed by all ranks of men, yet he had the mortification to be twice disappointed of the consulate, and to see men of no merit preferred to him (7).

ALL Gaul was in motion, and the season and approach of the enemy made the consuls hasten to their posts. The two consuls set out from Rome at the same time, leaving the city in great consternation, on account of the new troubles both abroad and at home. Abroad, the Thracians had raised great disturbances in Macedon ever since the last year. The rebellious slaves laid waste Sicily, and reduced Rome to great streights for want of corn. The Cilician pirates infested the Mediterranean, and contributed as much to the famine which afflicted Rome, as the devastations in Sicily. Against the pirates was sent a man, who seemed most nearly concerned to destroy them, viz. the famous orator M. Antonius, whose daughter they had carried into captivity. He soon cleared the seas of those robbers, and on that account was honoured with a triumph^a. At home, new disturbances were raised by Lucius Apuleius Saturninus, who endeavoured to promote one Lucius Equitius Firmanus to the tribunate. He was a freed-man, and his parents, nay even his tribe, were utterly unknown. But Apuleius knew him to be a bold, active, and intriguing man, an inveterate enemy to the nobility, and therefore a proper tool to be employed against the patricians. As the seditious tribune was well apprised, that the birth of Equitius would be the greatest obstacle to his advancement, he made him take the name of Gracchus, and presented him to the people as the son of Tiberius Gracchus. But Q. Cæcilius Metellus, surnamed Numidicus, being at this time one of the censors, discovered the cheat, and refused even to inroll Equitius among the Roman citizens. His refusal had like to have cost him dear; for he very narrowly escaped being stoned by the populace, at the instigation of Apuleius.

IN the mean time, Marius was waiting for the Cimbri in Transalpine Gaul. But they appeared there no more, having in a great council of war resolved to enter Italy by two different ways, the Cimbri over the eastern, and the Teutones, Ambrones, and other Gaulish and Helvetian nations over the western, Alps. Marius therefore marched to oppose the latter, and posted himself near the place where the present city of Arles stands. As the mouth of the Rhone was stopped up with heaps of sand and mud, which the waves continually lodged there, Marius, to supply his army with provisions brought up the river, undertook a great and laborious work, which from him was called Fossa Mariana. He dug a large canal, into which he turned the waters of the Rhone, and thereby opened a new communication between his camp and the sea. Through this canal the largest transports could pass; by which means he supplied his army with plenty of provisions; and, being incamped between the two arms of the river and the sea, had no reason to fear the attacks of the enemy. Some writers pretend, that the name of Camargue, which the neighbouring district bears, is a corruption of Castra Marii, that is, the camp of Marius. Be that as it will, Marius had scarce finished his works, when the barbarians appeared, covering with their innumerable multitudes a vast tract of land. They advanced to his trenches, but finding they could not force them, they made frightful shouts, and challenged the Romans to come out and fight them, but Marius was not in haste to venture a battle, there being something inexpressibly fierce in the looks of those barbarians, which struck the Romans with terror. The consul therefore, that their countenances, out-cries, and the clatter of their arms might become the less terrible by being familiar to his men, ordered his troops to mount the ramparts, as often as the barbarians appeared. He likewise sent out detachments, under the conduct of brave and experienced officers, to lay waste the country, and by that means distress the numberless barbarians for want of provisions. The more the scarcity increased, the more earnest they were to come to a decisive battle, insulting the Romans in their camp. But their insults only affected the common soldiers, whose ardor Marius restrained, telling them, that all rashness was to be laid aside, and no hazards to be run upon any account whatsoever. But this served only to make the legionaries more impatient to come to a battle with the barbarians, whom they now began to despise, observing to one another, that shouts and outcries do no execution, that ghastly looks and a savage mein can only frighten cowards, and that well-disciplined troops will always have the advantage over a disorderly and ill-conducted multitude. These sentiments gave the consul great pleasure; but, being resolved to hazard nothing, when all other means failed him, he had recourse to superstition to keep his soldiers in a more ready obedience. His wife Julia, who was of the family of the Cæsars, had sent him a woman from Rome,

- a by name Martha, whose skill in predictions, she said, she had experienced. The consul received and treated her with the most profound respect, as if she had been intrusted with the secrets of fate. But, in reality, she was rather an interpreter of the will of Marius, than of the gods; he informed her of his designs, and the pretended prophets never failed to approve of the measures which the consul had before resolved on. Having consulted her, whether he should humour his soldiers and engage the enemy, Martha answered, that in the present circumstances an engagement would prove fatal to the republic. This answer quieted the troops, and kept them in an intire subjection to their general. As the Teutones were continually hovering about the camp and insulting the Romans, one of them, a man of gigantic size, advancing one day to the foot of the rampart, challenged the consul himself to a single combat. But Marius, without regarding his bravadoes, answered, If the German is in haste to die, let him go and hang himself. At length the Teutones, quite tired out with Marius's delays, resolved to attack the Roman camp, but not succeeding in the attempt, they decamped at length, with a design to force a passage over the Alps some other way. We are told, that they were six whole days, without intermission, in passing by the Roman camp. In their march they cried out to the Romans upon the ramparts, If you have any message to your wives, we will soon deliver them at Rome. Marius, being forced to decamp likewise, followed the barbarians into the inner parts of the Roman province, and came up with them near Aquæ Sextiæ, now Aix. There the consul thought it adviseable to fortify a camp, that, at all events, he might be sure of a retreat. But while his troops were employed in this work, the servants of the army, who were gone in crouds to fetch water from the Cenus, now the Arque, were attacked by a body of Teutones, who guarded that river. As the servants made a great outcry, some of the legionaries ran to their assistance. Hereupon the whole army of the enemy took arms, which obliged Marius to draw up his troops in battalia. The legions halted at some distance from the river, while the Ligurians advanced to begin the action. The Ambrones, to the number of thirty thousand, faced the Ligurians in good order, and briskly marched up against them, beating time on their bucklers, and crying out Ambrones! Ambrones! probably to encourage each other, or to intimidate the Romans, by a name which the defeat of Cæpio and Mallius had made formidable; for to the Ambrones chiefly was owing the total overthrow of those two generals. The Ligurians were put to the rout at the first onset. But when the legions came to engage, the face of affairs was changed. The undisciplined multitude of barbarians, not being able to stand the shock of regular troops, were repulsed in their turn, and driven to the banks of the river, where the Romans made a dreadful slaughter of them. The river was stained with their blood, and only a small number of them gained the opposite bank, whence they fled, being closely pursued by the victorious legions, to a kind of fortification, which they had made with their carts. Their wives, who had staid there during the engagement, seeing their husbands flying and the Romans at their heels, armed themselves with axes, and, gnashing their teeth, fell with great shrieks on the pursued and pursuers without distinction. Without any any regard to their own defence, they threw themselves upon the combatants seized their swords and endeavoured to snatch away their bucklers. But when their first rage was spent, they desired to capitulate upon this single condition, that their honour should be preserved. When this condition was denied, those unfortunate women, being reduced to despair, first killed their children, and then themselves, not one remaining alive out of so great a multitude. So remarkable was the love of chastity, which remained among those whom the Romans called barbarians, after it was extinguished at Rome^b.
- f HOWEVER, this victory was far from being complete. The Ambrones indeed were defeated; but the Teutones, who were incamped at some distance from the river, still remained. They did not stir all that night nor the next day; so that the Romans had time to fortify themselves on the eminence which their general had first chosen. The third day after the battle, Teutobocchus, or, as others call him, Teutobodus, general of the Teutonic army, drew up his troops in the plain. On the other hand, Marius, having formed his infantry on the declivity of the hill, ordered his cavalry to go down the hill, attack the barbarians briskly, and by a feigned flight draw them towards the eminence. The stratagem succeeded. The Teutones, impatient to come to an engagement, engagement, advanced in good order to the foot of the hill, and, notwithstanding the ^a disadvantage of the ground, attacked the Romans with great intrepidity. They stood the showers of darts which the enemy discharged upon them, and, though forced to climb, closed with the legionaries in spite of all opposition, and fell upon them sword in hand. The Romans, who were posted on the declivity of the hill, by only pushing the aggressors back with their bucklers, often tumbled them over one another. Besides, the sun shone with great strength, and full in their faces. But, notwithstanding these disadvantages; they kept the victory doubtful till noon. The night before the battle Marius had detached Claudius Marcellus with a body of infantry, and given him, instead of cavalry; the servants of the army, mounted, without saddles, on all the beasts of burden he could find. They were ordered to lie in ambush in the hollow ^b road behind the enemy's camp, and to fall upon them in the heat of the action. Though the detachment was small, yet the great number of servants, thus oddly mounted, gave it the appearance of a great army. The Teutones, who had hitherto behaved with great intrepidity, no sooner saw this detachment advancing to attack them in the rear, than, their courage and strength failing them at once, they betook themselves to a disorderly flight. The Romans, who in a manner surrounded them, made a dreadful slaughter of the fugitives; took their camp and plundered it. Teutobocchus was; according to some; made prisoner; according to others; killed in the battle (L). As to the numbers of the slain and the prisoners in the two battles, they amounted, according to some writers, to two hundred and ninety thousand; according ^c to the lowest calculations a hundred thousand were killed upon the spot. The dead were so numerous, as some writers tell us, that the inhabitants made fences for their vineyards with their bones; they add, that the field of battle was so enriched by the bodies buried there, that the Marseillaise, to whom it belonged, had the next year a much more plentiful crop from it than usual ^c.

WITH the joyful news of this victory, Marius dispatched a messenger to Rome; where the people were so transported with it, that, in gratitude, they advanced him to the consulate the fifth time. While the people at Rome were heaping honours on their deliverer, the soldiers in the camp offered him all the booty. But he generously reserved only what might grace his triumph, and dedicated the rest to the gods. All ^d the combustible things were gathered together in one pile, to which the consul himself, with great solemnity, set fire. In the mean time, messengers arrived from Rome, with the congratulations of the people and the news of his fifth election, presenting him at the same time with a decree of the senate, which gave him leave to triumph. Marius accepted these new honours with gratitude, and without betraying any extraordinary joy, I accept the consulate, said he, as a new obligation upon me to conquer the Cimbri, as I have the Teutones. As for a triumph, I desire it may not be mentioned till I have made my victory complete. The pomp of a triumph will be very unseasonable, so long as there shall remain any barbarians in the neighbourhood of Italy. The colleague given Marius was Manius Aquilius, of whom hereafter. As for Catulus, he was continued in ^e the command of the army with the title of proconsul. This new year was begun with acts of religion, which the people thought the more necessary, because two enormous crimes were now committed, which had never been heard of since the foundation of the city. An unnatural son, by name Publicius Malleolus, killed his mother; a crime for which the Roman legislators had appointed no punishment, not presuming it possible for a man to be guilty of so enormous a villainy. A new punishment was therefore allotted for this new crime. The parricide was sewn up in a leathern sack; and with a thousand execrations thrown into the Tiber. The other crime was that of mutilation. A slave mutilated himself in imitation of the priests of Cybele. But the senate, apprehensive ^f of a of the consequences of so dangerous a delusion, banished the eunuch for ever from Rome^d.

In the mean time, Catulus, not being able to withstand the numberless multitudes ^{The Cimbri enter Italy.} of the Cimbri, by the advice of Sylla, who served under him in quality of his lieutenant-general, retired before the barbarians, and pitched two camps on the opposite banks of the Atthesis, now the Adige, intending there to make a stand against them. The Cimbri entered Italy, and advancing to the Atthesis, with a design to attack the Romans, attempted first to ford that river; but finding it not fordable, they pulled up great trees by the roots, and threw huge stones into it, hoping by that means so to fill it up as to make it passable. The terrible appearance of the numberless multitudes of barbarians struck the Romans with such a panic, that it was not in the power of Catulus to hinder those in his larger camp from flying shamefully before the enemy. Some ^{And strike the Romans with a panic.} of the Roman knights rid full speed to Rome, leaving their general and fellow-soldiers to the mercy of the enemy. Among these was the son of Scaurus, prince of the senate; but, as soon as his father was informed of his cowardly desertion, he sent him orders never to appear again in his presence. Hereupon the young Roman, who had been afraid of dying honourably in the field of battle, fell ingloriously by his own hand. In the mean time, those in the little camp made a vigorous resistance. One of the Cimbri having challenged to a single combat the bravest men among them, was shamefully overcome by L. Opimius. But the example of this brave man was not sufficient to encourage all the officers. There was in the camp but one legion, commanded by six tribunes, of whom five were for attempting to break through the enemy; but the sixth, not so resolute as the rest, opposed so dangerous an attempt. Whereupon a centurion, named Petreius, stabbed the cowardly officer, and being chosen commander by the legion, obtained an honourable capitulation, led his small body to a place of safety, and from thence marched to join the main body of the army incamped on the banks of the Po. Had the Cimbri known how to improve their victory, they might have made themselves masters of Rome, which was then quite defenceless, all orders of men being in the utmost consternation. But they delayed in expectation of the coming up of the Teutones, and thereby gave the Romans time to recall Marius and his troops from Gaul. By order of the senate he joined his troops to ^{Marius sent against the Cimbri,} the proconsul's army on the Po, and upon their union was declared commander in chief, his consulate and reputation giving him a superiority over Catulus. However, he received here a sensible mortification from his old lieutenant Sylla. That brave officer had, by a superior conduct, found means to supply the camp of Catulus with great plenty of provisions, while Marius's men wanted even necessaries. Sylla therefore went to the consul's camp, and maliciously offered to relieve his troops in their distress, with the overplus of the provisions which he had amassed in the proconsul's camp. Necessity obliged Marius to accept the offer; but never was present received with more reluctance^e. From this time Sylla entered into an open competition with Marius, notwithstanding the superiority which five consulates gave him, over a man who had not yet been raised to any of the great employments of the republic.

In the mean time, the Cimbri, finding the Teutones did not appear, resolved to come to action without them. But that they might act with some appearance of justice, they first sent a deputation to the Roman general, desiring him to assign them and their allies the Teutones, lands in the country where they were, and threatening, in case of a refusal, to make the Romans feel the weight of their arms. Marius answered sternly, You ask lands for your allies the Teutones; I have given them some already. Their carcasses are now rotting in the fields by the Cenus, and their bones made use of for fences to the vineyards. The deputies, exasperated at this severe jest, threatened to make him repent of his insults, as soon as the Teutones should pass the Alps. You need not then delay a moment, answered Marius; they have already passed the Alps, and you shall immediately see them. Then shewing them the chiefs of the Teutonic army in chains; Pray salute your allies, said he to the deputies with a sneer, and make yourselves ready to come and join them. These insults provoked the Cimbri to such a degree, that Bojorix, one of their kings, came in person to Marius's camp, and challenged him to fix the day and place of battle. This the Romans had scarce ever done; but Marius pitched upon the plain of Vercellæ, which was not large enough to contain half the enemy's forces, As for the day, he named the eve of the calends of August, the third day from

from that time. Both generals kept their agreement. The army of Catulus amounted a to twenty thousand three hundred, and that of Marius to thirty-two thousand. The enemy's cavalry were no more than fifteen thousand; but their infantry seemed innumerable; for we are told, that they covered, when drawn up in a square, thirty furlongs. Marius, as commander in chief, drew up the whole army; and, in order to deprive the proconsul of any share of the glory of the day, he posted his troops in the centre, and his own in the two wings, which projected before the main body, and must consequently sustain the efforts of the enemy's army. But his measures were disconcerted by an unforeseen accident. For, before the action began, the cavalry of the Cimbri made a motion, as if they intended to wheel about and flank the Roman army. Hereupon Marius, at the head of the two wings, advanced against them. The b Cimbrian horse at his approach retired, and drew the consul after them. When he was at some distance from the main body, the enemy's infantry charged the legions commanded by Catulus and Sylla with incredible fury. The Romans, animated by the example of their leaders, stood the shock without giving ground, keeping themselves upon the defensive till the enemy's first fury was spent. When they found their strength began to fail them, the legionaries charged them in their turn. As the sun shone with great violence, those northern people, not accustomed to the heats of Italy, were soon covered with sweat, and scarce able to lift up their arms to strike a blow; so that they made but a faint resistance. They were soon overcome; but they had put it out of their own power to save themselves from the victorious enemy by flight. c That they might keep their ranks the better, they had, like true barbarians, tied themselves to one another with cords fastened to their belts; so that the Romans made what havock they pleased of those helpless barbarians. To complete their misfortune, Marius, returning with his troops from the pursuit of their cavalry, fell upon them, when quite exhausted with fatigue and the heat of the day. All that followed was a dreadful butchery, the whole plain being covered with dead bodies. From the field of battle the Romans marched to the enemy's camp, where they had a new battle to fight with their wives, who were even more fierce than their husbands. From their carts and waggons, which formed a kind of fortification, they discharged showers of darts on their friends and enemies without distinction. Then they first suffocated their d children in their arms, and afterwards killed themselves. The greatest part hanged themselves on trees. One was found hanging from a cart with two of her children at her heels. Many of the men, for want of trees and stakes, tied strings in running knots about their necks, and fastened them to the tails of their horses, and the horns and feet of their oxen, to strangle themselves that way. Thus those unhappy creatures put an end to their lives by all the methods they could contrive. Two of their kings or leaders stabbed each other. Bojorix and Luig, their chief commanders, died in the action sword in hand. Clodic and Seforix, two of their generals, were made prisoners with sixty thousand of their men, who were all put in chains, and sold to the best bidder: a hundred and twenty thousand of the barbarians were left dead upon e the spot; whereas the Romans had scarce three hundred men missing in both armies. Thus was this whole nation almost extirpated, whose incursions and robberies were looked upon as a public scourge. After the battle, all the spoils and ensigns were brought to the camp of Catulus, which was a plain declaration, that the victory was chiefly owing to his men. But hereupon a dispute arising between the soldiers of the two camps, the generals agreed to refer the matter to the arbitration of the ambassadors of Parma, who happened at that time to be in the army. These being led to the field of battle, found almost all the darts, with which the barbarians had been killed, marked with the name of Catulus, who had taken care to imprint it on the arms of his soldiers before the battle. Besides, Marius's men had taken from the enemy only f two standards; whereas Sylla brought to the proconsul's camp thirty-one, with the brazen bull, which the Cimbri worshipped. Upon the whole, the arbitrators gave sentence in favour of Catulus; so that Sylla saw with pleasure the greatest part of the glory of the action taken from Marius, who had endeavoured to ingross it all to himself. However, when the news of this signal victory was brought to Rome, the people gave all the honour of it to Marius, calling him the third founder of Rome, the deliverer of his country; nay, they even invoked him as a god; and neither time, nor the most circumstantial accounts, could undeceive them, so as to bring them to allow any share of the success to Catulus. But Marius himself had not the confidence to deprive Catulus of the glory which was due to him. Besides, he was afraid that the army of Catulus would

- a would oppose his triumph, if he pretended to exclude their general. They were therefore both honoured with a triumph. The spoils taken from the enemy were carried before the triumphant victors; but, if we give credit to Florus^f, no part of the shew struck the people so much as the sight of king Teutobocchus, who was, according to that writer, of such a gigantic stature, that his head appeared above the trophies which were carried in procession. After the triumph, both generals, pursuant to a vow each of them had made, built a temple in memory of their victory: Marius, who had no taste for arts, in a very plain manner, to virtue and honour; and Catulus, with great elegance and beauty, to the fortune of this day. Marius, on the day his temple was dedicated, entertained the people with games after the Greek manner; but, as war was his element, he was immediately tired with them, and withdrew^g.
- b Thus was Italy delivered from her fears by the defeat of the Teutones and Cimbri. The only enemy the Romans had now to contend with were the rebellious slaves in Sicily. The republic had sent against them, two years before the defeat of the Cimbri, the prætor Lucius Licinius Lucullus with an army of fourteen thousand men, legionaries and auxiliaries, exclusive of the succours that were sent him from Greece and Lucania. As soon as the Roman army landed, Salvius, who had shut up Athenio in the citadel of Triocala, as we have related above, delivered him from his confinement, and advised with him, as he was a man of some experience, about the means of resisting the new general. In a council of war, which they held, it was agreed, that Salvius should continue in the city of Triocala to defend it, if attacked, and that Athenio should, at the head of forty thousand men, march against Lucullus, and give him battle. Accordingly Athenio advanced with his army into the neighbourhood of Scirtæum, and there came to an engagement with the prætor, in which the victory was warmly disputed. The slaves, who for the most part had served in war before they were reduced to slavery, fought with a regularity and courage which the Romans did not expect. Insomuch, that the success would have been doubtful, if Athenio, advancing into the middle of the enemy's battalions at the head of three hundred horse, had not been wounded in both his knees. He fell from his horse through faintness, and was covered with a heap of dead bodies. Hereupon his troops, having no commander of reputation to head them, dispersed and fled in the utmost confusion. The Romans pursued the fugitives, and killed above twenty thousand of them. The news of this defeat no sooner reached Triocala, than the cowardly Salvius abandoned the place. But, in the mean time, Athenio, having got from under the dead bodies that covered him, gained Triocala with the remains of his army before the prætor, who spent nine days in useless precautions, invested the place. Athenio sustained the siege with an intrepidity seldom found in men of his rank, and forced Lucullus to raise the siege, and retire from before the place amidst the hisses of the slaves, who insulted him and his army from their walls, as they filed off. He withdrew to Syracuse, and there spent the remainder of the year, wholly intent on enriching himself at the expence of his province. His year therefore was no sooner expired, than he was recalled, and being accused before the people of oppression, he was condemned to banishment^h. The prætor C. Servilius was sent to succeed him; but that weak general was even more unfortunate than his predecessor. Athenio, who now carried on the rebellion alone, Salvius being dead, attacked the Roman army, gave them a total overthrow, and made himself master of their camp. After this victory Athenio advanced to Messana, and, having made a fruitless attempt upon that city, besieged Macella and took it. The progress of the rebellion opened at length the eyes of the senate, who sent Manius Aquilius, the colleague of Marius for the present year, to suppress it. Aquilius crossed over into Sicily with a consular army, and having made it his whole business in his consulship to reduce the rebels to great straits for want of provisions, in the year of his proconsulate he intirely destroyed them. He took the field, and brought the enemy to a battle, which both parties maintained with equal vigor, till the two generals met, and determined the victory by a single combat. Aquilius not disdaining to enter the lists with Athenio, a stop was put to the battle, the Romans on one side, and the slaves on the other, making way for the two champions. The proconsul, who was a man of great strength and resolution, laid his adversary dead on the ground at one blow; and the Romans, taking advantage of his victory and the enemy's fears, fell fell upon them with fresh vigor, and made such a slaughter of the disheartened rebels, a that of their vast army scarce ten thousand escaped to their camp, where they chose rather to kill one another than surrender. When they were reduced to a thousand, one Satyrius capitulated with the proconsul, who promised him and his companions their lives, but afterwards sent them to Rome to fight the wild beasts in the shows of the circus. But they chose rather to fall by each other's hands. And thus ended a rebellion, which had lasted four years, and cost the republic, according to some writers, near a million of slaves. Aquilius on his return was honoured with an ovation, the republic having more regard to her ancient custom of not granting a triumph to the conquerors of rebels, especially if they were slaves, than to the merit and services of Aquilius i.

Apuleius murders his competitor, and assumes the tribunate.

Apuleius revives the ancient quarrel about the distribution of lands.

b THE republic, after the defeat of the Cimbri and the reduction of the slaves, had scarce any enemies left abroad, but nourished such in her own bosom as proved more mischievous to her, than either the barbarians of Germany, or the slaves of Sicily. Marius, whose ambition knew no bounds, stood now for the sixth consulship, with as much eagerness as he had done for the first. Though naturally fierce and rough, he became mild and affable, caressed the meanest of the people, and ingratiated himself with them by the most servile condescensions. His competitor was the great Metellus, surnamed Numidicus, whose virtues and experience, joined to the wishes of all honest men, loudly called him to the government of the republic. But Marius, by distributing under-hand large sums among the people, got Metellus excluded, himself c chosen, and one Lucius Valerius Flaccus, a very weak man, appointed for his colleague. The first step Marius took after his election was, to contract an intimate friendship with L. Apuleius Saturninus and Servilius Glaucia, two daring and factious men, who had all the scum of the indigent and seditious people constantly at their beck. Apuleius had been long devoted to the consul, and had procured him, as we have observed above, his fourth consulate. Glaucia was the prætor, to whom the cognizance of civil causes belonged, and was naturally factious and violent. These three entered into an association with a design to ingross all the power to themselves. Apuleius had been once before tribune of the people, and now stood for that post a second time. But he had the misfortune to come in competition with A. Nonnius, a man of d an unblemished character, and highly esteemed by the people. Marius used all his interest in behalf of his friend Apuleius; but both his intrigues and solicitations were ineffectual: all the voices were for Nonnius, who was accordingly declared tribune. Hereupon Apuleius, giving himself wholly up to the dictates of his fury, caused Nonnius to be stabbed at the breaking up of the assembly, and then got himself tumultuously proclaimed tribune by those of his own party, before any considerable part of the people were assembled to give their suffrages. The consul confirmed the election; and the murder of Nonnius was no more mentioned. And now Marius, Apuleius, and Glaucia, formed a kind of triumvirate, whose whole aim was to humble the senate, and assume all power to themselves. About this time ambassadors arrived at e Rome from Mithridates the Great, king of Pontus, sent by their master to adjust some small differences between him and the republic. These Apuleius, at the instigation of Marius, ruled in a most brutish manner. The consul, in all likelihood, weary of an inactive life, hoped by that means to provoke Mithridates to begin a war. However that be, the ambassadors laid their complaints before the senate, and the conscript fathers, glad of an opportunity of humbling the insolent tribune, cited him before their tribunal. But, on the day when sentence was to be pronounced, the populace surrounded the hall where the senate met, in such crouds, that they intimidated the judges; so that the factious tribune was acquitted by a majority of votes k.

f AFTER this victory over the senate, Apuleius, as tribune of the people, renewed the ancient quarrel about the division of the lands. Marius and Catulus had, by the defeat of the Cimbri, recovered some lands in Cisalpine Gaul, of which those barbarians had taken possession; and Apuleius was for unjustly taking these lands from the true owners, and giving them to Marius's soldiers, who were for the most part people without house or home, and intirely devoted to their general. In the law which he had prepared together with Marius, whose tool he was, for the distribution of the lands, there was a clause expressly providing, That the senate should come and swear in full assembly to confirm whatever should be enacted by the people, and not to oppose them in any thing; and a and that whoever refused to take that oath should be degraded, and condemned to a fine of twenty talents. Nothing could be more unreasonable than such a law, since it subjected the senate to the people. On the day therefore of the comitia, when it was to be admitted or rejected, many men of great weight and authority mounted the rostra to dissuade the people from passing it. But they were pulled down by the mob of the country tribes, whom Marius and Apuleius had brought in great crouds into the city. These violent proceedings provoked the city tribes, who, finding themselves the weakest, that the assembly might be dissolved, cried out, That they heard it thunder; which, according to the laws, obliged them to suspend for that day all deliberations. But the country tribes, having among them many veterans, most of ^{Marius's} them men of mettle, disregarding that superstitious custom, fell upon the city tribes, ^{treachery and} and, having driven them with stones and clubs out of the forum, got the law passed. ^{double dealing.}

b The next day Marius, who was at the bottom of all this and the chief manager of the plot, as consul, made a report to the senate of the law in question, exclaimed against the late violences, and declared, for his part that he was determined never to take so unreasonable an oath, and that he did not doubt, but every honest man would be of his opinion; for if the law was good in itself, there was no necessity for swearing; and if it was a bad one, they were all obliged in honour not to swear. This he said to ensnare Metellus, whom he hated ever since their quarrel in Numidia. He hoped that his declaring against the oath would draw a like declaration from that great man, and did not doubt, but when he had once made such a public declaration,

c he would stand firm to his resolution, which would infallibly expose him to the hatred of the people. The event answered his expectation; Metellus protested, that he would not take the oath, and the whole senate did the same. A few days after, Apuleius summoned the senate to appear in the comitia in order to take the oath; and then Marius made his appearance among the rest; and while the eyes of all the senators were fixed upon him, he, to their great surprize, declared, that he had changed his sentiments: I am not so stiff and obstinate. said he, as to be tied down by any declaration I may have made upon an affair of so much weight, before I had thoroughly considered it; but am ready to swear, and having sworn, will punctually observe the law, when it once becomes a law. These last words he added, to put a plausible

d colour upon his shameful breach of faith. If it was a law, it ought without all doubt, to be obeyed. But this was a mean subterfuge and knavish pretence. It was no law, being without any of the requisite conditions; and therefore, instead of obeying, he ought to have opposed it. The senators upon this declaration of Marius, which was applauded by all the country tribes, were afraid to open their mouths. Marius took their silence for a tacit consent, and immediately went to the temple of Saturn, according to the ancient custom, and there took the oath, even without the restriction he himself had proposed. The senators, over-awed by the people, followed his example. But Metellus resolutely persisted in his former opinion, notwithstanding the representations of his friends, who earnestly intreated him to yield to the times. He told

e those, who pressed him to take the oath, that to do a base and unworthy action was under all circumstances shameful; that to do well, when no danger attended it, was common; but to do well, in the midst of dangers, was the property of a truly good and honest man. Upon his refusal, the assembly, at the instigation of Marius and Apuleius, ^{Metellus con-} condemned him to banishment. The nobility, the whole body of the patricians and ^{demned to ba-} the city tribes, offered to oppose this most unjust decree of the populace. Many, ^{nishment.} out of affection for so good and virtuous a citizen, had brought arms under their robes, being determined to defend him to the last extremity. But that wise senator, who truly loved his country, after having, in a tender manner, returned them thanks for their kindness, declared, that he would not suffer a single drop of blood to be

f spilt on his account. He then went into banishment, which in so glorious a cause did him more honour than all his victories or triumphs. He left the city with this wise reflection; Either the face of affairs will change, and the people repent what they have done; in which case I shall be recalled and restored with honour: or they will remain in the present posture; and then it will be best for me to be at a distance from Rome. The illustrious exile went to reside, some say at Rhodes, others at Smyrna, where, in a sweet tranquillity, he gave himself intirely up to the study of philosophy, enjoying in his retreat those pleasures which flow from a good conscience¹.

Marius, Apuleius, and Glaucia congratulated each other on their having at last a ruined their common enemy. The point Apuleius had in view was, to get himself continued in the tribuneship, Glaucia aspired at the consulate, and Marius was for maintaining himself in his post another year. To compass their ends, they scrupled nothing. Apuleius, like a monster let loose, committed the most flagrant acts of violence and injustice with impunity. Marius, who was the soul of the plot, left to the other two the execution of the wicked schemes which he advised. He pretended to keep the balance even between the people and the senate. On one side, he raised disturbances underhand, by means of his two confederates, in order to make himself necessary, and pave the way for his seventh consulship. On the other hand, he pretended a great desire to compose them, hoping thereby to ingratiate himself with the senate. By this artful conduct he would have gained his point, had not his deceit been discovered by an accident. One evening some senators came to wait on the consul, and to implore his assistance against the attempts of the seditious tribune. Marius, who was willing to keep fair with the nobility, received them very graciously, and promised to exert his power against Apuleius. While he was conferring with the senators about the proper measures for preserving the republic, Apuleius came to receive his directions about raising new disturbances, and being let in at a back door unknown to the senators, was carried into another apartment. Then Marius, pretending a looseness, under that colour, was continually running from one apartment to the other, exasperating the senators against the tribune, and the tribune against the senators. But this being soon after known, he became suspected by both parties. Apuleius and Glaucia began to take umbrage at his complaisance for the patricians; and the patricians grew jealous of his great intimacy with those two incendiaries. In the mean time, Apuleius and Glaucia canvassed, independently on the consul, the former for a third tribuneship, and the latter for the consulate; and both resolved to stick at nothing. Nay, Apuleius set up the contemptible Equitius, of whom we have spoke above, for tribune of the people, and, without any regard to common decency, carried matters so far, that Marius himself thought it adviseable to send Equitius to prison, ordering him to be kept there till the election of the tribunes was over. But Apuleius, having spirited up the people to break open the prison, set Equitius at liberty, and prevailed upon the turbulent populace to proclaim him tribune of the people. But the pretended tribune died before he entered upon his office. At the same time Glaucia, who stood for the consulate, carried his furious attempts to such excess, that he was become quite insupportable. When the comitia for the election of consuls came on, Marius was excluded, and the orator Marcus Antonius chosen in the first place; Glaucia expected to be nominated in the second; but finding he had a formidable competitor in Memmius, who was infinitely superior to him in all respects, and highly esteemed on account of his probity, he made no scruple to send one of his attendants to murder him in the open forum. After a murder so public and daring, Glaucia and Apuleius his accomplice, to avoid the punishment they deserved, openly attempted to destroy the republic itself. They carried a multitude of desperate men to the house of Apuleius, who there exhorted them to an open rebellion. We are told, that they appointed him to be their general, and offered him the title of king, which he is said to have accepted. But be that as it will, it was now an open conspiracy; the senate declared them enemies to their country, and passed one of those decrees, which were never made, but in times of the utmost difficulty and danger: the two consuls Marius and Flaccus were ordered to provide for the public welfare in what manner they judged proper; which was empowering them to revenge with the sword the disturbances those seditious men were raising in the republic. Hereupon Marius found himself obliged to arm, in order to suppress a sedition which he secretly favoured, but could protect no longer. No time was to be lost: Glaucia and Apuleius had already seized the capitol. Arms therefore were given to all those who declared for the senate; the knights, the senators, and all who had the welfare of their country at heart, armed themselves against the two rebels. But Marius affected delays, and plainly shewed, it was much against his inclination that he obeyed the orders of the senate. In the mean time, the whole rabble of the country tribes entered the city with a design to join their friends in the capitol, but were obliged to fight a battle in the forum before they could reach the citadel. When they were hard pressed, Apuleius made a sally, and covered their retreat to the capitol. During the action, the seditious tribune hoisted up a cap on the top of a lance to invite the slaves to take arms in his favour in hopes of their liberty.

- a liberty. In the mean time, the senators and knights, tired with the delays of Marius, A battle in the forum. who was ever pleading some excuse or other, caused the pipes to be cut, which conveyed water into the capitol, which soon reduced the rioters to a desperate condition. In this extremity Suffeius, one of their leaders, was for setting fire to the temple of Jupiter, in hopes they should make their escape, during the confusion and tumult which commonly attend such accidents. But Apuleius and Glaucia, depending upon their friendship with Marius, surrendered to him, after he had promised, upon the public faith, to save their lives. This promise was in itself void and unlawful, since the senate had already declared them rebels, and ordered the consul to treat them as such. The rebels in the capitol forced to surrender to Marius. But Marius was resolved to save a body of desperate men, whose fury might be of use to him on some other occasion. He therefore gave them leave to march out of the capitol unmolested. Glaucia retired to the house of one Claudius for refuge; but the people soon dragged him from thence, and cut off his head. His brother Dolabella and one L. Geganius, who retired to the herb-market, were murdered there. Hereupon Marius shut up the rest, with Apuleius their chief, in the old palace of Tullus Hostilius, giving out, that he confined them there in order to bring them to condign punishment. But the palace was in reality a place of safety for them, rather than a prison; and the guards, placed at the gates, were not so much to prevent their making their escape, as to secure them against the insults of the people. Who endeavours to save them; Of this the senators and knights were well apprised; and therefore, having assembled the people, they dispersed the guards, broke open the gates of the palace, and with clubs and stones dispatched Suffeius, Labienus, Equitius, Apuleius himself, and all the leading men of his party. But in vain. The people, not satisfied with the death of Apuleius, tore his body into a thousand pieces. And now, the storm being blown over, the comitia assembled in tranquillity, and all the acts of the preceding tribunate were declared absolutely null, for want of liberty in the suffrages. After this the tribes met again to chuse a colleague for Marcus Antonius, who had been elected on the day that Memmius was murdered. The person raised to that dignity was A. Posthumius Albinus, a man of excellent parts and an sincere friend to his country^m.
- d THE new consular year was begun with purifying the city, which had been polluted with so much blood in the late troubles. To the ceremonies used on this occasion others succeeded for averting evils, foreboded by some imaginary prognostics. It was not then known, that in the year, when these prodigies were said to have happened, a child was born in Rome, who would one day overturn the republic. This was Julius Cæsar, who came into the world on the twelfth day of the month Quintilis, The birth of Julius Cæsar. in the sixth consulate of Marius, whence the fifth month of the old Roman year was called Julius. The new consuls had the pleasure to see the games, which P. Claudius Pulcher the ædile gave, celebrated without trouble or confusion. They were the most splendid that had yet been seen in Rome. We are told, that Claudius was the first who caused the scenes to be painted; which was so artfully done, says *Pliny*ⁿ, that the birds attempted to alight on the tops of the houses, and to perch on the trees, which were painted on the cloth. Thus were the first months of this year spent in tranquillity. But it was not long, ere the leaven of sedition, which Marius had sown among the tribunes, began to shew itself in Sextius Titius, who attempted to ingratiate himself with the people, and raise new troubles, by reviving the Gracchian law about the division of lands. Sextius Titius tribune of the people, banished. But the consul M. Antonius prevented the mischief he intended, and brought him into such contempt, that, as soon as he was out of his office, he was accused of the most infamous and unnatural practices, and condemned to banishment. And now, after Marius and his adherents were thus fully disappointed, it was thought a proper season to recall the great Metellus. All the Cæcilian family, of which the Metelli were a branch, interested themselves in the cause of their relation. The exile's son appeared in deep mourning, fell prostrate before the tribes, and did all for the recalling of his father, which persons accused of capital crimes used to do to save their own lives. This affectionate conduct towards his father procured him the surname of Pius, which he bore the rest of his life. The whole body of the patricians joined with the son, and intreated the people in a public assembly to recall so worthy a citizen. Marius did all that lay in his power to prevent the return of a patrician, who was the support of the senate, a true pattern of the old Roman probity, and the dread of the seditions. Metellus recalled. But, in spite of Marius's utmost efforts, equity prevailed, and the return of Metellus

Metellus was carried by a majority of suffrages. The messenger sent to acquaint him with the decree of the people, finding him at a public show in the city of Trallis in Lydia, delivered to him the letter, and at the same time whispered him, that it contained joyful news. But the illustrious philosopher, without the least change of countenance, continued his attention to the show, and did not open the packet till the games were ended. The same greatness of soul, which had kept him from dejection in his disgrace, guarded him against immoderate joy in his prosperity. All the persons of distinction in Rome went to receive him at the gate of the city. He was accompanied from the gate to his own house by vast crowds of people, who testified the sincerity of their joy by loud acclamations. His house was crowded from morning to night with persons of all ranks, who came to see and congratulate him. In short, his return was a real triumph. Marius, to avoid the mortification of seeing a triumphant enemy, left Rome and went into Asia, giving out, that he was going to perform some sacrifices, which he had vowed to Cybele the mother of the gods. But the true motive of his voyage into Asia was, to kindle a war, and cut out new work for his republic there. He owed his grandeur wholly to arms, and could not maintain it in peaceable times, being destitute of those talents which were necessary to gain applause in a commonwealth, where eloquence bore a great sway in all public deliberations. In order therefore to have an opportunity of displaying anew his talent for war, he went to the court of Mithridates king of Pontus, who seemed the most disposed to quarrel. The king received him with all the honour due to his reputation, caressed him in the most affectionate manner, and did all that lay in his power to oblige a man of so much weight in his republic. But all to no purpose; he could draw nothing from the proud Roman, but insolent treatment. Marius did not doubt, but, if he could provoke that young, powerful, and brave king to take arms against Rome, he should have the command of the forces employed in that war; and therefore he treated him with great haughtiness and contempt. One day he addressed himself to him very bluntly in these terms; You must either, O king, endeavour to be more powerful than the Romans, or quietly submit to their will. The king of Pontus, the proudest prince of his time, was quite astonished at the discourse of the bold commonwealth's man. However, as he was a great politician, he did not think this a proper time to declare his resentments; and therefore, concealing his displeasure, he dismissed Marius loaded with presents.

BUT to return to Metellus, the people soon gave him a sensible proof of the regard they had for him. Upon his presenting to the tribes his relation Q. Cæcilius Metellus, the people very readily chose him consul, and gave him for his colleague T. Didius, who had been honoured with a triumph fourteen years before, for having defeated the Scordisci. The two consuls drew lots for their provinces, when Italy fell to Metellus, and Spain to Didius, whither he carried a consular army to make head against the Spanish rebels, who had taken arms in great numbers, and committed dreadful devastations in the Roman province. Under Didius served Sertorius in quality of legionary tribune. He was a native of Nursia in Sabinia, and had already given many proofs of his valour; but in the present war with the revolted Spaniards, he gained more reputation than his general. He reduced the cities of Castulo and Gyrifanium, two places of great importance; and it was chiefly owing to his masterly conduct, that Didius overthrew in a pitched battle the Vaccæi, of whom he cut twenty thousand in pieces. After the consul had, by the help of his brave tribune, reduced the rebels, he stained his victory by an unheard-of piece of treachery and cruelty. One of the Roman generals had settled five years before a colony of Spaniards near the city of Colenda. These, before they were brought to this new settlement, had committed robberies in several parts of Spain. Didius suspecting, without any grounds, that they designed to return to their ancient way of living, obliged them to quit the lands they were possessed of, and promised them those of Colenda, which city he had just reduced after a nine months siege. The Spaniards, depending on the general's promise, came with their wives and children to the Roman camp, where, under pretence of accommodating them better, they were admitted within the intrenchments. When the cruel consul had them thus in his power, he caused the whole multitude to be divided into three companies, placing the men in one, the women in another, and the children in the third. The poor people suspected no treachery, till they heard the consul order his

^a legionaries to fall upon them, and put them all, without distinction, to the sword. ^{The cruelty of} His orders were put in execution with the utmost barbarity, not one of those unhappy ^{Didius in} wretches escaping. A most detestable piece of cruelty! but applauded at Rome. To such a degree were the Romans degenerated from their antient probity! This massacre exasperated the Celtiberians, who taking arms faced the consular army in the open field, and came to a pitched battle with them, in which they fought like men in despair, till night parted the two armies. The loss of the Romans was equal to theirs; but Didius by a stratagem made them believe they had been worsted. He ordered most of the bodies of the Romans, who had been slain, to be carried out of the field of battle in the night. The Celtiberians, when they came early next morning, according to their ^{The Celtiberians submit to} custom, to bury their dead, were so terrified at seeing such a number of their own men ^{Didius.} slain, and so few Romans, that they submitted to Didius upon his own terms. Thus, partly by force and partly by artifice, the Roman general settled Hither Spain in peace, and returned five years after his consulship to Rome, where his services were rewarded with a triumph^p. This same year the prætor Cornelius Dolabella gained considerable advantages over the revolted Lusitanians in Further Spain. Historians indeed have not given us any account of his exploits, but in the triumphal tables he is said to have triumphed over the Lusitanians this present year.

In the mean time, the consul Metellus maintained peace at home, and punished with the utmost severity all speeches that tended to sedition. ^c C. Plautius Decianus, one of the prætors, was banished for dropping, in a public speech, some expressions in favour of the furious tribune Apuleius. The tribunes themselves durst no longer propose seditious laws, or attempt to raise disturbances among the populace. The presence of Metellus and the absence of Marius equally contributed to the public tranquillity. In Asia, that is, in the ancient kingdom of Pergamus, the excellent proconsul ^{2.} Mucius Scævola punished the iniquity of the Roman knights or publicans in a very ^{Mucius Scævola punishes} exemplary manner. He found them guilty of most enormous extortions, in raising ^{the publicans} and managing the revenues of the republic; and therefore, without any regard to the dignity or power of so formidable a body, he caused many of them to be publicly carried to prison, and condemned a slave to be crucified, who had been the agent of ^d an oppressive publican, and an accomplice in his master's knavery. He appointed men of integrity, and well versed in money affairs, to examine the books of the publicans, and by this means reformed his province in less than nine months. On his departure the Asiatics instituted a festival to perpetuate among them the memory of his virtues. This festival, which from him was called Mucia, did him more honour than a triumph. Many of the governors of the provinces followed the example of Mucius, and the senate charged the consuls and prætors to do the same in their respective provinces; so that a stop was put for some time to the oppressions of the publicans, which had rendered the yoke of the republic insupportable.

In the succeeding consulate of Cn. Cornelius Lentulus and P. Licinius Crassus, ^{Marius disgraced at} Marius returned from Asia; and, soon after his arrival in Rome, he built himself a house ^{Rome.} close by the forum, either to ease his clients, as he himself gave out, of the trouble of going far, or in hopes of having more numerous levees there, than in a distant part of the town. But he found, that his rough behaviour kept people from him where-ever he lived. His haughty manners were not becoming in a free state, where every one thinks himself to be upon a level with the best, and where the great can gain and maintain friends only by an obliging behaviour and good offices. He met with the fate of most warriors, who live to a great age in peace. Their victories are forgot, and they, as Plutarch observes, if not recommended by civil virtues, are, like old rusty weapons, laid aside as quite useless. But nothing gave Marius so great uneasiness as to see his old rival Sylla aggrandise himself, as he thought, at his expence. ^f Bocchus, king of Mauritania, after he had been declared an ally of the Roman people, dedicated in the capitol several trophies of Sylla's victories, and placed near them some golden statues, representing in what manner he had delivered Jugurtha into the hands of Sylla. Marius, distracted with rage, attempted to pull down a monument, which ascribed to his rival all the glory of so memorable an event. Sylla, on the other hand, ^{Is jealous of} opposed him with all his credit. Every one took party according to his interest and ^{Sylla's glory.} inclination; so that the whole city was divided into two factions; but by the vigilance of the consuls a stop was put to the sedition, when it was just upon the point of.

of breaking out. Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus and C. Cassius Longinus, the two succeeding consuls, took more care to maintain peace and tranquillity at home, than to signalise themselves by feats of arms abroad. During their administration, Rome enjoyed all the advantages of peace and plenty, and was so sensible of her happiness, that she preferred to the many warriors, who desired to succeed them, men brought up in peaceable employments, viz. Licinius Crassus, the famous orator, and Q. Mucius Scævola, a learned civilian. But these pacific consuls sowed, without design, the seeds of one of the most bloody wars that had ever broke out in the neighbourhood of Rome. They got a law passed, which obliged the allies, who lived in Rome and falsely pretended to the right of Roman citizenship, to return to their own homes. By the help of these intruders some seditious tribunes had sown discord among the real citizens; whence it seemed but just, that those strangers should be sent home to their respective countries. Nevertheless this law, how just soever and equitable in itself, was so resented by the people of the Italian provinces, that it afterwards gave birth to the war of the allies. The consuls, after having passed this law and drawn lots for their provinces, set out, the one for Transalpine, the other for Cisalpine, Gaul. Scævola, to whom Transalpine Gaul had fallen, finding little to do in his province, returned to Rome, and generously disbanded his army before his year expired, thinking it an unnecessary burden to the republic. Crassus, though he sought for enemies, and searched into all the corners of the Alps for people to fight with, could find none, but a company of strolling robbers, whom he defeated. Nevertheless, he demanded a triumph on his return; but his colleague, out of a pure regard to equity, opposed it, declaring, that he would not suffer so great an honour to be depreciated and thrown away on such slight advantages. The following consulship of L. Domitius Ahenobarbus and Cælius Caldus was as peaceable as the former. Cælius was a new man (M), of no birth or merit, and surnamed Caldus from his warm temper; but he had no opportunity of raising any disturbances, some of the chief nobility being at this time admitted into the college of tribunes. The consulate of C. Valerius Flaccus and M. Herennius was remarkable for nothing, but the pompous show of lions, with which Sylla entertained the people in the circus, and the unjust condemnation of P. Rutilius Rufus a consular. Bocchus sent Sylla a hundred lions, and with them some Mauritanian hunters, who were used to fight them. This was a pleasing entertainment to the people, and the remembrance of it contributed afterwards as much towards Sylla's promotion to the consulate, as either his reputation or exploits. P. Rutilius Rufus had attended Mucius Scævola into Asia, and was thought the author of his severe reformation of the publicans. He was unjustly, and purely out of revenge, accused by that powerful body, and condemned to banishment. He retired to Smyrna, where he was so well pleased with the conversation of the Greek philosophers, that he refused to return to Rome, when the people some years after annulled the decree of his banishment^r.

THE following year, when C. Claudius Pulcher and M. Perperna were consuls, the senate ordered Sylla to carry back Ariobarzanes, king of Cappadocia, to his dominions, whence he had been driven by Tigranes king of Armenia. This Sylla effected, after having defeated Gordius, whom the Armenians had placed on the throne, as we have related at length in the history of Armenia. On this occasion Sylla received an embassy from Arbaces king of Parthia, desiring the friendship of the Roman people. The Roman general thought this one of the most fortunate occurrences of his life, and esteemed it,

(M) The division of the Roman people into Nobiles, Novi, and Ignobiles, often occurs in history, and was taken from the right of exposing publicly the images or statues of their ancestors; an honour only allowed to those whose ancestors or themselves had bore some curule office, that is, had been curule ædile, censor, prætor, or consul. He who could expose the pictures or statues of his ancestors was styled Nobilis; he, who could only produce his own, was called Homo Novus; and he, who could neither expose his own, nor the pictures of any of his ancestors, was termed Ignobilis. So that jus imaginis was much the same thing among the ancient Romans, as the right of bearing a coat of arms among us. For a great while none but the patricians were Nobiles, they alone being raised to the curule offices. Hence in many places of Livy, Sallust, and other ancient writers, we find the word Nobilitas used for the patrician order. But in after-ages, when the plebeians were admitted to the curule offices, both they and their posterity were honoured with the title of Nobiles (9).

a it a happy omen, that he should be the first Roman who was known to so warlike and powerful a people^r.

At Rome, Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, one of the censors, accused his colleague L. Crassus of excessive fondness for one of his muræne. The favourite muræna was so tame that it would come to Crassus at his call, and feed out of his hand. The grave censor was so fond of this fish, that he took pleasure in adorning it with the richest jewels he had. When it died, he put himself in mourning, and erected a tomb for it. When Crassus, who was for his eloquence, as Cicero tells us, the wonder of his age, came to speak in his own defence, he was very satirical on his austere accuser, and uttered his ironical jests with such gestures, as drew upon his colleague the laughter of the whole assembly. I have been guilty, said he, of this enormous crime; I have, it is true, wept at the loss of a favourite fish: but you, good Domitius, have bore the loss of three wives without shedding a tear. However, the censors, notwithstanding their quarrels, joined in many useful regulations. They drove out of Rome several masters, who had opened schools, though no ways qualified for that important employment.

The ensuing year, Sext. Julius Cæsar (N) and L. Marcius Philippus were raised to the consulate. During their administration, M. Livius Drusus, tribune of the people, occasioned, though undesignedly, the breaking out of that unfortunate war, at the very gates of Rome, which historians sometimes call the social war, or the war of the allies, and sometimes the Marston war, because it began in the country of the Marsti. 86.

c Drusus was descended of an illustrious family, and had improved the great talents nature had given him, by the study of eloquence. He was a sincere friend to his country, and therefore, with a view to the public welfare, he attempted to remedy those disorders which had been introduced into the administration. But his very remedies increased them, and rendered the distempers of the republic incurable. Though there had been of late no open sedition, he observed, that a general dissatisfaction reigned in the three orders of men, who made up the whole body of the commonwealth. The cognizance of civil causes had been, by one of C. Gracchus's laws, taken from the senate and given to the knights; and this the conscript fathers could not bear, but insisted on their being reinstated in their ancient privileges. On the other hand, knights would by no means part with a prerogative, which had been given them by a law passed in the comitia. The people murmured, because the execution of the Gracchian law was neglected, and no care was taken to assign them lands; but the nobility refused to part with any of the lands they possessed. The Italian allies were no less dissatisfied than the senate and people. They aspired at the right of suffrage, and at the offices in the republic, which they had so much assisted in her conquests. They remonstrated, that they paid considerable taxes; that in the time of war their countries raised double the number of forces that were raised in Rome; that the commonwealth owed partly to their valour that prodigious power which she had acquired; and lastly, that it was but just they should share the honours of a state which they had helped to aggrandize, both with their arms and treasures. Now Drusus formed a scheme to reconcile all orders of men, and put an end to all discontents, which, he foresaw, would in process of time, if not removed, produce a general insurrection. A glorious design! but now impracticable. He began with endeavouring to reconcile the senators and knights, thinking he had found out an effectual expedient for gaining so important a point. He proposed to restore to the senate the cognizance of civil causes, which had been conferred on the knights, and to make that second order amends, by admitting three hundred of them into the senate. But this scheme was no sooner proposed, than both the bodies, which he designed to reconcile, declared against it with great vehemence. The senators scorned to admit into their body such a number of men far inferior to them in birth, which, they said, would depreciate the senatorial dignity. On the other hand, such of the knights, as had reason to fear they should not be in the number of the three hundred designed for senators, declared, that they would not by any means, or for any equivalent whatsoever, suffer their order to be deprived of a jurisdiction, which made them very considerable in Rome. Q. Servilius Cæpio put himself at the head of the knights, and the consul Marcius Philippus appeared for the senate, senate, to oppose the designed accommodation. Philippus, who was a man of a warm and fiery temper, had the boldness to interrupt the tribune Drusus, while he was one day haranguing the people from the rostra, and to command him silence. Hereupon one of the tribune's officers collaring the consul, handled him so roughly, that the blood gushed out of his nose. After this Drusus, who had the people on his side, ordered the consul to be carried to prison, for attempting to interrupt a tribune in the exercise of his authority. The tribune finding his well-meant scheme opposed, with great warmth, both by the knights and senators, to ingratiate himself with the people, proposed a law for distributing gratis among the poor what bread they wanted. He represented, that there was no danger of the treasury's being exhausted by this bounty, since immense sums were annually brought into it from the provinces; that there were at that time lodged in the temple of Saturn, where the public treasures were kept, 1620829 pounds weight of gold; that the public treasury ought not to be like the sea, which swallows up every thing and returns nothing, &c. The law met with great opposition, but at length passed to the universal satisfaction of the indigent citizens. In the next place, Drusus made it his business to gain the affections of the Italian allies, especially of the Latins. In order to this, he proposed a law for investing them with all the privileges of Roman citizens. But this law was opposed with great violence, not only by the senators and knights, but even by the people, who could not bear the thoughts of making those their fellow-citizens, whom they looked upon as their subjects. In the mean time, the Italian allies flocked to Rome from all parts to support their protector. But, finding they could not by his means gain their point, they entered into a plot, without his knowledge, to extort by force what they despaired of getting by interest. Some of the leading men among them formed a design of assassinating the consuls, during the ceremony of the Feriae Latinae, which was annually performed on the hill of Alba after the election of the great magistrates.

Drusus.

But Drusus being informed of the plot, notwithstanding all the care the conspirators took to conceal it, he immediately acquainted the consuls with the wicked designs of the allies, and by that means saved their lives. But those, whom the well-meaning tribune had saved from a conspiracy, conspired to destroy him. While he was one day returning from the forum, where he had harangued the people in behalf of the allies, a great crowd of people attended him to the door of his house, where he was stabbed with a knife, which the ruffian left in the wound, and then made his escape.

When Drusus felt himself wounded, he cried out, Ungrateful republic! Wilt thou ever find a man more zealous for thy true interest, than I have been? And a few hours after expired. It was never discovered who had hired the assassin; but the suspicion of this black attempt fell on the consul Philippus, on Cæpio, and on Varus, one of his fellow-tribunes, who soon after proposed a law, declaring traitors and enemies to the state all those, who should move for granting to the allies the prerogative of citizenship. Drusus was a man of an unspotted character, and for love to his country was no-ways inferior to the greatest heroes of Rome. He dedicated all his thoughts, cares, and life itself to the service of his republic. But, as the evil was now become incurable, all his attempts, for preserving the state from impending ruin, were unsuccessful. Not many years after the ungrateful republic lost her liberty; and the sovereign power, which Drusus's measures might have prevented, soon devolved to his family; for he was the grandfather of Livia, the wife of Augustus, and consequently the great grandfather of the emperor Tiberius.

The allies arm

THE death of Drusus, thus basely assassinated for attempting to procure the right of citizenship to the Italian allies, provoked them to such a degree, that they began to arm with a design to do themselves justice. Pompeidius Silo, the most famous general among the Marfi, put himself at the head of ten thousand men, and marched towards Rome, which he designed to surprise and plunder. But Cn. Domitius, his old friend, meeting him on the road as he was going to his country-house, prevailed upon him to lay aside his design, and return to his own country. As the republic was threatened with a war, two men of distinguished merit were promoted to the consulate, viz. L. Julius Cæsar and P. Rutilius Lupus. In the very beginning of their administration, the Marfi, Peligni, Samnites, Campanians, and Lucanians, and in short all the provinces from the Liris to the Adriatic, revolted at once. Rome had never engaged more formidable enemies. As they had all served in the armies of the republic, they

- a they were as well disciplined as her legions, and their leaders had learnt the art of war under her most famous commanders. It is said of the Marfi in particular, that Rome had never gained a victory, in which they had not a great share. The first step they took in their revolt was, to erect themselves into a republic in opposition to that of Rome. Corfinium, a great and strong city in the country of the Peligni, was made the capital of their new republic. Thither were carried all the hostages given by the cities in the revolt, and prodigious stores of arms and provisions. The city of Asculum Picenum among the rest resolved to send her hostages to Corfinium, which Q. Servilius, who governed that province in quality of proconsul, no sooner heard, than he flew to Asculum, and entering it, threatened the inhabitants with the vengeance of Rome. But they, despising his menaces, ran to arms, and cut in pieces the proconsul, Fonteius his lieutenant, and all the Romans they found in their territory. War being thus openly declared, Rome made what haste she could to levy troops, and appoint the consuls their provinces. Cæsar was ordered into Samnium, and Rutilius into the country of the Marfi. The latter chose for his lieutenant-general Cn. Pompeius, the father of Pompey the Great, C. Marius, Q. Cæpio, C. Perperna, and Valerius Messala. Cæsar nominated for his chief officers P. Lentulus, Cornelius Sylla, T. Didius, P. Licinius Crassus, and M. Marcellus. Thus were all the commanders of note in Rome employed in this new war. Neither were these lieutenants to serve barely as subalterns; every one had a body of troops under his command with the title of proconsul: nor were they confined to particular provinces or districts; every one was ordered to go where-ever he was wanted, and all directed to assist each other. While Rome was taking these wise measures, the allies chose also their consuls and prætors, and formed a senate consisting of five hundred persons to govern their new state; so that Italy was now, for the first time, divided into two great and powerful republics. In the mean time, Cn. Pompeius, marching with a detachment from Rome to revenge the death of Servilius on the Asculani, attempted to take their city by assault. But the inhabitants made an unexpected sally, put the Romans to flight, and pursued them with great slaughter. After this the two consuls took the field; Julius Cæsar entered Samnium, and Rutilius the country of the Marfi. The Latins, who still continued faithful to the republic, furnished their contingent of troops as usual. The Hetrurians likewise, the Umbrians, and the eastern kings sent large supplies to support Rome in so dangerous a war. The faithful Minatius Magius, whom Velleius Paterculus reckons among his ancestors, though a native of Asculum, raised as many men for the Romans as amounted to the number of a legion. Sertorius, at this time quæstor in Cisalpine Gaul, brought a reinforcement of Gauls to the relief of his country, fought the allies with his usual bravery, and having lost one of his eyes in this war, he ever after gloried in that honourable deformity^w.

- c THE country of the Marfi, which had fallen to Rutilius, was defended by two able generals, Presenteius and Vettius Cato. The former was opposed by C. Perperna, who commanded a great body of troops under the consul. The Roman immediately offered the enemy battle, which Presenteius did not decline. Both armies fought with unparalleled bravery; but the Romans were at last put to the rout, after having lost about four thousand men. A few days after this defeat, Vettius Cato, who opposed Rutilius, being informed that the consul designed to pass the river Telonus in the night, lay in ambush for the consular army, attacked them unexpectedly, and drove them back into the river. In this action eight thousand Romans were either cut in pieces, or drowned in the river. The consul himself was killed with a great many officers of distinction. The attack was so sudden, that Marius, who was encamped on the banks of the river at a small distance from the consul, had no notice of it, till the Telonus brought a great number of dead bodies to his camp. The news of this overthrow, and the sight of the consul's body, which was brought to Rome, filled the city with terror. For fear of a surprise guards were placed at all the gates, the number of the centinels on the ramparts was increased, and all the avenues to the city well guarded. These were necessary precautions during a war, wherein the soldiers of the two opposite parties were dressed and armed after the same manner, spoke the same language, and were well acquainted with the customs of each other. The legions, which Rutilius had commanded, were divided between Marius and Cæpio. The latter suffered himself to be shamefully over-reached by Pompædus Silo, commander in chief of the allies. He came as a suppliant to the proconsul, accompanied by two young slaves richly a dressed, whom he pretended to be his sons, each of them carrying in his hand a lump of lead, the one covered with a thin plate of gold, and the other of silver, which he said were the presents his children came to lay at his feet. The proconsul received Pompædus with great politeness, and admitted him into his confidence; when the crafty Italian, pretending to lead him to a place where he might surprise the enemy, conducted him into narrow defiles, where the proconsul was slain, and the best part of his army cut in pieces*. Thus fell Q. Cæpio, who, by his warm opposition to Drusus's scheme, had been the chief author of the present war.

THESE successes raised the courage of the allies, who under their various leaders gained considerable advantages over the Romans. Judacilius, Afranius, and Ventidius, three officers of distinction among the confederates, having united their forces, obliged Cn. Pompeius to shelter himself behind the walls of Firmum in Picenum. Marius Egnatius surprised the city of Venafrum in Campania, and cut in pieces the Roman garison, consisting of two cohorts. The city of Nola surrendered to Aponius, one of the consuls of the allies, and delivered up to him the Roman garison, to the number of two thousand men, with the prætor L. Posthumius, who commanded them. The same Aponius seized the cities of Stabiae, Liternum, and Salernum, and over-ran all Campania. In Lucania, Lamponius drove M. Licinius out of the field, killed eight hundred of his men, and obliged him to take refuge in the city of Grumentum. Judacilius reduced almost all Apulia, and brought the cities of Canusium and Venusia over to the confederates^y.

IN Samnium, the consul Julius Cæsar was defeated by Vettius Cato the Samnite, and forced to take shelter in a neighbouring city, after having lost two thousand men. However, he soon left the place of his retreat to relieve Acerræ, which was closely besieged by Aponius. That general, having released Oxyntas the son of Jugurtha from his confinement in the city of Venusia, brought him to his army, and there treated him as king. The Numidians, who served in the consul's army, no sooner heard that the son of their old king was fighting for the allies, than they began to desert by companies; insomuch, that the consul was obliged to part with all his Numidian cavalry, and send them back into Africa. This diminution of the consular troops raised the courage of Aponius, who came to insult the Romans at the very gates of their camp. But Cæsar sallying out unexpectedly, fell so briskly on the enemy, that they were forced to retire after having lost six thousand men. As this was the first victory the Romans had gained over the allies, it occasioned great joy both at Rome and in the army. The senate rewarded the brave consul by confirming the title of Imperator (O), which the soldiers had given him on the field of battle. In the mean time, Marius, being attacked in his camp by Herrius Acinius, the chief of the Marucini, put the enemy to flight, and forced them to take shelter in a place which they deemed inaccessible. But Sylla, whom they did not expect, passing accidentally that way with his flying camp, attacked them, made a terrible slaughter of their troops, and completed the victory with the death of their general; which was no small mortification to Marius. At the same time Servius Sulpicius, having defeated in a pitched battle the Peligni and reduced their whole country, marched to the relief of Cn. Pompeius, who was besieged in Firmum by Afranius, attacked his camp, killed him in the action, and cut most of his troops in pieces. After this victory, Pompeius laid siege to Asculum, whither the remains of the enemy's army had fled for refuge. In the country of the Marfi, Marius, after having continued several months in a state of inaction, to inure his troops to discipline, at length took the field, and gave battle. But he was sensible in the action, that he was not now the same man. As he was in the sixty-eighth year of his age, and subject to various distempers, his strength and former vivacity had failed him. His troops, not being animated by his example, as they expected, sustained the first shock but faintly, and then fled in disorder to their camp. The bad success of this battle was such a mortification to Marius, that, under pretence of his infirmities, he resigned the command, and returned to Rome^z.

(O) In the times of the republic the title of Imperator was an occasional mark of honour, which the armies sometimes bestowed on their generals in their acclamations, and which the senate confirmed in favour of those who had signalized themselves by important victories. But under the Cæsars it became a title of sovereignty.

- ^a THE fame of this victory gained by the Marfi induced the Umbrians and Hetrurians to declare for the confederates. It was therefore necessary for Rome to increase the number of her forces, in proportion as the number of her enemies increased; but as the capital alone was not able to furnish as many as were requisite to complete the many legions that were to be raised, the senate, by a step which was never taken but in the utmost danger, ordered the freed-men to be enlisted, and formed twelve cohorts of them, which were employed as garisons in the maritime cities; so that Rome could send all her legions, under the command of Lucius Porcius and Aulus Plautius, against the united forces of the Umbrians and Hetrurians, whom they defeated in a pitched battle, but not without the loss of many brave legionaries ^a. Freed-men enlisted at Rome.
- ^b As the consular year was near expiring, the consul Julius Cæsar, desirous to put an end to the war before he went out of his office, drew up a law, which was confirmed by the senate, and enacted, That all the nations in Italy, whose alliance with Rome was indisputable, should enjoy the rights of Roman citizens. This law, which was ever after called the Julian law, much abated the ardor of the enemy, and drew off several nations from the confederacy; however, the war was still carried on by the Lucanians, Samnites, Marfi, Picentes, &c. The new consuls therefore, Cn. Pompeius Strabo and L. Porcius Cato, no sooner entered upon their office, than they took the field. The former, who was the father of Pompey the Great, and called Strabo because he squinted, went to carry on the siege of Asculum, and destroyed a whole army of Marfi, who came to relieve it. Five thousand of them were killed upon the spot, with their general Francus, a man of great bravery and experience in war, and the rest perished with hunger and cold among the Apennines, where they had taken shelter. However, Asculum still held out against the consular army, depending on relief from the brave Judacilius, a native of that place. That intrepid commander ordered his countrymen to make a sally at a time appointed, promising to force his way into the city through the Roman army. Accordingly he made the attempt at the head of eight cohorts, and, tho' not seconded by the Asculans, bravely performed his promise, and entered the place; a glorious action, not inferior to the illustrious exploits of the bravest Romans! Having thus forced his way sword in hand into the city, he first put to death those who had prevented the sally, and then, finding he could not force the Romans to raise the siege, he put an end to his life by poison, that he might not survive the ruin of his country ^b. An army of Marfi destroyed.
- ^c IN the mean time, Aulus Sempronius Asellio, the prætor urbanus, having exasperated the rich by many judgments he gave against usury, was murdered by them, as he was offering a sacrifice to Castor and Pollux in the forum. The senate ordered inquiries to be made after the authors of so black an attempt; but the money of the usurers stopped the mouths both of the accusers and witnesses; so that this notorious and scandalous iniquity escaped unpunished. However, the tribune M. Plautius Sylvanus, to put a stop to the licentiousness of the people, made a law, whereby it was declared a capital crime for any citizen to come into the comitium with arms of any kind, or to disturb the judges in their courts. The same tribune, by another law, deprived the Roman knights of their jurisdiction, which they abused in a most flagrant manner. The Plautian law enacted, that each tribe should chuse fifteen men out of their own body, to whom the cognizance of civil causes should be committed. By this means men only of known probity, of what rank soever they were, had the charge of administering justice, which was done with great impartiality. This zealous tribune, in conjunction with Caius Papirius Carbo, one of his colleagues, put the last hand to the Julian law, which we have mentioned above, in favour of the allies, and got it confirmed by the people, and published in the following words: All the citizens of the allied cities, who shall be in Italy at the time of the promulgation of this law, shall be deemed citizens of Rome, provided they register their names with one of the three prætors within sixty days. This brought the Italians to Rome in such numbers, that the new citizens soon became more numerous than the old; but, lest this should make strangers masters of the elections, and consequently of the republic, the new censors, Lucius Cæsar and P. Licinius Crassus, did not incorporate them in the thirty-five Roman tribes, but formed them into new tribes, who were to vote last. By this means all matters were determined by a majority of voices, before the new tribes gave their suffrages. The allies were sensible of this artifice, but dissembled their dissatisfaction. The prætor Asellio assassinated.

dissatisfaction, being resolved, when an opportunity offered, to put themselves upon a level with the old inhabitants of Rome ^c.

The Vestini under Vettius. Cato defeated. DURING these regulations at Rome, the war was pursued with vigor in the provinces which continued in the revolt. The consul Pompeius, having turned the siege of Asculum into a blockade, led his best troops against Vettius Cato, who covered the country of the Vestini with a great army, defeated him in a pitched battle, and reduced several cities. He afterwards granted Vettius a friendly conference, at which Cicero, who was making his first campaign under the consul, was present. How this conference ended, we are not told; but all historians agree, that the consul Pompeius put an end to the war with the Vestini ^d. In the country of the Marfi, the consul Porcius Cato, after having gained considerable advantages over that warlike people, resolved to force their camp on the banks of the lake Fucinus; but he was killed in the attempt by a dart discharged at him, as was suspected, not by the enemy, but by young Marius, who had quarrelled with him some days before, for speaking contemptuously of his father. The Marfi took advantage of this accident, put the Romans to the rout, and pursued them with great slaughter. On the other hand, the proconsul Cosconius defeated and killed the famous Marius Egnatius in a pitched battle. Upon his death, Trebatius the Samnite took upon him the command of the army; but he was likewise overcome in a second battle, and forced to take refuge in Canussum, after having lost in the action and the pursuit above fifteen thousand men. Then Cosconius over-ran the countries of the Larinates, Venusians, and Pediculi, and reduced them to obedience. The confederates began now to be in pain for Corfinium, the capital of their new republic, and therefore removed their senate and magazines to Efernina in the country of the Samnites. They also sent an embassy to Mithridates in Asia, who had now declared against Rome, hoping to obtain from him such supplies, as would enable them to recover their affairs; but Sylla, the hero of this campaign, frustrated their expectations. He besieged the city of Stabiae in Campania, took it by assault, and gave it up to be plundered by his soldiers. He then marched against the Roman army, who had just murdered their general Posthumius; but, instead of punishing them, he, to their great surprise, treated them with uncommon civility, and added them to his own legions. When his army was thus reinforced, he undertook the siege of Pompeii, a strong city in the neighbourhood of Stabiae. Cluentius, one of the generals of the allies, hastened to the relief of the besieged; but was repulsed with great loss. Cluentius, having not long after received a reinforcement of Gauls, appeared again in the field, and insulted Sylla within reach of his intrenchments; but a Gaulish champion, who challenged the bravest Roman to a single combat at the head of the two armies, being killed by a young Mauritanian, the rest, struck with a panic, fled, and the troops of Cluentius with them. Sylla pursued them, cut thirty thousand of the fugitives in pieces, and then returning to the siege of Pompeii, reduced that important place. From Pompeii he marched to Nola, whither Cluentius had fled with the remains of his shattered army. He attacked him anew under the walls of that city, killed him in the battle, and with him twenty thousand Samnites, who had flocked from all parts to join him after his first defeat. The victorious general, having taken and plundered the enemy's camp, brought his legions into Hirpinia, which he reduced, after having made himself master of Asculana, the metropolis of the country. He then fell upon Samnium, where he was surrounded in narrow passes by the famous Aponius, and reduced to the utmost distress. However, he found means to recover this false step, and escape, when all his men looked upon themselves as lost. He agreed to a truce with Aponius, then stole out of his camp in the dark, and taking a compass, fell on the enemy's rear, while they were busy in plundering the deserted camp, so vigorously and so unexpectedly, that the Samnites, seized with terror, fled, without making any resistance. Having now no enemy to contend with in the field, he marched to Bovianum, and took it by storm ^e.

The city of Asculum reduced. In the mean time, the consul Pompeius, after a long siege, reduced the city of Asculum, and punished the inhabitants, who had murdered a Roman prætor, with the utmost severity. He saved a small number of their chiefs to grace his triumph, and caused all the other persons of distinction in the place to be put to death. To the rest of the inhabitants he granted life and liberty; but confiscated their lands, and gave their

- a their houses up to be plundered by his foldiers: When winter approached, the generals returned to Rome, where Sylla, who had eclipsed all the other commanders during this campaign, was rewarded with the consulate: He had also interest enough to get Sylla chosen consul. Q. Rufus Pompeius, whose son had lately married his daughter Cornelia, chosen for his colleague. The consul Pompeius, on his return to Rome was honoured with a triumph, which many illustrious captives graced, and among the rest P. Ventidius and his wife, who carried in her arms her young son, whom we shall see in the course of this history consul in Rome, and riding himself in triumph to the capitol, after having conquered the most warlike and formidable enemy Rome ever engaged.
- b As soon as Sylla entered on his new office, he began to use all his interest; both with the patricians and plebeians, to get the command of the army, which was to be employed against Mithridates, conferred upon himself; but in this he was opposed by Marius, who, tho' worn out with many distempers, and insufficient for that service on account of his age, was still desirous of appearing at the head of an army. Marius jealous of Sylla's glory. In order to supplant his rival Sylla, he contracted a strict friendship with P. Sulpicius, The tribune of the people, whose character Plutarch gives us in the following words: Sulpicius: Sulpicius, says he, excelled all men in wickedness; he was a compound of cruelty, impudence, and all sorts of crimes, which, how enormous soever, he committed with the greatest confidence and unconcern. He kept three thousand desperate men in constant-pay, and had constantly about him a company of young knights, whom he styled his antisenatorial band.
- c The seditious tribune, to strengthen his own and Marius's party, passed several laws in favour of the people, whom by that means he gained over to his interest. He then applied himself wholly to the securing of the Italian allies; and, in order to this, he proposed a law, enacting, That all the inhabitants of Italy, who had lately obtained the right of citizenship, should be blended with the other citizens, incorporated into the thirty-five tribes, and consequently should have the very same right of voting, each in his tribe, as others had, without any distinction. This was Proposes a law in favour of the allies. effectually making himself master of a majority of voices on all occasions; for he did not doubt, but all the new citizens would be under his influence, and would vote as he should direct.
- d BEFORE the comitia met for the accepting or rejecting of this law, Rome had the satisfaction to hear, that her generals against the allies were attended with uncommon success. Ser. Sulpicius brought the whole country of the Marucini under subjection. The Marucini, Vestini, Peligni submitted of their own accord to the old consul Cn. Pompeius, who was returned, after his triumph, to his camp at Asculum; nay, they even promised to deliver up their leader Vettius: but, as they were dragging him along in chains, a faithful slave, thinking it his duty to deliver his master from the insults of his haughty enemies, first stabbed him, and then himself. L. Licinius Muræna and Q. Cæcilius Pius obliged the Marsi, among whom the war had begun, to sue for peace; but the brave Pompeius still supported the sinking cause at the head of twenty thousand slaves, whom he had just armed. Against him marched Cæcilius Pius and Ser. Sulpicius, and gave him battle, in which his army was routed and he himself killed. The Marucini, Vestini, &c. reduced.
- e The only place that now held out for the allies was Nola; and Sylla set out from Rome to reduce it: but he was soon recalled, to restrain the insolence of the tribune Sulpicius, who carried all before him at Rome, not by persuasion, but by violence and force. He had already appointed a day for the comitia to meet, in order to accept the law for incorporating the allies into the thirty-five tribes. Sylla, upon his arrival, joined his colleague Pompeius Rufus, and both agreed to order several feriæ or holidays to be kept, during which it was not lawful for the people to meet or transact any business. Disturbances raised in Rome by the tribune Sulpicius. This they did to gain time; but Sulpicius no sooner heard, that the consuls had proclaimed feriæ, than he left his house, and attended by his guards, whom he ordered to conceal daggers under their robes, marched strait to the temple of Castor, where the consuls had assembled the senate. The conscript fathers were surprised when they saw Sulpicius appear, and more so, when they heard him insolently command them to disannul the consular decree, which ordered feriæ to be kept. The consuls opposed the repealing of the decree, and several of the senators did the same. Hereupon the furious tribune let loose his antisenatorial band upon them, who, drawing their daggers, fell upon the defenceless senators. The consul Pompeius escaped in the croud; but his son, a young senator, who had lately married Sylla's daughter, The son of the consul Pompeius killed.

killed by the assassins. Sylla, being closely pursued by Sulpicius's ruffians, took refuge in Marius's house; which they not suspecting, hurried by, so that Sylla escaped falling into their hands. Marius, tho' naturally cruel and revengeful, did not care to stain his hands with the blood of a consul, who had taken refuge in his house. He only forced him to swear, that he would abolish the feriæ, which he had appointed. After exacting this oath, Marius himself let Sylla escape by a back-door: and Sylla kept his word; for he went directly to the comitium, and, in the presence of the people, repealed the feriæ. By this compliance he so far pleased Sulpicius, that the tribune did not deprive him of his office; whereas he prevailed upon the people, whose suffrages he had at his command, to depose Pompeius^f.

AND now Sylla, not thinking himself any longer safe in Rome, where the opposite party prevailed, left the city, and repaired in all haste to his camp near Nola. The feriæ being repealed and both consuls fled, Sulpicius, now absolute master at Rome, got the law passed, incorporating the allies into the thirty-five tribes, and at the same time extorted from the people another in favour of Marius. The senate had already invested Sylla with the command of the army, which was to be employed against Mithridates; but Sulpicius got a law passed, enacting, That the consul should continue in Italy, and that Marius, tho' now only a private man, should command the Roman legions in Asia. Marius no sooner received his commission, than he dispatched two military tribunes, one of whom was Gratedius, a relation of his own, to acquaint the troops under the command of Sylla, that their general was changed, and that they were no longer to obey Sylla, but Marius, whom the Roman people had appointed to carry on the war against the king of Pontus; but the soldiers, who were greatly attached to Sylla, instead of obeying the orders that were brought from Marius, buried the two messengers under a heap of stones, and cried out with one voice, Let us march to Rome; let us revenge there the injuries done to the consular dignity, and the oppression of our fellow citizens. On the other hand, Marius, by way of reprisal for the death of the two tribunes, put Sylla's friends in the city to the sword, and plundered their houses; which Sylla no sooner heard, than he determined to march strait to Rome. His army consisted of six legions, who, being all warmed with his spirit, breathed nothing but vengeance and plunder; but several officers, unwilling to turn their arms against their own country, quitted the service. On the other hand, many who disliked the violence of Marius and Sulpicius, left Rome, and took refuge in Sylla's camp; so that the road from Nola to Rome was crowded with people hurrying to and fro, some from the camp to the city, others from the city to the camp. Many retired into the country, to avoid taking either side in this civil war. Q. Pompeius, the other consul, whom Sulpicius had deposed, hastened to join his colleague with all the troops he could get together.

Marius and Sulpicius being informed, that the two consuls were advancing, at the head of a numerous army, towards the city, and having themselves no troops to oppose them, prevailed upon the conscript fathers to send two prætors, Brutus and Servilius, to meet Sylla upon the road, and stop him in his march. The prætors delivered their message to Sylla in terms a little too haughty; which so incensed the soldiery, that they broke their fasces, tore off their purple robes, and would have cut them in pieces, with their attendants; had not Sylla restrained their fury. When the Romans saw the two magistrates return without the ensigns and marks of their dignity, and in great disorder, they concluded, that all respect for the laws was laid aside, and that violence and superior power was thenceforth to determine all things. Marius and Sulpicius, who had only a handful of factious men to oppose a powerful and enraged enemy, dispatched, in the name of the senate, messenger after messenger, to amuse the consul with rambling proposals and retard his march. The consul, who was well apprised of their design, to elude one artifice with another, pretended to acquiesce in their proposals, and, in the presence of the messengers, ordered the ground to be marked out for a camp; but, as soon as the deputies were gone, he detached a strong party, under the command of L. Bassilius and C. Mummius, with orders to secure one of the gates, and marched himself at the head of his legions after them with such expedition, that he was in sight of Rome in a few hours. The party he had sent before seized the Esquiline gate, and Sylla reinforced that detachment with a whole legion. The consul Pompeius, at the head of another legion, made himself a himself master of the gate Collina. A third legion was posted at the head of the bridge Sublicius, to shut up the entrance into the city on the side of the river. A fourth legion was ordered to patrol round the walls, near the gate Cælimontana; and guard the approaches to it. The two other legions were ordered to march into the city sword in hand. When they came into the street that faced the Esquiline gate, Marius and Sylla enters Rome by Sulpicius appeared at the head of a company tumultuously assembled. Hereupon the trumpets of the consular army sounded the charge, which roused the martial ardor of the citizens, who were all formed to war; but, as they had no arms, they got up to the tops of their houses, and fearing the town should be plundered by Sylla's armed legions, discharged from thence such showers of tiles and stones upon them, as made the legionaries first halt, and then retire to the very gate. Upon this Sylla flew to the head of his legions, ordered them to advance, and taking a torch in his hand, threatened to set fire to the houses, if the citizens did not immediately desist from all hostilities. This terrified the people, who remained now only spectators of the battle between the two parties. In vain did Marius and Sulpicius call them to their assistance; no-body offered to take up arms, not even the slaves, tho' they proclaimed liberty by sound of trumpet to all those who should join them. Marius, not being able, with a handful of seditious men, to withstand the consul's regular troops, was driven back, from street to street, to the temple of the goddess Tellus, where he made a stand, and charged the legions with great vigor; which obliged Sylla to send for some legionaries he had left at one of the gates. At the sight of this reinforcement, Marius, fearing he should be surrounded, retired, first to the capitol, and from thence to one of the gates of the city, which he was glad to leave, for fear of falling into the hands of his enemies. And now Sylla, seeing himself master of the city, posted guards in all the open places, to prevent disorders. He and his colleague were in motion all night, to restrain the soldiers, and to prevent their pillaging the houses of their fellow citizens. He even caused some of his legionaries to be severely punished for entering a private house, and plundering it. As soon as it was day, the two consuls assembled the people in the comitium, and harangued them with as much tranquillity, as if there had been no blood shed in Rome. Sylla, who was an excellent orator, after having deplored the calamities of the commonwealth, in terms no less moving than lively, proposed the following laws, which, he said, would reform the many abuses that had crept into the government; 1st, That no law should be brought before the people, till it had been seen and approved of by the senate. 2^{dly}, That the comitia should not for the future be held by tribes, but by centuries. 3^{dly}, That no citizen, who had been tribune of the people, should be capable of any other magistracy. 4^{thly}, That all the laws of the tribune Sulpicius should be declared void and null. These proposals coming from a man, who was at the head of six legions and master of Rome, were readily accepted by the people.

e In the next place, articles of impeachment were drawn up against Caius Marius, his son, the tribune Sulpicius, several other tribunes of the people, two senators, and a great many of their adherents. They were all proscribed, declared enemies to Rome, and a reward set upon their heads. The decree of the senate proscribing them was proclaimed by sound of trumpet in Rome, and in all the provinces subject to the republic. Every subject, friend, or ally of the republic was ordered to seize and put them to death, where-ever they should be found. At the same time Sylla detached troops to all parts. Sulpicius, being betrayed by one of his slaves, was immediately seized, and his head struck off by one of Sylla's horsemen. His head was brought to Rome, and fixed upon a stake over-against the rostra, where he had made so many seditious speeches. The treacherous slave received at once the reward and punishment due to his treachery. Sylla set him at liberty, ordered the money to be paid him for the discovery of Sulpicius; but at the same time commanded him to be thrown down headlong from the Tarpeian rock for betraying his master.

f THE people could not behold the head of one of their magistrates exposed to public view, without a secret indignation. The senate likewise murmured at the proscription of Marius, from a natural compassion, always shewn to heroes, when fallen into distress. Tho' the fathers were well pleased to see the people humbled; yet, jealous of the honour and dignity of their body, they could not bear, that their colleagues should be proscribed like villains and thieves. The people in general reproached Sylla

Sylla with ingratitude, for condemning to death a man, who, not long before, had saved his life, when he was at his mercy. If Marius had given way to Sulpicius, who was for dispatching Sylla, he had, by his death, been master of all; but he chose rather to spare his life, for which Sylla, when it came to his turn to be uppermost, made him a very ungrateful and ungenerous acknowledgment. These reflections alienated the minds of all from Sylla, as he experienced at the next elections; for Nonnius, his sister's son, and Servius Sulpicius, who had long served under him, were excluded from the consulate, tho' earnestly recommended by him; but he, instead of resenting such treatment, affected to be well pleased with it, saying; That he saw with joy the people by his means restored to their full liberty of chusing whom they pleased; nay, to reconcile the minds of the people to him, he suffered them to raise to the consulate L. Cornelius Cinna, who was of the contrary faction, after having prevailed upon him in private to renounce, in a most solemn manner, his former principles and engagements with Marius, and to swear an inviolable attachment to the party of the senate. This oath Cinna took in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, adding to it the following imprecation; If I do not punctually observe the oath in its full extent, may I be thrown out of the city, in the same manner, as I throw this stone out of my hand; at which words he threw on the ground a stone which he held in his hand.

His character. Cinna was a man of no principles, of most depraved manners; furious and inconsiderate in all his undertakings, wholly addicted to the popular faction, a declared enemy to the nobility, and capable of supporting the interest of his faction, with a courage and constancy worthy of a better citizen. The colleague given him by the tribes was Cn. Octavius, a man of an unblemished character, and whose love for his country was the governing principle of his life. And now Sylla was wholly intent on making the best use of the little time he and his colleague Pompeius were to enjoy the consulate. Their chief aim was, to rid the republic of the two Marii, father and son, for whom, tho' proscribed, interest was secretly made in Rome. A great price was set upon their heads, and squadrons of horse, sent out in quest of them, had been long scouring the neighbouring country, with orders to bring them to Rome dead or alive.

THE sufferings and dangers of Marius in his flight and exile were very extraordinary, and would be as affecting, if we could forget his crimes, and remember only his victories. As soon as he was got out of Rome, all those who attended him in his flight, separated and dispersed; and night coming on, he retired, with young Marius and Granius, his wife's son by a former husband, to a small house he had near Rome. From thence he sent his son for provisions to a neighbouring farm of his father-in-law Mucius (P); but, in the mean time, being informed, that a party of horse was searching for him in that neighbourhood, he left his house, without waiting for his son's return, and, attended by Granius alone, hastened to Ostia, where a friend of his, called Numerius, had provided a ship for him against all events. He immediately went on board, and weighing anchor, coasted along the Italian shore. He was in no small apprehension of one Geminus, a leading man in Terracina and his sworn enemy. He therefore directed the seamen to keep clear of that place, and avoid a shore, which might prove fatal to him: which they were willing to do; but the wind shifting on a sudden and blowing hard, the mariners, fearing the ship would not be able to weather the storm, and seeing Marius indisposed and sea-sick, tacked about, and with great difficulty made Circæum. There they landed Marius, who, oppressed with hunger, exhausted with the fatigues of the sea, and surrounded with dangers on all sides, rambled about the fields in the utmost distress, it being danger-

(P) This Mucius was the famous Quintus Mucius Scaevola, one of the most virtuous and learned citizens of Rome. When Sylla appeared in Rome after the defeat of Marius, and all things gave way to the will of the conqueror, Scaevola alone had courage enough to oppose, in Sylla's presence, the sentence of condemnation, which the senators were going to pass against Marius. ous for him to meet people, and no less so to meet none, by reason of the extreme want to which he was reduced.

ON the other hand, Marius the son ran no less dangers at the house of Mucius, where he made all the haste he could to provide himself with such things as he wanted, and to pack them up; but, day-light overtaking him, he had like to have been discovered by a party of Sylla's horse, who appeared at some distance riding full speed towards the farm; but the faithful slave, who took care of it, found out an expedient to save the life of the young Roman. He hid him in a cart loaded with beans, and then putting to his horses, drove towards the horsemen, as if he were going with his cart to Rome. The soldiers passed by him, and breaking into the house, searched every corner of it; but in the mean time the slave conveyed young Marius to his wife, who immediately supplied him with money and provisions. As soon as it grew dark, he took leave of his wife, and made to the sea-side, where he went on board a ship, which was bound for Africa, and ready to set sail. He had a good passage, and arrived safe in a country, where the great Marius was known and reveredⁱ.

IN the mean time, the father, wandering about the fields in the neighbourhood of Circæum, towards the evening met with some cowherds, of whom he begged a morsel of bread; but they had not wherewithal to relieve him. Some of them, knowing Marius, advised him to be gone as soon as possible; for they had seen a little beyond the place a party of horse in search of him. He therefore turned out of the high-road, and, tho' ready to faint for hunger and weakness, got with much-ado to a neighbouring wood, where he passed the night very uncomfortably. The next day, pinched with hunger, and willing to make use of the little strength he had left, before it was quite exhausted, he travelled by the sea-side, amusing Granius, and the few domestics he had with him, with several stories, to lessen their fatigues and encourage them not to desert him. He told them, that, when he was a child, an eagle's airy, with seven young ones in it, fell into his lap; and that his parents, being much surprised at the accident, consulted the augurs about it, who answered, that the child would be seven times possessed of the supreme power and authority in his country. This was, no doubt, invented by Marius, to keep up the courage of those who were with him. Plutarch tells us, that an eagle never hatches more than two young ones at a time; but, be that as it will, it is certain, that Marius, in his exile and greatest extremities, used often to say, that he still entertained hopes of a seventh consulship^k.

WHEN Marius and his company were within twenty furlongs of Minturnæ, they discovered a troop of horse making up to them with all speed, and at the same time two small vessels under sail near the shore. Hereupon they immediately threw themselves into the sea, and swam towards the ships. Granius soon reached one of them; but Marius, whose body was heavy and unwieldy, was with great difficulty borne above the water by two slaves, and put into the other vessel. He was scarce got on board, when the soldiers, who were in quest of him, came to the strand, and from thence commanded the mariners to send the proscribed ashore, or to throw them overboard. Hereupon the sailors long deliberated, whether they should deliver up Marius to his enemies, or secure his escape; and at last compassion prevailed. The vessels continued their course, and one of them landed Granius in the island of Ænaria; but the sailors who had Marius on board, changing on a sudden their resolution, came to an anchor in the mouth of the Liris. There they advised him to land and take some rest, till the wind became more favourable. Marius followed their advice; and, lying down in an adjacent field, slept very soundly. In the mean time, the master of the vessel weighed anchor, and put to sea with a fair gale, thinking it neither honourable to deliver Marius into the hands of his enemies, nor safe to favour his escape. When Marius awaked, he found himself, to his great surprize, intirely deserted; no ship at anchor; no domestics about him; all had disappeared. This melancholy solitude increased his fears; he began to suspect his own domestics, and every thing seemed to threaten him with death. After he had lain some time pensive, he recovered his spirits, and summoning all his courage, he started up, and, walking cross the marshes formed by the overflowing of the Liris, wandered about, often wading through the mire and water up to the waist. At length he got to the hut of an old man, who looked after the fens, whom he earnestly besought to assist and

and preserve a man, who, if he escaped the present danger, would make him returns a beyond his expectation. The poor man, struck with the venerable aspect of Marius, whom perhaps he likewise knew, told him, that if he wanted only rest, his cottage was very quiet; but, if he wanted to be concealed, he would lead him to a more private place. Marius desired him to do so; and the old man carried him into the fens, made him lie down in a cave by the river-side, and covered him with reeds. He was scarce laid down, when he heard a great noise round the cottage. Geminus had sent several troops of horse from Terracina, upon a suspicion that Marius had fled to the marches of Minturnæ. These threatened the poor old man with the displeasure of the consuls and senate, and the severest punishments, for harbouring and concealing an enemy to the republic. Marius, who heard all this, thinking himself b no longer safe in the place where he lay concealed, to deceive both the old man and the soldiers, left the cave, and, pulling off his garments, plunged into the lake of Marcia up to the chin in water, and covered his head with reeds; but the soldiers who were in pursuit of him, observing the water troubled and muddy about the place where he had thrown himself into the lake, after a diligent search, discovered him, and, tying a cord about his neck, dragged him out of his new hiding-place, and led him naked to Minturnæ, to be executed there, pursuant to the decree of the senate, which had been published in all the cities of Italy.

THE magistrates of Minturnæ, into whose hands he was delivered by the soldiers, considering that his faction was still formidable, and that Sylla's consulship was near c expiring, thought it dangerous to prefer either party to the other, and therefore were not in haste to put the sentence of the senate in execution. They did not even shut him up in their prison; but sent him, under a strong guard, to the house of one Fannia, a rich woman, who was suspected not to be well affected to him on an old account. She had been formerly married to one Tinnius, from whom being afterwards divorced, she demanded her portion, which was very considerable. Hereupon her husband, who had no mind to return it, accused her of adultery; and the cause was brought before Marius in his sixth consulship. Upon a full inquiry, it appeared, that Fannia had been guilty of incontinence before matrimony, and that it was not unknown to Tinnius; notwithstanding which he married her, and had cohabited with her a considerable time. Marius therefore, after having heard both parties, ordered Tinnius d to return the fortune, and laid a small fine upon Fannia. The Minturnenses took it for granted, that Fannia would resent the disgrace with which Marius had branded her; but she, thinking she had more reason to thank Marius for the return of her fortune, than to be offended at him for the easy fine he had laid upon her, took great care of him, and did all that lay in her power to comfort and encourage him (Q).

IN the mean time, the magistrates of Minturnæ, after having consulted together, determined at last to obey the decree of the senate, and put Marius to death immediately; but none of their citizens caring to imbrue his hands in the blood of so glorious a conqueror, an executioner was chosen out of the troops of the garison; some e say he was a Kimber, others that he was a Gaul. However that be, when he went into the room where Marius was lodged with his sword drawn, the eyes of that great warrior, as the place where he lay was dark, seemed to dart out flames; and at the same time the ruffian heard, or imagined to hear, a loud voice, saying, Stop, wretch! darest thou kill Caius Marius! This filled him with terror; he dropped his sword, and rushing out into the street, he uttered these words only, I cannot kill Caius Marius! This raised the compassion of the Minturnenses, who immediately reversed their sentence, and were even angry with themselves for making such an unjust and ungrateful return, to one who had preserved Italy. They therefore cried out with one voice, Let him go where he pleases; let him find his fate somewhere else; we beg pardon of the gods for thrusting Marius distressed and naked out of our city. After this, they crowded into his room, f

(Q) When Marius was brought to Fannia's house, as soon as the door was open, an ass came running out to drink at a spring hard-by; and looking very brisk and lively upon Marius, first stood before him, then brayed aloud, and pranced by him. This was enough to raise the spirits of the proscribed general, who was superstitious even to childishness. What was purely accidental often passed with him for some mysterious event. He now fancied, that the sea would be more favourable to him than the land, since the ass neglected its dry pasture, and turned from it to the water; and therefore, when the Minturnenses resolved to favour his escape, he conjured them to conduct him to the sea-side. A man must be made up of superstitious follies to put such an interpretation, as Marius did, on that action; and nevertheless, what is pleasant enough, the event seemed to justify his conjectures: for at the sea-side he found a vessel ready equipped, which conveyed him safe to Ænaria.

a room, removed him from thence, and conducted him towards the sea-side, every one lending a helping hand to forward his flight, and striving to outdo each other in relieving and comforting the distressed hero. In order to get to the sea-side, they were obliged either to pass through a grove consecrated to the nymph Marcia, or to go a vast way about, which would have taken up too much of their time. The Minturnenses had a singular veneration for this grove, and never suffered any thing to be removed out of it, that was once within it. They therefore scrupled to pass through it, and were in great perplexity, fearing they might be overtaken by one of Sylla's parties, who were scouring the country, before they reached the sea-side the other way. While they were deliberating among themselves which way they should take, an old man among them cried out, There is no place so sacred, but we may pass through it for the preservation of Marius. Hereupon Marius first entered the grove, and the whole company marched after him, and arrived safe at the sea-side, where Marius went on board a small vessel, which had been provided for him by one Belæus. Marius, when he returned to Rome at the head of an army, caused this whole adventure to be represented in a large piece of painting, and hung it up in the temple of Marcia, whom some take to be the same with *Circe*¹.

HOWEVER, the illustrious exile was not yet come to an end of his labours. He ordered his pilot to steer for the island of Ænaria, where he arrived safe, and rejoined Granius, whom he took on board with his other friends, and then sailed for Africa; but, their water failing them in their passage, they were forced to touch at Eryx in Sicily. There the Roman quæstor, who was appointed to guard the coast, and put to death such of the proscribed as should land there, had like to have seized Marius, and actually killed sixteen of his retinue, who were gone ashore to fetch water. Hereupon Marius, putting to sea again with all expedition, made the island of Meninx near the Little Syrtis, where he was informed, that his son had made his escape with Cethegus; and that they were both gone to the Numidian court, to implore the assistance of king Hiempsal. Being somewhat comforted with this news, he ventured to pass over to the continent of Africa, and landed at the old port of Carthage. He was scarce got ashore, when Sextilius, who then governed the African province in quality of proprætor, was informed of his arrival. As Sextilius was a politic man, and neither cared to disobey the orders of the senate, nor incur the hatred of the Marian faction, by putting this great man to death, he immediately sent one of his officers to him, advising him to seek a retreat elsewhere, and threatening to put the decree of the senate in execution, if he set foot in Africa. At this message the great Marius was ready to sink under the weight of his calamity. He continued some time silent, looking sternly upon the messenger; and at length, when the officer asked what answer he should return to the prætor, Go, tell your master, said he, that you have seen the exiled Marius sitting on the ruins of Carthage. By this noble answer he placed in a proper light the misfortunes of that once celebrated city and his own, as affecting instances of the vicissitude of human affairs. Whether the prætor was moved with this message, is uncertain; but Marius seems to have continued some time in that neighbourhood^m.

IN the mean time, young Marius, who, as we have related above, had set sail for Africa, landing on the coast of Numidia, was received in a very gracious manner by king Hiempsal, or, as others will have it, by his son Mandrestal, who had succeeded to the crown; but that prince, being irresolute and undetermined what part to act, whenever his noble guest talked of departing, found out some pretence or other to detain him. Hereupon Marius and Cethegus, who attended him in his misfortunes, began to suspect, that some treachery lay concealed under the extraordinary civilities shewn them by the Numidian king; and would have made their escape, had they not found themselves carefully watched, and, in short, kept in a kind of honourable captivity. However, they found means at last to elude the king's evil designs. Their safety was owing to a very seasonable adventure. As young Marius was very handsome and well-made, one of the king's concubines fell in love with him, and even discovered her passion to him. The young Roman declined at first entering into any correspondence with her, from an awful regard to the sacred laws of hospitality; but finding at last, that by her means alone he could avoid the snares that were laid for him, and that there appeared more generosity than wantonness, in the tenders she made him of her affection, he gratified the fair Numidian, who thereupon found means, as her love was not merely the effect of an irregular appetite, to convey him and his companions safe out of the king's dominions. The young Roman, being thus delivered, we may say, from his captivity, hastened to the Roman province, where he found his father just landed. After they had tenderly saluted and embraced each other, they began to consult together about the present situation of their affairs. As they were walking by the sea-side, the old hero observed two scorpions fighting with great fury; and as his head was always filled with signs and prognostics, he drew sinister interpretations from that combat. Let us fly, said he to his son, Let us fly; some great danger threatens us here. This said, he and his company went immediately into a fisher's boat, and made towards Cercina, an island not far from the continent. They had scarce put off from the shore, when they saw the coast covered with horsemen, whom the king had sent to bring back young Marius. In the island of Cercina, which lay near the Little Syrtis, and is now known by the name of Cereara, they found Albinovanus, who was likewise proscribed; and there they all spent the winter together^a.

DURING these occurrences, Sylla and his colleague Q. Pompeius Rufus acted in concert at Rome, and made it their whole business to quiet the minds of the people there. As no-body offered to oppose their measures, and a seeming calm reigned among all orders of men, the consul Pompeius, who had not yet appeared at the head of his legions, resolved to take the field, and march against those few allies, who still continued in arms. The Roman army was still in the hands of Pompeius Strabo, who, after his triumph, had returned to his old camp, with the title of proconsul. When he heard that the consul was coming to succeed him, and snatch out of his hands the glory of finishing a war, in which he had acquired so much honour, he artfully applied himself to his troops, and worked them up to a resolution of not parting with a general, under whose conduct they had gained so many victories. However, the consul was quietly received in the camp, and took possession of the army, the proconsul himself investing him in his office, and with the ornaments of his new dignity, without betraying the least reluctance; but the next day, when the legions were assembled again to assist, according to custom, at the sacrifice, which new generals used to offer, some legionaries all on a sudden fell upon the consul, and killed him at the foot of the altar. In this tumult Pompeius Strabo acted his part with great dexterity; he shed tears over the body of the dead consul, broke out into bitter invectives against the assassins, who had imbrued their hands in the blood of the supreme magistrate of the republic, and threatened to sacrifice to his manes all those who had any hand in so flagitious an attempt, of which there had been yet no instance in the republic; but, notwithstanding these declarations, he made no inquiry after the criminals, but, tho' continued in the command of the army, buried the whole in oblivion^b.

Sylla, who had but a few days to continue in his office, being alarmed at the assassination of his colleague, resolved to set out immediately for Asia. However, he was forced to continue some days at Rome after his consulship was expired, and had the mortification to see the first furious steps of Cinna, whom he believed intirely come off from his mad zeal for the popular faction; for he no sooner entered upon the consulship, than joining with M. Virginus, tribune of the people, he cited Sylla, to whom he had sworn an inviolable attachment, to appear on a charge of male-administration. Hereupon that general, not thinking himself any longer safe in Italy, embarked his troops, and set sail for the east, leaving Rome at the mercy of Cinna and his faction. Their first attempt was, to get a law passed in favour of the allies, whom Cinna was for incorporating into the thirty-five tribes, and putting upon a level with the ancient citizens. The consul Octavius, who was attached to the senate, foreseeing, that, by this important piece of service, Cinna would secure the votes of the new citizens, and carry all before him in the assemblies of the people, opposed the law with all his interest. Cinna therefore ordered the new citizens to come to the comitium with daggers under their robes, being resolved to get the law passed by force. Octavius, being informed of these unwarrantable proceedings, resolved to oppose force with force; and accordingly went to the forum, attended by a numerous body of old citizens, with arms concealed under their garments. He no sooner appeared in the forum, than the new citizens, at the instigation of Cinna, fell upon him with great fury. Octavius stood his ground; whereupon a battle ensued, in which, as the two parties were shut up in a narrow compass, much blood was shed. At length the new citizens

a citizens were overpowered, and driven from street to street, till they abandoned the city, together with the consul Cinna, and six tribunes of his faction. We are told, that ten thousand of the new citizens were killed in this battle, Cinna, being thus driven from the capital, had recourse to the neighbouring cities. Cinna solicits succours from the allies. soliciting troops and money to maintain what he called the cause of the allies. As soon as he was gone, the senate deposed him, and chose L. Cornelius Merula consul in his room. This new insult quickened him in his application to the allies, who all concurred with uncommon cheerfulness to supply him with troops, or money to hire them. The great sums he received enabled him to corrupt a considerable body of Roman troops, that lay incamped in the neighbourhood of Capua. They all joined him to a man, and took the military oath, which he administered to them in his consular habit, as if he had not been deposed. When the allies heard, that he was at the head of a Roman army, they flocked to him from all parts of Italy, in such crowds, that in a short time he had no fewer than thirty legions under his banners; a prodigious army! able to make all Italy tremble. And now Cinna resolved to recall the proscribed; and accordingly dispatched an express to Marius, who was still in the little island of Cercina, acquainting him, that he might return to Italy, without fear of the senate and their decrees. Marius recalled. This step alarmed the conscript fathers, who immediately ordered the two consuls, Octavius and Merula, to fortify both the city and citadel, by placing all the ballistæ and catapultæ in the magazines on the walls. They were also commissioned to raise what forces they judged necessary, and to take into the service such of the confederates as had not declared for Cinna. At the same time, the fathers recalled Pompeius Strabo, who was yet making war with some small remains of the revolted Italians on the coasts of the Adriatic sea, and was at the head of a very numerous army, the command of which he had kept after the murder of the consul Pompeius Rufus; but that general, not being yet determined what party to take, affected delays, and carried himself so artfully, that no-body knew what side he favoured. Some writers are of opinion, that his true design was to let the two factions waste each other, and then raise himself upon the ruins of both. Marius lands in Italy. In the mean time, Marius, putting to sea with all expedition, landed at Telamon, a port in Hetruiria, with a body of Maurusian horse raised in Africa. Upon the news of his arrival, great numbers of shepherds, slaves, and men of desperate fortunes, flocked to him from all parts; so that he soon saw himself at the head of a considerable army. He then sent a messenger to Cinna, signifying to him, that he was ready to acknowledge him for consul, and assist him to the utmost of his power against their common enemies. Cinna immediately acquainted Sertorius with the arrival of Marius, and the tenders he made him of his service. Sertorius, having been disobliged by Sylla, who had employed all his interest against him when he stood for the tribuneship, had joined the contrary faction, and at this time, as he was a brave and experienced officer, shared the command of the army with Cinna. He was a man of great prudence and moderation; and therefore dreading the rough and revengeful temper of Marius, he advised Cinna not to admit him into his army, remonstrating, that Cinna was powerful enough, without the addition of Marius's undisciplined troops, to triumph over his enemies; that he could not make Marius his associate, without making him his master; that he was insatiably covetous of glory, and ever ready to envy it in his competitors; that he would assume to himself all the success of the war; and lastly, that he was a man in whom it was not always safe to confide. All this Cinna owned to be true; But how, said he, can I send back a man, who, upon my word, has left Africa, and whom I myself have invited to join his resentments with ours against our common enemies? Since you yourself had invited him to your assistance, replied Sertorius, there was no need of this consultation. The only thing we can do now is, to watch his conduct as narrowly as we do the designs of our most inveterate enemies. Cinna gives Marius the title of proconsul. After this secret conference, Cinna sent back the messenger to Marius, styling him proconsul in his letter, and empowering him to chuse lictors for his guard; but Marius, putting on the appearance of great humility on this occasion, refused the title, the lictors, and all other marks of the proconsular dignity, as not agreeing with his present circumstances. He affected on the contrary to wear nothing but an old gown; his hair and beard rough; he walked with a slow pace, like a man quite oppressed with his misfortunes: but, through the disguise of that mournful countenance, something so fierce appeared in his looks, that he rather created terror, than moved compassion.

AND now Cinna, Marius, and Sertorius took each their province in this new war. ^a In a council of war they resolved to march directly to the capital. Cinna was to block it up on the side of the Tiber; Sertorius to invest it on the opposite side; and Marius to scour the country, and prevent any provisions from being conveyed into the city either by land or water. Pompeius Strabo was incamped with his army before the gate Collina, to cover the city on that side. This politic general had offered Cinna his service and his army, thinking that his party was most likely to prevail; but Cinna, looking upon him as a time-server, in whom it was not safe to confide, had rejected his offer with scorn; which obliged him to take part with the consuls Octavius and Merula. As he was incamped near Sertorius, the first act of hostility began between these two generals; but it was rather a skirmish than a battle, there being killed only six hundred men on both sides. This rencounter, however, was remarkable for an accident, which ought to have given the Romans a distaste for civil wars: two brothers, who had chosen opposite parties, meeting in the heat of the action, the one gave the other a mortal wound without knowing him; but when he heard the voice of his dying brother, he ran to embrace him, and finding him at the last gasp, Dear brother, he cried out, tho' different interests have divided us, one common pile shall unite us. This said, he plunged into his own body the sword, which was yet stained with the blood of his brother, and died by his side. This moving accident made some impression on the soldiery; but passion and party-zeal, or rather fury, soon hardened all hearts; so that all regard to friends and relations was laid ^b aside by both parties.

As Cinna's forces increased daily, he formed a fourth army, which he put under the command of Papirius Carbo. This filled the city with dread and confusion. The two consuls who defended it, Octavius and Merula, were men of great probity, and much better qualified to maintain the laws and religion in their purity, than to sustain the attacks of an enemy. Octavius was so scrupulous an observer of the most venerable customs in Rome, that they in vain pressed him, even in this crisis, to arm the slaves in defence of the city. They could only get this answer, That he would not make slaves free of that city, from which, in maintenance of the laws, he was driving away Marius. He was indeed a man of good sense and understanding, and supported ^d the dignity of his office with a becoming majesty; but placed too great a confidence in auguries, and was more intent on consulting divines, than men skilled in military affairs. As for Merula, he placed more confidence in the protection of Jupiter, whose flamen he was, than in the valour of the many brave men he had under his command. The senate therefore had recourse to Cæcilius Metellus, the son of Metellus Numidicus, who was making war upon the revolted Samnites with a considerable body of Roman troops. The senate, well acquainted with the ability and courage of that general, sent him orders to put an end to that war upon as honourable conditions as he could, to march his army immediately to the relief of his country, and, if he could not conclude a peace, to leave his troops under the command of his lieutenants, and return himself to Rome. Metellus, pursuant to his orders, immediately entered into a ^e treaty with the Samnite generals; but, while the negotiation was carrying on, Marius, by offering the Samnites more advantageous terms than Metellus had done, gained them over to his party; so that Metellus, leaving his forces to his lieutenants, returned to the capital, where he no sooner appeared, than the soldiers, dissatisfied with the indolence of the consuls, loudly demanded him for their general, declaring, that, under the conduct of so brave a commander, they did not fear repulsing the enemy, and saving Rome; but Metellus, as modest as brave, rejected these seditious applauses with indignation, upbraided the soldiers with want of discipline, and openly declared, as he was too strictly observant of the old customs and laws, that he would ^f not assume an office, which properly belonged to the consuls. This made many of the citizens despair of being able to defend the city; and they deserted in companies to Cinna, whose generals were not so scrupulously virtuous. Sertorius was the only man among them who had any noble sentiments; the others had neither honour nor virtue. In the mean time, Marius made himself master of all the maritime places in the neighbourhood of Rome, took Ostia itself by treachery, pillaged it, put most of the inhabitants to the sword, and building a bridge over the Tiber, cut off all communication between the city and the sea. He then marched with his army towards the city, and posting himself on the Janiculum, blocked it up on that side.

THO'

^a THO' the capital was greatly weakened by daily desertions, yet Ostavius found means to raise a considerable army in it, with which he incamped under the walls, as did likewise Q. Metellus and Pompeius Strabo, each of them commanding a separate body. Cinna, who scrupled no attempt, how villanous soever, which could serve his cause, undertook to get Pompeius Strabo assassinated in his tent; but his son saved his life; which was the first remarkable action of Pompey the Great. Young Pompey, ^{Pompey saves his father's life.} who was making his first campaign under the proconsul his father, had chosen for his companion one Terentius, a patrician of his own age. The treacherous Cinna, by many alluring promises, gained over Terentius to his interest, and prevailed upon him to undertake the assassinating of the general and his son, and at the same time the debauching of his army, and carrying the legions to Sylla's camp; but young Pompey, ^b receiving notice of this wicked design a few hours before it was to be put in execution, placed a faithful guard round the prætorium; so that none of the conspirators, who had designed to set fire to the general's tent, could come near it. He then watched all the motions of the camp, and endeavoured to appease the fury of the legionaries, who hated their general, by such acts of prudence as were worthy the oldest commanders. Some of the mutineers had forced open one of the gates of the camp, in order to desert to Cinna. Hereupon the general's son, laying himself flat on his back in their way, cried out, That they should not break their oath and desert their commander, without passing over his body. By this means he put a stop to their desertion, and afterwards wrought so effectually upon them by his affecting speeches and ^c engaging carriage, that he reconciled them to his father^t.

In the mean time, Marius, who was incamped on the Janiculum, used his utmost efforts to make himself master of the strong fort built on that hill, and was very near succeeding in his attempt by the treachery of one Appius Claudius, a military tribune in the place, who, having formerly received some favours of Marius, opened one of the gates to him; but the garison, tho' surpris'd, made a brave resistance, and in the mean time, Ostavius and Pompeius Strabo hastening to their relief, a sharp engagement ensued, which ended wholly to the advantage of the consular troops^u. ^{Marius makes a fruitless attempt on the Janiculum.}

^d NOTWITHSTANDING this advantage, the city was soon reduced to a most deplorable condition: a plague broke out among the troops of Pompeius with such violence, that in a few days it carried off eleven thousand men. Soon after the general himself was killed with lightning, which did a great deal of mischief in his army. As Pompeius was a very wicked man, capable of the greatest crimes, and had assassinated a consul before the altar, the people, looking upon his death as a punishment upon him from heaven, dragged his body with an iron hook through all the streets of the city, and then threw it into the Tiber^w. The command of his army was given to L. Crassus who, together with Ostavius and Metellus, went and incamped near the hill Alba along the Appian way, with a design to open a communication with the country on that side; but Cinna, Marius, Sertorius, and Carbo, joining their forces, posted themselves above the consular troops on the same Appian way; so that no provisions could ^e be conveyed from the country to the city. And now a famine beginning to be felt in the capital, the people complained loudly of the senate, as if they kept up a war for their own private interest, which exposed them, their wives, and children to the danger of being starved. To make the disorder in Rome still greater, Cinna treated under-hand with the citizens, and, by his emissaries, prevailed upon most of the slaves to shake off their masters yoke, and take refuge in his camp, where they were declared free. The example of the slaves was followed by citizens of all ranks, who, abandoning the defence of the city, deserted openly and in large companies. The same spirit of mutiny and desertion reigned in the consular army, which visibly decreased; infomuch, that Metellus, despairing of being able to save Rome, left the ^f camp, and retired into Liguria, whence he soon after passed over into Africa. The senate, seeing their party and authority daily declining, and fearing a general insurrection, thought it time to come to a treaty with Cinna; and accordingly sent deputies to his camp, with some overtures of peace. Cinna, before he would hear them, asked, whether they were come to treat with him as consul, or only as a private man? This question, which they did not expect, surpris'd them; and, as they had no instructions touching so nice a point, they desired leave to return to Rome to consult the senate. The conscript fathers were greatly perplexed, not knowing what answer to give, nor what

what course to take. They thought it inconsistent both with honour and justice to depose Merula, a wise magistrate, whom they had in a manner compelled to quit the office of high-priest of Jupiter, and accept of the consulship. On the other hand, as the city was closely blocked up on all sides, and the famine increased daily, without any hopes of relief, it was to be feared, that the populace would rise, and let the enemy into the city. In this dilemma, Merula himself, preferring, like a good citizen, the welfare of his country to his own honour, freely abdicated, and by his abdication left the senate at liberty to acknowledge Cinna for lawful consul. Accordingly, the conscript fathers sent back their deputies to him, with instructions to treat with him as consul, and to invite him to Rome, to exercise there the functions of his dignity; however, they were ordered to require of him an oath, that he would spare the blood of the citizens, and put no Roman to death but by due form of law. Cinna refused to take that oath; but protested, that he would never give his consent to the death of any citizen. He even sent word to the consul Octavius, that he would not do amiss to retire from the city till the storm was blown over. During this conference, Marius, who stood by, said nothing; but the sourness of his countenance and the sternness of his looks threatened the city with blood and slaughter. As soon as the messengers were dismissed, Cinna, Marius, Sertorius, and Carbo began their march at the head of their troops, and advanced towards the city, the senate having ordered the gates to be opened to them. Cinna entered the city with a strong guard; but Marius halted at the gate, and when he was pressed to advance, he replied with a sarcastical tone, That he was a banished man, and consequently debarred by the laws from entering; that therefore, if they had any occasion for his service, they must get that law repealed, which drove him into exile. Hereupon Cinna marched directly to the forum; and having assembled the people, proposed to them the disannulling of the decree which proscribed Marius and his adherents; but Marius, impatient to shed the blood of his enemies, when only two or three tribes had voted, pulled off the mask, and, without waiting for a lawful repeal, entered the city, surrounded by his guards, chosen from among the slaves, who had flocked to him, and whom he called his Bardiæans (R). The first order he gave these cruel and inhuman assassins was, immediately to murder all those, who, coming to him and meeting him in the streets, saluted him, and were not answered with the like civility. This signal was a general dead warrant, and great numbers of the flatterers, who came to make their court to the new tyrant, were cruelly massacred before his eyes. Q. Ancharius, a senator of great distinction, who had been honoured with the prætorship, chose to pay his compliments to Marius when he was offering a sacrifice in the capitol; but the tyrant casting a fierce look upon him, he was instantly cut in pieces in the very temple of Jupiter. Cinna, for the present, exercised his cruelty only on his colleague Octavius, who still took upon him to perform the functions of his office, and was therefore, at the instigation of Cinna, slain in his curule chair by Censorinus. But Marius's Bardiæans, or Bardiates, set no bounds to their lust, cruelty, and avarice: they first murdered their former masters, abused their children, and insulted their wives in the grossest manner; then they extended their cruelty and licentiousness to all ranks of persons, not sparing the most venerable matrons in the republic; and carried their iniquities to such an excess, that Cinna and Sertorius, having consulted together how to rid Rome of this barbarous crew, resolved to put them all to death; and accordingly sent a detachment to surprise them, one night while they were asleep in the camp, and cut them all off to a man. Marius was much grieved at the loss of his favourite guard; and being afraid, as he breathed nothing but blood, that Cinna had already satisfied his revenge, he desired the heads of the faction to meet, in order to deliberate

(R) We are at a loss to know how Marius came to give his guards this name. Thuanus, as appears from a note in the margin of his Plutarch, thought there was a fault in the text, and that, instead of Bardiæans, we ought to read Bardyetes or Bardyates; for the Bardyetes were a most barbarous and savage nation in Spain, and this might very naturally induce Marius to call his guards by that name, on purpose to frighten the people, and make them tremble at the fierceness of their nature. There is a good deal of reason for this conjecture. However, M. Dacier, in her notes on Plutarch, offers another: Plu-

tarch tells us, says she, that the greatest grievance of the people was the abominable licentiousness and infamous debaucheries of those guards. It may therefore not absurdly be conceived, that Marius on that account, called them not his Bardiæans, but Bardeans, from the Greek word Βαρδῆν, which, in the Ambracian dialect, signifies to ravish women. But, after all, this may be refining too much on the matter, as the same writer observes. Perhaps Plutarch wrote not Βαρδιαῖες, but Μαριαῖες, that is, the Marians, or the life-guard of Marius.

- a deliberate what kind of government they should settle, since all the power was devolved upon Cinna after the death of his colleague. At his request, Cinna, Carbo and Sertorius came to confer with him; and in this conference Marins is said to have spoke like a madman. Sertorius, the only man among them who had any good principles or sense of morality, endeavoured to moderate his fury; but in vain: Cinna and Carbo concurred in his sentiments, and the resolution they took, was to murder, without mercy, all the senators who had opposed the popular faction. Pursuant to this resolution, C. Attilius Serranus, P. Lentulus, Caius and Lucius Cæsar, C. Proscriptions, murders, &c. Numitorius, and M. Bæbius, all senators of great note, were murdered in the streets. P. Crassus, a young senator, endeavoured to make his escape; but being closely pursued by Caius Fulvius Fimbria, one of the most furious zealots of Marius's party, his father meeting him, killed him, for fear he should fall into the hands of his enemies, and then presented himself before the bloody Fimbria, by whom he was inhumanly massacred. This slaughter lasted five days, during which time the best part of the senators were cut off, their heads were stuck upon poles over-against the rostra, and their mangled bodies dragged with hooks into the forum, where they were left to be devoured by the dogs. However, Metella, the wife of Sylla and daughter of Metellus Numidicus, and her children escaped this general slaughter. Marius indeed caused a strict search to be made after them; but they eluded the vigilance and fury of the tyrant, being privately conveyed out of town by some of Sylla's friends. Marius, highly exasperated at their escape, caused their house to be razed, their goods confiscated, and Sylla himself to be declared an enemy to his country. While Marius was thus venting his brutal rage on Sylla's friends in the city, his soldiers, the ministers of his cruelty, were, like so many blood-hounds, dispersed about the country, in search of those who had fled. The neighbouring towns, villages, and all the high-ways, swarmed with assassins. On this occasion Plutarch observes with great concern, that the most sacred ties of friendship and hospitality are not proof against treachery in the days of adversity; for there were but very few who did not discover their friends, who had fled to them for shelter. He therefore, with a great deal of reason, commends and admires the fidelity of the slaves of Cornutus in that general defection. Cornutus had retired to a house in the country; and his faithful slaves, observing a company of soldiers hovering about the neighbourhood, concealed their master in the most private part of the house; and then taking up the body of one, whom the tyrant's officers had just murdered, carried it to the house, hung it up by the neck, put a gold ring on the finger, and shewed it in that condition to the soldiers, pretending it was the body of their master. They then buried it with great pomp and solemnity; and by this innocent artifice, which was perceived by no-body, they saved Cornutus, and conveyed him into Gaul. Marcus Antonius, grandfather to the triumvir, and the greatest orator that had appeared in Rome till his time, was not so fortunate. He fled to the house of a faithful friend in the country, who endeavoured to save his life with great tenderness and affection. His friend was in low circumstances; but, being proud of having under his roof one of the greatest men in Rome, resolved to entertain him in the best manner he could. Accordingly he sent his servant to a tavern in the neighbourhood for some of the best wine he could get. The vintner perceiving the servant nicer than usual, tasting of several sorts, and not satisfied but with the very best, asked him, What made him so hard to please? The servant told him in confidence, as his trusty friend and acquaintance, That the wine was for the illustrious Marcus Antonius, who made so great a figure in the senate. My master, said he, keeps that great man concealed in his house, and is resolved on this occasion to stretch his purse, and make as much of him as he can. The servant was no sooner gone, than the villain of a vintner went to Marius, who was then at supper, and told him, he could deliver Antonius into his hands. At this news Marius gave a great shout, clapped his hands for joy, and was for rising from table and going to the place himself; but, being prevented by his friends, he sent Anius, one of his wicked agents, attended by a body of soldiers, commanding him to bring Antonius's head with all speed. Anius himself waited at the door, and sent in his soldiers to dispatch the orator and bring him his head; but the assassins, notwithstanding their natural barbarity, were so struck at the sight of this great man, and moved with the graces and charms of his eloquence, when he began to speak and plead for his life, that tears dropped from their eyes, and none of them would touch him. Anius, impatient at their delays, went into the room, and seeing his soldiers all weeping, and quite softened softened by the eloquence of that great orator, checked them severely, and with his own hand cut off his head, and carried it to Marius, who, after he had made it matter of sport to his guests, ordered it to be stuck up on a pole with the rest before the rostra. Such was the end of the greatest orator Rome had ever bred. Cicero, who had often heard him, being at this time about twenty years old, calls him the wonder of his age, and adds, that to him it was owing, that Italy equalled Greece itself in the art of speaking^w.

AND now the rage of the other tyrants, after so many murders, began to abate. But Marius still thirsted after more Roman blood. He wanted to destroy two men, who had been both honoured with the fasces. These were Lutatius Catulus, who had been his colleague in the consulate, and partner in the triumph over the Cimbri; and the virtuous Cornelius Merula, who had generously resigned the consular dignity to make room for Cinna. Great interest was made for Catulus; but to all those, who interceded for him, Marius returned this cold answer, He must die. Hereupon Catulus, shutting himself up in a room, smothered or poisoned himself. Merula likewise robbed his enemy of the cruel pleasure of putting him to death. As he was high-priest of Jupiter, he went to the temple of that god, laid down his mitre, in which it was not lawful to die, and, then seating himself in his pontifical chair, ordered his veins to be opened. After he had bled some time, he advanced to the altar, sprinkled it with blood, and uttering many imprecations against the tyrants, devoted them to Pluto and the infernal gods.

THE consulate of Cinna being near expiring, the citizens, who had seen the streets for some time flowing with blood, and covered with heaps of dead bodies, hoped for some respite. But Cinna, unwilling to trust them with chusing him a successor, of his own authority nominated himself and Marius consuls for the next year. Accordingly, on the calends of January, they took possession, one of his second, the other of his seventh consulship. Marius was now seventy years of age; but neither his ambition nor his cruelty were yet satiated. As he was coming out of his house to be invested, according to custom, in his office, Sextus Licinius unhappily fell in his way, and was by his orders immediately thrown down from the Tarpeian rock. The same day he proscribed two prætors; and his son, no less cruel than himself, killed the same day a tribune of the people with his own hand^x.

Sylla writes
to the senate.

IN the mean time, news came from all parts, that Sylla, having put an end to the war with Mithridates, was returning into Italy at the head of a great army. Soon after the senate received a long letter from the victorious general, wherein, with a lively style, he gave them an account of his victories, and complained of the injuries done him. After enumerating the many services he had done the republic in her wars with the king of Numidia, with the Cimbri, the allies, and lastly with Mithridates, the most powerful king in the east, he concluded thus: For these important services you have rewarded me, by setting a price upon my head; my friends are murdered without mercy; my wife and children are forced to abandon their native country; my house is razed; my goods confiscated; and all the laws made in my consulship absolutely disannulled. You may expect, conscript fathers, to see me in a little time at the gates of Rome with a victorious army. And then I shall find means to revenge the personal injuries I have received; and to inflict signal punishments both on the tyrants themselves, and the ministers of their tyranny. This letter gave the two consuls a great deal of uneasiness. Marius, now worn out with hardships and years, could no longer bear up his spirits flagging at the apprehension of a new war, which his own experience represented to him as very dangerous. He considered, that he had not now to do with an Octavius or Merula, at the head of an undisciplined rabble, but with Sylla, who was approaching with a victorious army, and who had once before driven him out of Rome. At the same time he called to mind all his past misfortunes, his flight, his banishment, the many dangers he had undergone, his tedious wanderings, &c. and, dreading to be exposed anew to the same hazards in so advanced an age, he fell into great troubles, nocturnal frights, and broken slumbers, fancying every moment that he heard a voice, telling him, that the den, even of an absent lion, ought to be dreaded. To divert these tormenting thoughts, he had recourse to a remedy scarce known in those days, but too common in ours. He gave himself up to excessive drinking, chusing rather to lose his reason, than to be continually haunted with melancholy

a melancholy thoughts. This new way of living soon bred a distemper which led him to his grave. Posidonius the philosopher, as quoted by Plutarch, tells us, that, having over-heated his blood by too much drinking, he fell into a pleurisy. The same philosopher adds, that he went to his house, when he was confined to his bed, and discoursed with him about some affairs relating to his embassy at Rome. But Caius Piso seems to insinuate, that he himself hastened his end, though he does not tell us in what manner. He only relates, that Marius, walking one night after supper with some of his friends, entertained them with a recital of all his adventures, which he concluded with saying, that it did not become a man of his years to trust any longer so unconstant a goddess as fortune. Having ended his discourse, he embraced all about him with a tenderness very uncommon to him, went home, and took to his bed.

b He was seized with a delirium, during which, fancying himself general in the war against Mithridates, he used such motions and gestures as if he had been engaged in battle at the head of an army. At length after seven days illness he died, some say His death on the seventeenth, others on the thirteenth, day, of his seventh consulship.

AND now the distressed city fondly imagined, that the intestine calamities, which had reduced her to the last extremity, were buried with Marius. But she soon perceived, that she had only changed her tyrant. Cinna, the surviving consul, associated with himself in the government, though not in the office of consul, young Marius, who, as he had inherited the cruelty of his father, put all the senators he could find in Rome or its neighbourhood to the sword. As all the power was lodged

c in the hands of Cinna and young Marius, they got Valerius Flaccus, a creature of old Marius, named to succeed him in the consular dignity. He no sooner entered upon his office, than he passed a most unjust law in favour of the people, declaring all debtors free from their debts, upon paying to their creditors one-fourth of what they owed. Having by this law gained the affections of the indigent multitude, the new consul consulted with Cinna and Marius, how they should prevent the return of Sylla, who had under his command a victorious and well-disciplined army. The expedient they agreed on to put it out of the power of that general to give them any uneasiness, or to obstruct their wicked measures, was, to nominate a person to succeed him in the

d command of the army in the east, under pretence, that his authority was illegal, since he had been proscribed by a decree of the senate. Pursuant to this scheme, the new consul Valerius Flaccus was appointed to command the Roman forces in the Levant, and make war with Mithridates. But, as Valerius was no soldier, Cinna and Marius gave him for his counsellor and lieutenant C. Fulvius Fimbria, a senator, greatly esteemed by the troops for his valour. Fimbria, though intirely addicted to the e Marian faction, both despised and hated Valerius. However, he prepared to attend him, in compliance with the orders of Cinna and Marius, who were absolute masters in Rome. A squadron of ships was sent with a considerable number of troops on board, with orders to land in one of the ports of Thessaly, and there wait for Valerius, who was to follow with the rest of the army. Sylla was at that time busy in resettling

f Greece, after having defeated Archelaus and Taxiles, two of Mithridates's generals. The troops therefore that were to serve under Valerius, hearing of Sylla's victories, instead of waiting for their unexperienced commander, deserted all to a man, and joined the victorious proconsul, under whose conduct they promised themselves great booty and glory. When news of this desertion was brought to Rome, it was resolved there, that Valerius should imbarque with two legions, and sail directly for Asia to carry on the war there with Mithridates. However, he did not leave Rome before December, towards the end of his consulship, which was no sooner expired, than Cinna, without so much as assembling the comitia, declared himself consul the third time, and chose for his colleague Papirius Carbo, one of the most furious zealots in Rome for the Marian faction. The other chief dignities in the republic were all filled with men wholly devoted to the interest of the reigning tyrant. In short, the face of the republic was intirely changed, and the ancient laws and institutions quite abolished. All the friends of Sylla, whom the tyrants could get into their power, were inhumanly murdered, and their estates confiscated. Men of any honour or probity were ashamed to live in a city, which was now become a nest of robbers and assassins. They therefore fled in crouds, and retired to Sylla in Greece, imploring his protection against their domestic tyrants. Upon their arrival Sylla hastened to put an end to the war with Mithridates, which we have described at length in our history of Pontus. But, before the articles of peace were agreed on, Valerius Flaccus arrived with his two legions at Byzantium, being sent by Cinna to take upon him the command of the Roman forces in the Levant, and to pursue the war with Mithridates. He was scarce landed, when great differences arose between him and his lieutenant Fimbria about their quarters. The lieutenant, sensible of the want of abilities in his general, despised him, and stirred up the soldiery to mutiny. Hereupon Valerius deposed him, and appointed one Thermus in his room. Fimbria, provoked at this affront, kept no bounds with his general, who, as he was hated by the soldiery for his harsh temper, thought it adviseable to retire for some time from the army; and accordingly crossed the Bosphorus, and took up his quarters in Chalcedon. The audacious Fimbria followed him thither with the greatest part of the army; which Valerius no sooner heard, than, suspecting his design, he fled to Nicomedia, shut the gates, and put himself in a condition to sustain a siege against his subaltern. Fimbria pursued him, made himself master of Nicomedia, and finding him concealed in a well, dragged him out, and killed him with his own hand. Cinna and his senate, instead of punishing, rewarded, the villainy, by declaring the base assassin general of all the Roman troops in the Levant ^v.

AND now Fimbria, seeing himself at the head of a consular army, without any regard to the treaty, which was near concluded between the king of Pontus and Sylla, renewed the war with great vigor. He defeated young Mithridates in a pitched battle, and obliged the king himself to take shelter behind the walls of Pitane, a strong city on the confines of Æolis and Troas. Thither Fimbria pursued him, and, having invested the place by land, sent messengers to Lucullus, Sylla's quæstor and faithful friend, intreating him to prevent with the fleet, which he commanded, the king's retreat by sea. Had Lucullus complied with his request and shut up the mouth of the harbour, the proud Mithridates must have fallen into the hands of the Romans. But Lucullus, detesting the very name of Fimbria, failed away, and left an open retreat to the king, when he might have easily taken him, and by that means prevented the bloody war, which that prince carried on for the space of forty years with the republic. However, Fimbria took Pitane and several other places, treating the inhabitants with unparalleled insolence and cruelty, as we have related at length in our history of Pontus. In the mean time, Sylla, having put the last hand to the peace in a conference with the king at Dardanus, marched against Fimbria, whom he found incamped under the walls of Thyatira in Lydia. And now two Roman armies seemed ready to entertain the Asiatics with a battle among themselves in the heart of Asia. Sylla, advancing within two furlongs of Fimbria's camp, sent him a summons, to surrender up his troops to him, divest himself of the command, and return to Italy. Fimbria proudly answered, that he despised the orders of a proscribed man, who was declared by the senate an enemy to his country. Hereupon the two generals began to prepare for a battle; but Fimbria's men declaring, that they would not take arms against their countrymen and friends, and great numbers of them deserting to Sylla, the treacherous Fimbria resolved to have his adversary assassinated. But the slave he employed for that base purpose betrayed himself by the terror that appeared in his looks, and then discovered the treachery of his master. This barbarous attempt exasperated Sylla to such a degree, that he immediately led his legions to attack the traitor in his trenches. Fimbria, finding his soldiers ready to abandon him, desired a conference with Sylla. But he, not caring to come near a traitor, who was capable of any desperate attempt, only sent Rutilius, one of his officers, to treat with him, and acquaint him, that if he would leave Asia and deliver up his troops, he would not only save his life, but furnish him with all necessaries for returning to Italy. Return to Italy! replied Fimbria; no; I know a more expeditious way. Having uttered these words, he retired to his tent, and soon after privately withdrew to Pergamus, where he stabbed himself with his own sword in the temple of Æsculapius. But, the wound not proving mortal, a faithful slave, who attended him, dispatched him, and then plunged the sword into his own breast ^z.

AND now Sylla, having no more enemies to contend with in Asia, resolved to return to Italy, where Cinna and Papirius Carbo had appointed themselves consuls for the next year. The former, to establish himself more firmly in his usurped authority, married his daughter Cornelia to a young patrician, whose extraordinary talents were already admired in Rome. This was the famous Julius Cæsar, who afterwards followed the steps of his father-in-law; and, being no less wicked, and more successful, turned at last the republic into a monarchy. Sylla, before he left Asia, wrote a letter to

- a to the senate of great temper and moderation ; but when their deputies came to meet him at Dyrrachium, and intreat him not to carry his resentments so far as to produce a civil war, he spoke a very different language, telling them, that he was coming to Rome full of rage and revenge ; and that all his enemies, if the Roman people consented to it, should perish either by the sword, or the axes of the common executioners. Hereupon the two consuls ordered Marius, and the other heads of the party, to raise forces and recruit the legions. Several armies were raised with incredible expedition, the new citizens and allies readily concurring to support the cause of the consuls, which they looked upon as their own. A fleet was likewise brought from Sicily to guard the coasts of Italy. In a council of war, at which all the leading men of the party assisted, it was resolved, that one of the consuls should go and meet Sylla before he entered Italy, and carry the seat of the war into Dalmatia. This Cinna took upon himself, and accordingly caused some of his forces to be immediately transported thither. But the rest of his soldiers refused to go on board, and began to mutiny. Cinna assembled his troops in order to appease them, when one of the lictors, who surrounded the consul as usual, struck a soldier who drew too near to the general. The soldier returned blow for blow, and called his comrades to his assistance. Upon this the stones flew about, and the legionaries, who were next to the consul, fell upon him sword in hand. Cinna fled, but a centurion overtaking him, buried his sword in his body ^a (S).
- c UPON the death of Cinna, Carbo continued sole master of the administration, till the end of the year. His first care was to bring back the troops which his colleague had sent into Dalmatia. He then ordered new levies to be made in all the cities of the allies and in the Roman colonies, to keep Sylla out of Italy by force of arms. We are told, that the troops raised for this purpose amounted to two hundred thousand men. They were divided into several bodies commanded by different generals ; viz. Several armies raised against Sylla. L. Cornelius Scipio and C. Junius Norbanus, whom Carbo had got chosen consuls, Ap- pius Claudius, Sertorius, young Marius, Flavius Fimbria, the brother of that Fimbria who had killed himself in Asia, M. Marius, Albinovanus, and Lucius Brutus Damasippus. In the mean time, Sylla was preparing to imbarque at Dyrrachium, now Durazzo, where he had ordered his fleet, consisting of a hundred and twenty sail, to wait for him. When every thing was ready, he assembled his troops, and in the harangue he made to them, gave them by several hints to understand, that he was under some apprehension, lest they should disperse, and retire to their respective homes, as soon as they found themselves on their native shore. Hereupon the whole army of their own accord took a new oath, promising to stand by him to the last, and to commit no devastations in Italy, which might raise the country against him. They even offered him all the gold and silver they had got in the war with Mitbridates. But Sylla, thanking them for their generosity, declined their offer, and being now well assured of their fidelity and affection, he imbarqued, and put to sea, as he himself tells us, against fifteen generals and four hundred and fifty cohorts. He had a prosperous passage, and landed his troops to the number of forty thousand men at Brun- Sylla lands in a few days, to refresh themselves after the fatigues of the sea, and then began their march cross Calabria and Apulia in search of the enemy. On his march he was joined by Metellus Pius, who, during the tyranny of old Marius, had fled into Liguria. Sylla, who had no other title but that of proconsul, received him as his colleague, and both advanced at the head of the army into Campania, keeping their troops under the most exact discipline. The consul Norbanus was incamped between Capua and Castilinum, in order to stop Sylla's march ; which the proconsul no sooner understood, than he dispatched two of his officers to him with offers of a pacification. Whether he was really inclined to concord, or artfully dissembled the rage he concealed in his heart,

(S) Plutarch relates this matter very differently. He says, that Pompey came to Cinna's camp, and that the cold reception he met with there giving him reason to believe that his life was not safe, he privately withdrew. His absence raised great murmurs in the army, the soldiers imagining, that Cinna had sacrificed him to his jealousy. This report being spread among the troops, they first demanded young Pompey with loud clamours, and then fell with great fury on the general, whom they charged with his death, and cut him in pieces (11).

heart, is uncertain. However that be, his offers were rejected, and his deputies grossly insulted, which so incensed Sylla's troops, that they ran to arms without orders from their general, drew up in battalia, and went out to insult Norbanus in his camp. Hereupon an action ensued, in which the consul was defeated, and six thousand of his men killed on the spot. The fame of this action drew many of the contrary faction to Sylla's camp, and amongst the others Cethegus, Verres, and Piso, all three men of great distinction, and hitherto most furious zealots of the Marian faction. Verres, who was quæstor of the proconsul Carbo's army, brought with him his military chest, a present very acceptable to Sylla. But, in the mean time, the consul Scipio drawing near, the proconsul's army was in a manner surrounded by the innumerable forces of the enemy. In this distress Sylla had recourse to his old artifice of pretending to treat of peace; and accordingly sent deputies to the consul's camp to propose an accommodation, pretending, that he was much grieved at the calamities to which the republic must be exposed by a civil war. Scipio, who was sincerely disposed to peace, hearkened to the overtures that were made him, and by way of preliminary agreed to a truce, during which, there being a free intercourse between the two camps, Sylla's men found means to debauch the whole consular army; insomuch, that when Sylla detached twenty cohorts, as it were, to force the consul's trenches, the consular troops, all to a man, came out to meet them, and joining them marched back with them to Sylla's camp. The consul and his son, being deserted by their whole army, which consisted of forty cohorts, were seized by Sylla's soldiers, who delivered them up to their general. But he, being under no apprehensions from commanders, who could be so easily over-reached, set them both at liberty, and gave them a guard to conduct them safe to the nearest quarters of their friends. When news of this general desertion was brought to Carbo, who was then incamped in Cisalpine Gaul, he cried out in great surprise, We have both a fox and a lion to deal with; but the fox is more formidable than the lion^b.

makes his first appearance.

THE news of the great advantages Sylla was daily gaining, over the generals of the adverse party, prompted young Pompey to declare for him. He assembled troops in Picenum, where his family had a great many friends and clients, and taking upon him, of his own authority, the title of general, though he was then but twenty-three years of age, obliged most of the towns of Picenum to declare for Sylla. The small army he commanded increased so fast, that in a short time he had men enough to form three legions; and at the head of these, after he had appointed them their tribunes and centurions, he advanced towards Campania to join Sylla. The march of the brave youth, which was signalized by the reduction of many cities, drew upon him three generals, who commanded armies in that neighbourhood under the consuls. Carinas, Cælius, and Brutus agreed to obstruct his march by attacking him in different places. Brutus opposed him the first with a considerable army, consisting chiefly of Gaulish horse. But Pompey at the head of his own cavalry defeated that of the Gauls, after having killed with his own hand the Gaul who commanded them. He then fell sword in hand on Brutus's infantry, cut most of them in pieces, and forced the rest to save themselves by a disorderly flight. This success, which was chiefly owing to the young general's personal bravery, so damped the courage of the two other generals, that they resolved to quit the field, and leave the country open to the conqueror. However, he had not advanced far before he was met by the consul Scipio, who, since the desertion of his troops, had raised a new army. But the infantry on both sides were no sooner in fight, than the consul's troops went all over to the young hero; so that Scipio, deserted a second time by his army, was forced to retire with shame. Pompey's name being now become formidable to the adverse party, Papirius Carbo, quitting Gaul, hastened after him, in order to prevent his joining Sylla. His cavalry came up with him at the river Æsis, which divides Picenum and Umbria; but the young general having repulsed them with great vigor, pursued his march, and at last reached Sylla's camp, where he was received with all possible demonstrations of esteem and sincere friendship. Sylla, charmed with the account he gave him of his exploits, honoured him, though he had not yet a seat in the senate, with the title of Imperator, which the legionaries gave but rarely to their bravest generals. Rome being greatly alarmed at the increase of Sylla's army, the two consuls as well as Carbo drew near it, in order to keep up their party there, and defend the city in case of an attack. The consul Norbanus incamped without a without the walls on the road to Campania; and Carbo, entering Rome at the head of his army, forced the senate to declare Metellus, Pompey, and all the patricians who had joined Sylla, enemies to their country. The rest of the campaign was employed on both sides in private negotiations, each party endeavouring to debauch the allies of the other. Sylla, a great master in that art, sent considerable sums into Cisalpine Gaul, and by that means gained over several Gaulish nations to his interest. On the other hand, the opposite faction sent Sertorius into Spain, to keep those vast provinces in awe, and prevent them from declaring for Sylla. At the same time, young Marius prevailed on the Samnites to join him with an army of forty thousand men, under the command of Pontius Telesinus, an able commander, who had gained great reputation in the war of the confederates^c.

b AND now, the consular year being near expired, Carbo, who tyrannized at Rome ^{Papirius} without controul, forced the tribes to chuse himself and young Marius consuls for the next year. As the winter, which was very severe, suspended hostilities on both sides for some months, the consuls made it their whole business to raise money for ^{Carbo and young Marius} the support of the troops, which they had levied in most of the provinces of Italy. But, the public treasury being quite exhausted, they extorted a decree from the senate, empowering them to strip the temples of their ornaments, and turn all the gold and silver they found in them into money. The consuls having now wherewithal to pay their troops, and the rigor of the season being abated, their armies took the field, and went in quest of the enemy. The first battle was fought on the banks of the Æsis, between Carinas, one of the consul's generals, and Metellus Pius, who was immovably attached to Sylla. The action proved very bloody, and lasted from morning to night. But Metellus at length obliged Carinas to retire, and soon after made himself master of his camp. The news of this defeat exasperated young Marius to such a degree against Sylla and his adherents, that he sent orders to Junius Brutus, then prætor in Rome, to put all Sylla's friends in the city to death. This order was executed with the utmost cruelty; not one of those, whom the inhuman prætor could get into his power, was spared. Among the slain were Papirius Carbo, the consul's brother, P. Antistius, father-in-law to Pompey, L. Domitius, and the great Mucius Scævola, pontifex maximus. The latter took refuge in the temple of Vesta; but the prætor's agents followed him thither, and murdered him at the foot of the altar. The account Sylla received of these cruelties made him resolve to quit Campania, and draw near to Rome. Accordingly, he advanced to Setia on the banks of the Liris, where he was met by young Marius at the head of eighty-five cohorts. Sylla resolved, contrary to the advice of all his officers, to venture an engagement, being encouraged by a dream, in which the night before he imagined to see old Marius advising his son to beware of the following day, which might be of fatal consequence to him. Both armies engaged with great intrepidity, and fought with unparalleled bravery. The success was long doubtful; but at length Marius's right wing gave way, and the dispute was ended by the desertion of seven of his cohorts, who all in a body went over to Sylla. Their example drew many others, which struck the consular army with such terror, that they all betook themselves to flight, and dispersed about the fields. The conqueror pursued them, and made a dreadful slaughter of the fugitives. The vanquished, seeing themselves closely pursued, fled to Præneste in such numbers, that the inhabitants were forced to shut the gates before the consul arrived; so that he was drawn up with a cord, and by that means escaped for the present the fury of his pursuers. All the rest, who were left without the walls, perished by the swords of the enemy. Sylla, as quoted by Plutarch, tells us in his memoirs, that on this occasion twenty thousand of the enemy were killed upon the spot, and eight thousand taken prisoners; whereas he lost in all but three and twenty men^d.

f Sylla, flattering himself that he should put an end to the war by taking Marius, Præneste instantly invested Præneste: but, as the place was too strong to be taken by assault, he resolved to reduce it by famine; and with this view he surrounded it with a broad and deep ditch, placing guards at proper distances to prevent the conveying in of any provisions. He committed the care of the blockade to one Lucretius Ofella, a soldier of fortune, whom he had lately gained over from Marius's party. As for himself, he marched with a strong detachment towards Rome, which, he was informed, the friends of Marius had abandoned upon the news of his defeat. The citizens, oppressed with famine, famine and all the calamities that attend a civil war, opened the gates to him; so that he entered the city without opposition, and incamped in the Campus Martius. And now, seeing himself master of the capital, he assembled the people, complained to them of the injustice done him by his enemies, confiscated the estates of all those who adhered to Marius, promoted his friends to the offices he found vacant by the flight of those who had opposed him; and then, without staining his first coming to the capital with any acts of cruelty, returned to his camp before Præneste. In the mean time, Carbo, having raised a numerous army in Cisalpine Gaul and Hetruria, drew near to Præneste, with a design to throw succours into the place. But Sylla meeting him, a bloody action ensued, which lasted from sun-rising to sun-set, without any advantage on either side. During the engagement, Marcus Censorinus, one of Carbo's generals, at the head of eight legions, attempted to force the enemy's trenches in another quarter; but he was repulsed by Pompey and Crassus. A few days after, these two generals were attended with equal success against C. Albinus Carinas, whom they defeated, after having killed five thousand of his men. Sylla's other generals gained still greater advantages in several parts of Italy. The two Servilii beat the consular troops near Clusium; Marcus Lucullus defeated another army near Fidentia; and Metellus gained a signal victory over the united forces of Carbo and Norbanus in the neighbourhood of Faventia. Ten thousand of them were cut in pieces, and six thousand went over to Metellus. Upon the news of this defeat, a legion, which lay at some distance from Metellus's camp under the command of Albinovanus, immediately forsook him, and joined Metellus. Hereupon Albinovanus, thinking himself no longer safe in the party he had embraced, abandoned it in so criminal a manner as has made his name infamous. He invited Norbanus, his general, C. Apustius, Flavius Fimbria, and most of the chief officers of his party, to an entertainment. Norbanus was prevented, by an unforeseen accident, from complying with the invitation; and this saved him; for the rest, when they were in the height of their jollity and mirth, were barbarously massacred by a band of assassins, whom the traitor had hired for that purpose. Such are the effects of party-zeal and domestic dissensions. Albinovanus, thinking himself sufficiently recommended to Sylla by this black piece of treachery, withdrew to his camp with all the accomplices of his crime. Norbanus, not knowing any longer whom to trust, went on board a vessel, which he found ready to set sail for Rhodes, and arrived safe in that island. Sylla sent immediately to demand him of the Rhodians; but, while they were deliberating how to behave in so nice an affair, Norbanus prevented their coming to a determination by stabbing himself in the middle of the market-place.

In the mean time, Carbo, after having attempted several times in vain to relieve his colleague Marius closely besieged in Præneste, retired into Hetruria to reinforce his army there with new levies. But while he was incamped near Clusium, news was brought him, that M. Lucullus had, with sixteen cohorts, defeated fifty cohorts of his best troops, under the command of Quinctius, in the neighbourhood of Placentia, killed eighteen thousand of them, and taken their camp. This misfortune struck Carbo with such terror, that, despairing of success in Italy, he withdrew privately from his army, though thirty thousand strong, and with a few friends imbarqued for Africa, to carry on the war there. Upon the news of his flight, Pompey and the Servilii hastened to attack the army he had left in the neighbourhood of Clusium, which, as it was destitute of a general, made but a faint resistance; twenty thousand men were killed upon the spot, and the rest either taken or dispersed. And now one of the three chief supporters of the Marian faction being dead, another fled, and the third ready to perish with want in an invested town without any hopes of escaping, Sylla began to think the war at an end. But a new enemy, more brave and resolute than any Sylla had yet encountered, entering the lists against the conqueror, had like to have humbled him, and turned the scales in favour of the opposite party. This was Pontius Telesinus, a Samnite of noble extraction and great experience in war; who having raised an army of forty thousand men, partly Lucanians and partly Samnites, joined them to those of Carinas, Brutus, and Censorinus; and with these three chiefs advanced boldly to make a last effort, and either relieve Marius in Præneste, or perish in the attempt. Sylla, being informed of their motions, advanced to meet them at the head of his victorious army, and at the same time sent orders to Pompey, who commanded another a another body, to follow Telefinus, and fall on his rear, while he attacked him in front. The Samnite, finding himself in a manner surrounded by two armies, so that he could neither advance nor retire, without being attacked by both at the same time, decamped silently in the night, and over reaching the two generals, instead of pursuing his march to Præneste, took the rout to Rome, which he knew was not in a condition to sustain a siege. His march was so expeditious, that before break of day he came within ten furlongs of the Collatine gate. His approach threw the city into the utmost confusion. The gates were immediately shut; the men ran to arms and appeared on the walls; the women all in tears crowded to the temples to implore the assistance of the gods. Telefinus was a second Hannibal at the gates of Rome, and already thought himself master of it. He then pulled off the mask, and shewing himself as much an enemy to Marius as to Sylla, declared to his troops, who were mostly Samnites and Lucanians, that his design was not to assist one Roman against another, but to extirpate, if possible, the whole nation, utterly destroy the proud city, and bury its inhabitants under the ruins. He walked through all the lines and ranks of his army, encouraging his men to lay hold of the opportunity which offered of humbling the proud republic, and putting her out of a condition of pretending to lord it over the rest of Italy. Let fire and sword, said he, destroy all; let no quarter be given; mankind can never be free so long as one Roman is left alive. His troops, fired by such a speech, advanced with great fury. The Roman youth marched out to oppose them under the conduct of Appius Claudius, a young patrician of noble extraction and great hopes. But he was killed, and the rest forced back into the city with great slaughter. In the mean time, Sylla, receiving intelligence of the enemy's march, detached seven hundred horse under the command of Balbus, with orders to ride full gallop to Rome, and throw themselves into the city, while he advanced with the utmost expedition at the head of all the infantry of his army. The arrival of Balbus raised the drooping spirits of the citizens, who had given themselves up for lost. But the sudden appearance of Sylla at the head of his army occasioned such joy among all ranks of men as can hardly be expressed. He arrived about noon, and incamped near the temple of Venus. After he had allowed his men a few minutes to refresh themselves, he called them again to arms, and drew them up in order of battle. Dolabella and Torquatus, two of his lieutenants, endeavoured to dissuade him from exposing his troops, harassed and spent as they were, to a desperate push, when all lay at stake. They remonstrated to him, that he had not a Marius or a Carbo to deal with, but an experienced general at the head of the Lucanians and Samnites, two of the most warlike nations in Italy, and the most inveterate enemies of the Roman name. But Sylla, without hearkening to their remonstrances, ordered the trumpets to sound the charge, and began the attack. The fight was the sharpest and most bloody that had happened during the whole course of the war. The Samnites, animated by the example of the brave Telefinus, behaved with their usual valour, and put the left wing of the Romans, where Sylla himself commanded, into great confusion. Several cohorts fled, and retired legions, not able to keep their ground against the Samnites, who pushed them with incredible vigor, began to retire. Sylla did all that lay in his power to rally them, and bring them back to the charge. He even presented himself sword in hand before the runaways to stop their flight. But all in vain; the legionaries, who had behaved so gallantly in Asia, without any regard to the command or danger of their general, thought only of saving themselves by a shameful flight, some of them hastening back to their camp, and others striving to get into the city. The Samnites made a dreadful havoc of the fugitives, and Sylla himself narrowly escaped death. As he was flying from line to line mounted on a white courser, two Samnites, knowing him by his equipage, levelled their javelins at him, which one of his attendants perceiving, gave his horse a lash, which made him bounce forwards so seasonably, that the javelins just grazed upon his tail, and fell deep into the ground at some distance from him. In this imminent danger Sylla took out of his bosom a little golden image of Apollo, which he brought from Delphos, and constantly carried about him in all engagements; and as danger and fear usually awaken religious sentiments, he addressed himself to it in the following words; Great Apollo, the Pythian, thou who hast granted Cornelius Sylla victory in so many engagements, and raised him to the highest pitch of glory, hast thou at last brought him to the very gates of his native city to fall there ignominiously with his fellow-citizens? He then endeavoured anew to rally the fugitives. Some of them he threatened, others he conjured only to face about, and look on the enemy. But when he found all was to no purpose, and that the left wing was intirely broken and put to flight, he had no resource but in a retreat; and accordingly endeavoured with the rest to gain the camp, after having lost a great number of his friends, and some of the most considerable officers of the army. A great many of the citizens likewise, whose curiosity had led them out to be spectators of the engagement, were trod under foot by the enemy's horse; others were shut out and left at the mercy of the victorious Samnites, and some, among whom were several senators, stifled in the croud. A great many of the fugitives retired to the camp before Præneste, which they filled with terror, reporting, that Sylla was certainly killed, his army cut in pieces, and Rome in the hands of the Samnites ^a.

The Samnite army defeated by Crassus. IN the mean time, M. Crassus, who commanded the right wing of the Roman ^b army, having put to flight Carinas, who commanded the enemy's left, fell unexpectedly upon the victorious Samnites, charged them with unparalleled bravery, overpowered them, and at length by putting them to flight, saved, we may say, Rome from undergoing the fate of Carthage and Corinth. Sylla was defeated; Rome was not in a condition to stand a siege; and the brave Samnite, not knowing the fate of his left wing, was advancing to the gates of the defenceless city, crying out to his soldiers, as they marched along, Courage, my brave Samnites, courage! we shall be soon masters of Rome. There is no safety for us, till we have destroyed that den of wolves, which watch all opportunities to devour us. And indeed, had it not been for Crassus, this great metropolis had been buried in its ruins, and liberty restored to the ^c rest of the world. The Samnites, now no more conquerors, but conquered, fled to Antemnae, whither Crassus pursued them, and from thence sent an express to acquaint

In this engagement Telefinus was killed at the head of his troops, after having given such proofs of valour, as intitle him to a place among the greatest heroes of antiquity. Carinas, Brutus, and Censorinus, were all taken prisoners, and soon after beheaded by Sylla's orders. That general, upon notice given him by Crassus of the defeat and flight of the enemy's army, hastened to Antemnae, and there, as he had now no enemy to fear, he gave the first instances of his cruel and barbarous temper. For as he approached the place, three thousand of those unhappy wretches, who had taken shelter there, having sent deputies to him, in- ^d

Sylla's cruelty. treating him to spare their lives, and promising him an inviolable fidelity, the cruel general answered, that he would spare their lives, provided they put such of their comrades to death as refused to join them. Upon this they fell upon their fellow-soldiers sword in hand, killed a great number of them, and then presented themselves before Sylla without arms, and in the posture of suppliants. He pretended to pardon them, and carried both those who had surrendered, and the rest, to the number of six, or, as Appian will have it, eight thousand men, to Rome, which he entered amidst the acclamations of the people. Upon his arrival he caused those unfortunate wretches to be shut up in the circus, and then summoned the senate to meet in the temple of Bellona, which stood near the circus. When the fathers were met, he ^e began to harangue them; but while they were hearkening with great attention to his speech, his troops, pursuant to their orders, entered the circus, and fell sword in hand on the unfortunate prisoners confined there. The cries and groans of so many men butchered in so narrow a place alarmed the senators, who were not acquainted with his orders, and filled them with terror. But Sylla, with great unconcern and composure in his countenance, addressing himself to the conscript fathers, Attend, said he, to what I am saying, and don't trouble your heads about what is doing without doors: the noise you hear is occasioned by some offenders, whom I have ordered to be chastised. He then continued his discourse with great calmness, telling the fathers, that he designed to settle the republic upon the same foot on which it stood in the best of ^f times. But when the senators were informed of the massacre in the circus, they plainly saw, that they were still under tyranny, and had only changed their tyrant, which was to them matter of no less surprise than grief and terror. For in Sylla the nobility had hoped to find a friend, and the people a protector. He had been from his youth inclined to mirth, and was not only of a jovial, but of so compassionate, a temper, that he had been often seen to weep upon very slight occasions. But the change of fortune introduced, in a manner, a change of nature, and begot pride, arrogance, inhumanity, and all those vices, which, generally speaking, attend an uncontrouled power and authority.

Sylla upon the news of the ſurrender of Præneſte haſtened thither, in order to bring the

 THE taking of Præneſte and Norba put an end to the civil war in Italy. Sylla therefrom a man, who was abſolute maſter of their lives and fortunes, made the moſt in-

Rome turned this opportunity to gratify their private revenge and avarice, confounding the most a into a shambling innocent and peaceable with the most guilty, out of some private grudge, or purely for the sake of their wealth and rich furniture. In short the slaughter was so dreadful, that Sylla was reproached with it even by his best friends. Among others a young senator, named Caius Metellus, ventured one day to ask him in full senate, when he designed to put a stop to the calamities of his fellow-citizens? We do not, said he, inter- cede for such as you have resolved to destroy; but only desire you to free those from their uneasiness whom you have determined to save. Sylla, without seeming to take this bold speech amiss, answered coolly, that he knew not yet whom he should save. Name to us then, replied Metellus, those you have determined to destroy. That I will do, answered Sylla very smartly, and immediately caused a new list to be fixed up of eighty b citizens whom he proscribed, most of them senators and persons of great distinction.
 The next day he proscribed two hundred and twenty more, and an equal number the third. Among these were Carbo, Scipio, Sertorius, and Marcus Marius; the three former were out of the tyrant's reach; but the latter, who was nearly related to the great Marius, and highly favoured by the people, was seized by Cataline and put to death, after having suffered the most exquisite torments tyranny could invent.
 He was whipped through all the streets of Rome, and after this ignominious punishment carried beyond the Tiber, where by Sylla's barbarous agents his eyes were put out, his hands and ears cut off, his tongue tore out, all his joints dislocated, and his bones broken. Valerius Maximus tells us, that one Marcus Plætorius, being moved at such c an affecting sight, could not help pitying the unfortunate young man; which so offended Sylla, that he ordered him to be killed upon the spot. Even that natural compassion for the unhappy, which no man of any humanity can prevent, was judged criminal and worthy of death (T). And now, after nine thousand senators, knights, and citizens had been inhumanly murdered by Sylla's agents, he assembled the people, and told them, that he had proscribed as many as he could think of at present; and as for those he had forgot, they should be proscribed too, as soon as he could call them to his memory^s.

FROM Rome, Sylla extended his cruelties to the neighbouring cities that had declared against him, and used them without mercy. Some were dismantled, others op- d pressed with heavy taxes, and immense sums raised upon the inhabitants. All the effects of the inhabitants of Florentia, Spoletum, Interamna, and Sulmona, were confiscated and sold to the best bidder. Some cities were intirely demolished, and the citizens all to a man proscribed. The allies as well as the Romans submitted, without resistance, to the tyrannical yoke. Cato alone, known afterwards by the name of Cato Uticensis, or Cato of Utica, though at this time but fourteen years of age, discovered some remains of the old Roman spirit. As Sylla shewed a great regard for him on account of his ancient friendship with his father, his governor Sarpedo brought him frequently to the tyrant's house, which looked like a prison, great numbers of citizens being confined there, and many daily executed. One day the young Roman seeing a great e many heads presented to the tyrant, which were said to be of great men, he asked his governor how it was possible that the author of so many murders could escape being murdered himself? Because he is more feared, replied Sarpedo, by the disheartened citizens, than hated. Give me a sword then, answered the intrepid youth, and I will with one blow deliver my country from the tyrannical yoke. Sarpedo was surpris'd at the

(T) Marius was scarce expired in his torments, when Cataline cut off his head, and carrying it as a trophy into the forum, presented it to Sylla, while he was haranguing the people. The tyrant received the shocking present, and beheld it without shewing the least concern. As for Cataline, his hands being daubed with the blood he had shed, he went and washed them in the holy or lustral water, placed at the gate of Apollo's temple (12). For the heathens had vessels placed at the gates of their temples filled with water, which they called lustral or holy. In this water such as intended to go into the temple washed their hands by way of purification. They likewise sprinkled it on the assembly to cleanse them from their impurities. An exclusion from the use and benefit of this lustral water was looked upon by the Greeks as a kind of excommunication. For this reason OEdipus, in the first scene of the second act in Sophocles, forbids those who had been guilty of the death of Laius the use of the lustral water. But here the profligate Cataline, after the murder he had committed, washes his hands in that water, intending by such an impious action to affront and defy religion.

a courage of his pupil, but ever after kept a watchful eye over him, lest he should by some rash attempt expose himself and his family to utter destruction ^b.

WHILE Italy was thus groaning under the oppression of the tyrant, Pompey was employed against his enemies in Sicily, which was governed by Perperna, Carbo's friend, a man greatly attached to the Marian faction. But, upon Pompey's landing, he abandoned the island and retired to Carbo then in Africa. The Sicilians no sooner heard of his flight, than they came in crouds from all parts of the island to make their submissions to Pompey. Catanea was the only city that seemed determined not to submit. But Pompey having begged of the inhabitants as a favour to admit into their city his sick men, and they complying with his request, he sent the flower of his troops, and by that means made himself master of the place. In the mean time, Carbo, not thinking himself safe in Africa, retired to the island of Cossura between Sicily and Africa, with a design to pass from thence into Egypt. But Pompey, being acquainted with his design, sent a squadron of galleys to invest the island, ordering his officers to seize Carbo and all the outlaws who attended him, and bring them to Sicily. Carbo, finding he could not escape, came and surrendered himself to the commander of the squadron. He had formerly saved Pompey's estate, which the tribunes were for confiscating, on his father's being convicted of having embezzled the public money. He could not therefore believe, that party-zeal had effaced all sense of gratitude in the heart of a friend. But he found, to his great surprise, a man, whom he had highly obliged and saved from beggary, become, through his attachment to Sylla, his implacable enemy. The young general ordered the old magistrate, who had been dignified with three consulates, to be brought before him loaded with chains; suffered him to fall prostrate at his feet, and received his submissions with such an air of pride as was shocking even to his friends. After he had reproached him with his cruelties, and the disturbances he had raised in the republic, he pronounced sentence of death against him, which was immediately put in execution. However, he suffered most of those Romans, who were taken with Carbo, to make their escape; which, with his prudent and mild conduct towards the Sicilians, gained him the affections of the people. Upon his threatening to punish the inhabitants of Himera with great severity, for having been more sanguine than the rest of the Sicilians in the cause of Marius and Carbo, Sthenis, their chief magistrate, told him, that he was the man who had stirred up his fellow-citizens against Sylla, and that therefore he alone ought to be punished. Pompey was so taken with this generous freedom, that he not only pardoned him, and for his sake the city, but received him into his friendship. As his soldiers, accustomed to slaughter, put many of the Sicilians to death without his orders, he caused their swords to be sealed up in their scabbards, and severely punished those whose seals were found broken. By these acts of clemency towards the Sicilians, he wiped off the reproach of inhumanity and ingratitude, which he had brought on himself by the death of Carbo. Nay, it was generally thought, that his behaviour towards the chief supporter of the Marian faction was much against his inclination and the bent of his good-nature. At least it is certain, that he made no inquiries after his friends in Sicily, and that he not only connived at the escape of many who were seized, but conveyed them away privately himself ⁱ.

Pompey by his clemency gains the hearts of the Sicilians.

AND now Sylla, being absolute master of Rome and all the countries subject to the republic, except Spain, resolved to leave the senate and people a shadow at least of their former liberty. To this end he retired into the country for some days, desiring the conscript fathers to chuse one of their own body in his absence to govern the commonwealth, which, since the death of the consuls, had no legal magistrate. The fathers, out of complaisance to Sylla, created L. Valerius Flaccus inter-rex: he was president of the senate, and wholly devoted to Sylla's interest; and this gave him an opportunity of bringing the senate to execute the scheme he had formed. He wrote to Valerius, desiring him to declare to the senate and people, that, since affairs were yet unsettled, he was of opinion, that a dictator should be created, not for any limited time, but till all evils and grievances were redressed. In his letter he intimated, that at the request of the conscript fathers he would accept of the employment. This proposal, which tended to the establishing of regal authority in Rome, surprised the senators. But the remembrance of so much bloodshed, of so many proscriptions and assassinations, chilled every heart; and, the law passing without opposition, Sylla was declared dictator tator without any limitation in point of time. Thus the Romans, after many ages, fell again under the absolute power of one man; which proved a fatal blow to the republican government, and paved the way to absolute monarchy. As flattery is the usual consequence of slavery, the people, formerly so jealous of their liberty, worshipped the idol they had set up, erecting to their tyrant an equestrian statue of brass in that very comitium, where they had seen the heads of so many illustrious citizens exposed to public view.

C H A P. X.

The history of Rome, from the perpetual dictatorship of Sylla to the triumvirate of Cæsar, Pompey, and Crassus.

The dictator orders Ofella to be put to death.

SYLLA, now perpetual dictator, or, to speak more properly, king and absolute sovereign of Rome, undertook the reformation of the government, being seconded therein by L. Valerius Flaccus, whom he appointed his general of the horse. The first law he enacted related to the election of the chief magistrates, and imported, that no man should stand for the prætorship till he had been quæstor, nor be elected consul till he had been prætor, which was only the revival of an ancient custom. Notwithstanding this law, Lucretius Ofella, who had carried on the siege of Præneste, presuming on that merit, appeared among the candidates for the consulate, though he had not yet bore any office in the republic. Sylla put him in mind of the law he had just enacted; but the bold candidate, presuming too much on his passed services and the favour of the people, continued to solicit their suffrages; which so provoked the dictator, who saw him from his tribunal, that he dispatched a centurion with orders to cut off his head. This execution raised the indignation of the assembly; but Sylla made them thoroughly sensible, that they were no longer a free people, by a low, but expressive, fable; A ploughman, said he, being tormented with vermin, pulled off his cloaths, and cleaned them. While he was busy at his work, they began to molest him anew, and the ploughman killed a far greater number of those troublesome insects the second time than he had done the first. They returned to disturb him a third time; and then the poor labourer, out of all patience, threw his cloaths into the fire; and got rid of them all at once. This fable you may apply to yourselves. Your seditions have hitherto cost you but little blood. Take care that the case of the vermin be not one day your own^k. This fable, coming from a man invested with an absolute power, made the whole assembly tremble; the tumult was immediately appeased, and the election of the consuls made agreeable to the dictator's will. The persons chosen were M. Tullius Decula and Cn. Cornelius Dolabella, two of the chief officers of Sylla's army. They both set out for the provinces allotted them, the former for Gaul, and the latter for Macedon, leaving Sylla to reign alone in the capital, where he made several laws, which were all, except that relating to proscriptions, allowed to be equitable and judicious. That law ordained, that those, who escaped death after their proscription, should be killed where-ever they were found; that those, who concealed them, should be liable to the same punishment; that their effects should be sold to the best bidder; and that their children should be incapable of holding any of the great employments of the republic. By another law he greatly weakened the authority of the tribunes of the people; for it enacted, that for the future no tribune should be allowed to speak in the assembly of the people for a or against any law in agitation ; that only senators should be chosen tribunes ; and that those who had bore this office should be for ever excluded from the superior offices. This made the ambitious disdain seats in a college, beyond which they could not rise. But the tribunes soon recovered their old power, and held it till the time of the emperors, who left them only the name and shadow of magistrates. The pontifices, augurs, and decemvirs appointed to keep and explain the Sibylline books, were by another law reinstated in their former honours, and empowered to fill up the vacancies in their respective bodies ; a prerogative as old as their institution, but which had been transferred from them to the people, in the times that the plebeian faction prevailed. To each of these colleges he added five new members, so that they were no longer called decemvirs, but quindecimvirs, their number being increased from ten to fifteen.

b The temple of Jupiter Capitolinus having been burnt two years before, and the Sibylline books, which were lodged there, destroyed in the flames, Sylla charged the quindecimvirs to repair that loss, by searching for copies, or at least fragments of them, in the cities of Erythræa, Samos, Ilium, &c. Out of this collection they formed a new book, which was indeed larger, but not so authentic, as the originals that had been kept at Rome, ever since the time of Tarquin the Proud (U)¹. Sylla had the mortification to see some of his laws abrogated before he died ; but the greatest part of them continued in force, and are parts of the Roman law to this day.

c AND now Sylla, ruling in Rome without controul, under pretence of supplying the places of the many Roman citizens, who had perished in the civil wars, gave liberty and

(U) There is a great disagreement among the ancients as to the number of the Sibyls. Suidas says there were fourteen ; Ælian reckons but four ; Solinus only three ; and Martianus Capella reduces them to two. But most authors follow Varro, who tells us in express terms that they were ten. Some modern writers indeed, without any regard to the authority of Varro, or the other ancients, are for uniting all the Sibyls in one. So that, according to them, different names were given to one and the same Sibyl, from the different places where she uttered her oracles. She had, say they, no fixed abode, but being led by the spirit, that inspired her, she first published her predictions in the city of Erythræa, the place of her nativity, then rambled about the world, and at length ended her rambles and her life at Cumæ in Italy. But be that as it will, it is certain, that the Sibyls were held in great veneration at Rome and among the eastern nations. A collection was made of the oracles they uttered, and copies of them multiplied in most cities of Greece, Italy, and Asia. The pagans looked on these prophetic rhapsodies as a mysterious book containing the decrees of fate. They were the usual resource of people in times of calamity, and in important affairs, whereof the success was doubtful. St. Jerom was of opinion, that God gave them this wonderful gift as a reward for their chastity ; others pretend, that the devil discovered future things to them ; and some ascribe the enthusiasm, with which they were seized, to a melancholy disposition. They were in all likelihood fanatical women, who gave themselves the air of prophetesses, in order to impose on the credulity of the simple. The pagan authors themselves own the terms, in which their prophecies were couched, to have been very obscure and ambiguous ; so that they were capable of the different interpretations which each person thought fit to give them. Cicero does not dissemble, that the different rhapsodies of the Sibylline books were wrote and disposed in such a manner, as to be easily accommodated to all sorts of events. Callide enim, qui illa composuit, says that writer (13), perfecit, ut, quodcunque accidisset, prædictum videretur. The same judgment ought to be made of the collection, which, by Sylla's orders, was substituted in the room of the old books after the burning of the capitol. The different fragments, out of which the quindecimvirs composed this volume, contained the dregs of superstition, and were, we may say, a jumble of all the dreams of paganism. Afterwards, some men, who pretended to inspiration, enlarged this volume as they thought fit, which obliged the emperor Tiberius to put a stop to this enormous abuse by a very severe decree. As to the eight books, which now bear the name of the Sibyls, critics agree that they are the work, at least in part, of some christian of the second century. Some of the fathers, not aware of the imposition, often quoted the books of the Sibyls in favour of the christian religion ; and hence Celsus stiles the christians Sibyllists. But Origen and St. Austin did not suffer themselves to be imposed on, and therefore speak of those books with contempt. In the reign of the emperor Honorius, the famous Stilico, of whom we shall have occasion to speak in the sequel of this history, caused those fragments of the Sibylline books, which had been collected by Sylla's orders, to be all burnt, the greatest part of the Roman senate having then embraced the christian religion. However, Stilico was on this account severely censured by the noble poet Rutilius in his itinerary (14). Dr. Hyde, shocked at the contradictions and fabulous adventures with which the pagans filled the history of the Sibyls, found out a new way of accounting for them. He observes in the constellation called the virgin a bright star, which the Persians called Sambula ; and remarks, that the Persians, who were fond of judiciary astrology, looked on the sign of the Virgin, as having a greater power, than all the other celestial bodies, to discover future things. The Greeks, having learnt the sciences of the eastern nations, soon adopted these trifling opinions, and, agreeable to their genius, embellished them with their fictions. Their poets soon invented a Sibyl virgin in allusion to the term Sambula ; carried her into several countries ; and made her act the part of a prophetess (15). So that, according to this eminent writer, whatever has been said both by the ancients and moderns of the Sibyls, and their prophecies, is entirely fabulous.

and the right of Roman citizenship to ten thousand slaves, whom from his own name ^a he called Cornelians. These were bound in gratitude to fight and vote for him on all occasions. In the next place he rewarded his old legionaries, who had served under him in the Levant and in Italy, bestowing upon them the lands of the municipia and colonies, which had declared against him. Thus, surrounded by a guard of freedmen in Rome, and supported by his old legionaries in the country, he had nothing to fear, either from revolts in the city, or insurrections among the allies. As all was quiet in the capital, Sylla thought this a proper time to decree himself a triumph for his conquests in Asia, Greece, and Pontus. Rome had not for a long time seen one so magnificent. It lasted two days, on the first of which were carried before the triumphant victor fifteen thousand pounds weight of gold and a hundred and fifteen ^b thousand pounds weight of silver, which he had brought from Greece and Asia; and on the second thirteen thousand pounds weight of gold and seven thousand pounds weight of silver, which young Marius had saved out of the fire of the capitol, and Sylla had recovered at Prænestæ after his death. As soon as the procession was over, the conqueror, mounting the rostra, according to custom, gave the people a pompous detail of his exploits. As he ascribed all his successes to fortune, he ordered, that no other title should be given him than that of the fortunate, a title in which he gloried, as much as other heroes had done in appellations taken from the countries which they had subdued ^m (W). His triumph was succeeded by the most pompous games that had ever been seen in Rome. We are told, that in the Olympic ^c games, which were celebrated this year, only the races could be performed, the most skilful actors of Greece having left their own country, to display their art in the capital of the world ⁿ.

Africa.

In the mean time, the Marian faction began to revive in Africa. Cneius Domitius Abenobarbus, nephew to the great Marius, had raised there twenty thousand men, and prevailed on Hiarbas, one of the kings of Numidia, to join him. Hereupon Sylla ordered Pompey to leave Sicily, which he had settled in tranquillity, and pass over with all possible expedition into Africa. Pompey, pursuant to his orders, immediately imbarqued five legions, and, landing in the African province, marched without loss of time against the enemy. When the two armies were in sight of each other and drawn up in battalia, a dreadful storm arose; upon which Domitius, believing that Pompey would not attack him that day, sounded a retreat. But, while his troops were retiring in some disorder to their camp, the young general, laying hold of that opportunity, fell upon them, and after an obstinate dispute, which lasted the greater part of the day, gained a complete victory. Of twenty thousand men Domitius left seventeen dead upon the spot, and not without much difficulty regained his camp with the poor remains of his shattered army. Thither Pompey pursued him, forced his camp, killed Domitius, and took Hiarbas prisoner. In consequence of this success, he recovered all the cities of Africa, which had been drawn off from Sylla's party, entered Numidia, and having reduced that part of it, which belonged to Hiarbas his ^d prisoner, gave it to Hiempsal, who had always opposed the Marian faction. As this glorious expedition was completed in forty days, so rapid a progress by a general of twenty-four years of age alarmed the dictator himself, who ordered the young hero to disband his troops and return to Rome. Both Pompey and his troops were sensibly affected with this order, which would have produced another civil war, had not Pompey conducted himself with great temper. For when his legionaries began to mutiny, he resolutely protested, that he would rather die by his own hand, than involve Rome in new troubles. Having thus appeased his troops and disbanded three of his legions, he returned to Rome, where he was received with uncommon marks of friendship by the dictator, who went out to meet him, embraced him with great tenderness, and honoured him with the surname of The Great, ordering all, who were present, to give ^e him that glorious title ^f.

self Epaphroditus, that is, The Beloved of Venus; and his trophies, which were still extant in Plutarch's time, bore this inscription, Lucius Cornelius Sylla Epaphroditus (16).

- ^a WHEN the time came for electing new consuls, Sylla, though dictator, stood for that office, and accordingly was elected with Q. Cæcilius Metellus, surnamed Pius, who had joined him upon his first landing in Italy. Never was any consular year more peaceable. All men trembled at the very name of Sylla, and the Romans, once so fond of liberty, were at length brought to submit tamely to the yoke of an imperious master. However, the dictator, to gain the affections of the multitude, gave them such entertainments as now seem to surpass all credit. He consecrated the tenths of his whole substance to Hercules, and on that occasion made a general feast for all the people of Rome; wherein there was such an abundance, or rather profusion, of all the delicacies the sea, rivers, forests, or fields could afford, that immense quantities of provisions were every day (for the feast lasted several days) thrown into the Tiber. Plutarch tells us, that the wine, with which he regaled the people, was forty years old and upwards. But the joy of this magnificent entertainment was somewhat abated by the death of his wife Metella, whom he had always respected, notwithstanding her irregularities. However, the dictator's grief did not last long. A few months after, he entertained the people with a show of gladiators; and, as in those days men and women sat promiscuously together, a young lady, of extraordinary beauty and of the first quality, placed herself near Sylla. She was the daughter of Messala, and sister to the famous orator Hortensius; her name was Valeria, and she had been a few days before divorced from her husband. As she was gay and lively, though virtuous and of an unblemished reputation, she came behind Sylla, and resting her hand gently upon his shoulder, took a little of the nap from off his robe, and then returned to her seat. The dictator turned suddenly about, and seemed to be much surprised with the familiarity, when Valeria addressed him thus: It is not out of any want of respect that I have done this; but because I was desirous to partake of your good fortune (X). Sylla, greatly pleased with this answer and taken with the charms of Valeria, sent privately to enquire who she was, and to learn her name, family, circumstances, and character. From that time they did nothing but ogle each other in all public places, receive and return amorous glances and wanton smiles. In short, the old warrior, captivated with a few affected glances and coquetish airs, like an amorous youth, without experience or discretion, was continually dangling after the beautiful Valeria, till at length he gave way to his passion, and married her ^P.
- ^b IN the mean time, Pompey was soliciting the senate and people for a triumph, which his late victories seemed indeed well to deserve, and the senate was willing to grant. But Sylla, probably jealous of the glory of the young hero, opposed his pretensions, alledging a law, which enacted that none but prætors and consuls should triumph, and that for battles gained under their own auspices; whereas Pompey was but a private Roman knight, and had gained his victories under the auspices of the dictator. But this did not discourage the young conqueror, who continued to make interest with the senate and people for the gaining of his point. Sylla told him plainly, that he would employ all his credit with the people against him; not doubting, but that declaration, as he was master of the suffrages of the people, would make him despair of obtaining the honour he so ardently desired. But Pompey, not in the least discouraged, answered the dictator frankly, that his opposition mattered not, since more people adored the rising than the setting sun. These words the dictator did not well understand; but observing no small surprize in the countenances of those who stood by, he asked what the young man had said. When it was told him, he wondered at his boldness, and then cried out twice, Let him then triumph in the name of the gods. Pompey, taking advantage of this answer, immediately ordered every thing to be got ready for his triumph; and to give more uneasiness to those who envied him, he ordered his triumphal chariot to be drawn by four elephants; for he had taken several of those warlike animals from the princes he had subdued in Africa. But the gate of the city being too narrow for four elephants to pass abreast under it, he was forced to be satisfied with horses as usual. Thus a Roman knight was distinguished with the highest military honours, before he had attained to the age requisite for having a seat in the senate. But the evil fate of Rome was raising up against him a formidable rival in the person of Julius

(X) This passage is very remarkable; for it shews us, that the superstition is of a very ancient date, by which men were persuaded, that commerce with, or touch of, a lucky person, was a means of making them partakers of his good fortune.

Julius Cæsar, who in this very year made his first campaign in the east. He had married, as we have observed above, the daughter of Cornelius Cinna, and obtained at the age of seventeen, if we may believe Suetonius^a, the office of high-priest of Jupiter, being supported by the Marian faction, which then prevailed. Plutarch indeed contradicts Suetonius, and tells us, that when Sylla gave law in Rome, Cæsar stood for the priesthood of Jupiter, but was excluded from that dignity by the dictator. Not long after Sylla endeavoured to prevail upon him to divorce his wife Cornelia, who had already brought him his first daughter Julia. But the bold youth had courage enough to resist this formidable master of Rome to his face, though he had just before forced Piso to put away his wife Annia, whom he tenderly loved, and obliged Pompey to part with his wife Antistia, and marry Æmilia, daughter-in-law to Sylla by his wife Metella, who had been married to Æmilius Scaurus. The dictator, highly provoked against Cæsar for daring to contradict his sovereign will, resolved to proscribe him; and it was not without infinite difficulties that the friends of the Julian family got the decree of proscription suspended. When they intreated him to excuse the follies of a warm and presumptuous youth, from whom he could have nothing to fear, Sylla answered, that he discovered in him, young as he was, several Mariuses. When Cæsar heard this, he stole out of Rome, and wandered some time in the country of the Sabines, where he had the misfortune to be one day surprized by a party of Sylla's soldiers. But Cornelius, who commanded them, consented to let him escape upon his paying two talents. And now, thinking himself no longer safe in Italy, he withdrew to the court of Nicomedes king of Bithynia, where his residence is said to have proved fatal to his modesty, the private hours he spent with that prince raising suspicions no-ways to his honour^r. In this account we have followed Plutarch; for Suetonius says nothing of Cæsar's flight; but on the contrary affirms, that Sylla granted him his pardon at the request of the vestals, of M. Æmilius, and Aurelius Cotta^s. After he had resided some time at the court of the Bithynian king, he went to serve under Marcus Minucius Thermus, at that time prætor of Asia. Suetonius says, that this general sent him into Bithynia, and gave him the command of the fleet, which Nicomedes fitted out to assist at the siege of Mitylene, the only city in Asia, which refused to submit to the Romans, after the treaty of peace concluded between Mithridates and Sylla. Cæsar distinguished himself at the taking of this city, and merited several civic crowns, which were given to those who had saved the life of a Roman citizen^t.

BUT to return to Sylla; he reduced this year Nola in Campania and Volaterræ in Ætruria, the only two cities that held out against him. And now all Italy being in perfect tranquillity, he declined the consulate for the next year, and recommended to the tribes P. Servilius Vatia, a man of merit and his old friend, and Appius Claudius Pulcher, who were accordingly chosen in the field of Mars. This year Cicero first pleaded in public in favour of Roscius, whose father had been proscribed and killed by Sylla's orders. As he was not very cautious in his reflections on a government which made Rome tremble, he thought it adviseable to leave his country, after he had given a public proof of his great genius. He retired to Athens, where he perfected his talents for oratory, and improved his taste for philosophy.

AND now Sylla, after having destroyed above a hundred thousand Roman citizens, taken away the lives of ninety senators, proscribed or caused to be murdered near two thousand six hundred knights, and buried numberless multitudes of the allies in the ruins of their cities, resolved to lay down the power he had usurped, and put himself upon a level with the rest of the people. Had he consulted ambition or policy, he would never have taken such a resolution. The Roman people had set no limits to his power in point of time. There were no domestic troubles to create him any uneasiness, Rome being now accustomed to bear the yoke. His friends, who were as much interested as himself in his preservation, were a sufficient security to him against the attempts of his enemies. On the other hand, so many dangers surrounded him in a private life, that he could not reasonably expect to be safe. But none of these considerations had weight with him; he resolved to lay down his power, and restore the republic to her ancient liberty, which must have proceeded from a greatness of mind, to which none of the antient historians have done justice. When he had taken this final resolution, he assembled the people, mounted the rostra, and surprized Rome with so unexpected a determination. He represented in a short speech the miserable condition fore thought it necessary to take a great deal of blood from a body so robust and diseased, in order to restore it to perfect health, &c. He concluded his speech with these words, which filled the heart of every true Roman with joy: And now, Romans, I leave you to yourselves, I resign my office, divest myself of the unlimited power you have conferred upon me, and am ready to give an account of my whole administration, and answer, in a private capacity, all the accusations that shall be brought against me. This said, he dismissed his lictors, came down from the rostra, and b walked a great while in the forum, discoursing familiarly with some of his friends before the multitude, who, struck with admiration, looked on so unexpected a change as a prodigy. Though the city was then full of the children and friends of proscribed persons, yet none offered to insult him; except one young man, who followed him to his house, abusing him in a most scurrilous manner. Sylla did not daign to give him any answer; but turning to the few friends he had about him, This usage, said he, will for the future deter any man from laying down the sovereign power, as I have done, if he once gets it into his hands. A few days after he retired to his fine country house near Cumæ, spent there some days in more tranquillity than he could have done at Rome, and then returned to the city, lest his enemies should think that fear had c confined him to the country. In Rome he maintained the rank of a man of the first distinction, but intermeddled no farther in public affairs, than became a private person, whose great employments and powerful friends gave him more weight than a common citizen. At the very first election after his resignation, he had the mortification to see Pompey, his pupil, or rather his creature, assume an ascendant over him in the assembly of the people. Pompey used all his interest to get his friend M. Æmilius Lepidus first nominated consul; Sylla on the other hand solicited for Q. Lutatius Catulus.

The former was a man of a violent temper, and a declared enemy to Sylla; whereas the latter was his intimate friend, and generally looked upon as a person of great probity, wisdom, and experience. The emulation was greater between the chiefs of Pompey resist
d the two parties, than between the candidates themselves: but Pompey, who was Sylla at the extremely favoured by the people, prevailed. His friend Lepidus was first nomi- election of con- nated consul, not by any merit or interest of his own, but by the power and solici- suls.
tation of Pompey (Y). When Pompey was coming out of the assembly, overjoyed with his success, Sylla took him aside, and told him, that he had got the worst of men named consul before the most virtuous man in Rome; but that he had no reason to triumph in his victory, because he would find, when it was too late, that he had been nourishing a snake in his bosom. What Sylla foretold proved too true, as we shall see in a more proper place. In the mean time, the two consuls entered upon their office, and the misunderstanding, which arose between them, threatening the city with a new storm, Sylla withdrew again to his country-house, and there gave himself up to e the most infamous debaucheries, though full sixty years of age. The charms of his Sylla's de- wife Valeria could not keep him from a scandalous commerce with actors and actresses. baunched life in bios, who acted womens parts on the stage. With these he spent whole days and nights in drinking and revelling, which brought a distemper upon him, that soon put an end to his life. His blood was corrupted, and bred an imposthume in his bowels. This he was not aware of till the corruption infected his flesh, and his whole body swarmed with vermin. Many slaves were employed night and day in destroying them; but they multiplied so fast, that his cloaths, baths, rooms, and his very f food, was covered with them. He went often every day into the waters to cleanse his body; but being at last sensible, that his distemper was past curing, he applied himself to the finishing of his memoirs; in the twenty-second book of which he declared, that the Chaldeans had foretold him, that, after he had acquired great power and glory, he should conclude the last act of his life in full prosperity. Ten days before his death he

(Y) There was no primacy or distinction between the two consuls. They were both equal in dignity and authority. But it was an honour to be named first; for the people gave stronger evidences of their zeal and affection for him, than they did for the other, who was named in the second place.

The advantage of the consul first named was so ininterposed in some disputes, which the inhabitants of Puteoli had among themselves, a reconciled the contending parties, and prescribed them a form of government, which they adopted. The day before he died he was informed, that Granius, the chief magistrate of Puteoli, delayed paying the immense sums due from him to the public, in hopes of being freed from that obligation by Sylla's death. Hereupon Sylla sent for him into his bed-chamber, and there ordered his slaves to strangle him in his presence ; but straining his voice in the heat of his passion, he broke the imposthume, and voided a great deal of blood. This discharge weakened him to such a degree, that he passed the night in great agony, and died the day following, leaving behind him two children very young by his wife Metella. Valeria was afterwards delivered of a daughter named Posthuma, for so the Romans called those who were born after the death of their fathers^a. He was, without all doubt, one of the greatest commanders Rome ever bred, and as able a statesman. But most of the antients seem to have drawn a veil over all his good qualities, and to have displayed only his cruelties and proscriptions, which, we own, betrayed a most cruel and inhuman temper. But after all, we ought not to forget that greatness of mind truly heroic, which appeared in his unexpected and surprising abdication. What could a man of the most refined virtue have done more, than restore his country to its antient liberty, reform the republic with excellent laws, revive and enforce the old institutions, and lay down his power as soon as it was no longer necessary for the public good ? Could the warmest patriot have shewn a more generous regard for his country ? His funeral occasioned a misunderstanding between the consuls. Lepidus was for having him carried to the burial-place of his ancestors, without any mark of distinction. But Catulus made use of all the authority his office gave him, and Pompey of his interest with the people, to have the funeral honours paid to the deceased, which were due to his merit. And indeed never was a more magnificent funeral seen in Rome. His corpse, being placed on a rich bier, was carried on the shoulders of four senators, and attended by the pontifices, the vestals, the senate in a body, all the curule magistrates, the whole body of Roman knights, and a numerous train of officers, who had served under him in Africa, Greece, Asia, and Italy. The vestals and pontifices sung hymns in praise of the deceased, which were repeated by the senate, the knights, and the whole multitude. The body was burnt with great solemnity in the field of Mars, where no funeral pile had been raised ever since the time of the first kings. Many statues were erected to his memory, and a most magnificent monument in the field of Mars, with an epitaph of his own composing, the substance of which was, that no friend had ever done him so much good, nor enemy so much hurt, but he had returned both with usury^c. Of all his friends, who were almost numberless, Pompey alone, whose ingratitude gave him no small offence, was left out of his will.

Sylla was no sooner dead, than new disturbances sprung up in the republic. M. Æmilius Lepidus the consul did all that lay in his power to revive the old quarrels between the nobility and the people, hoping by that means to make himself as absolute master of the government as Sylla had been. He began with attempting to annul Sylla's acts, which would have deprived the republic of the many wise laws the dictator had made. But he was therein resolutely opposed by his colleague Catulus ; and the misunderstanding between the two chief magistrates was carried so far, that the senate, dreading the consequences of their quarrel, forced them to swear, that they would not take up arms against each other. Care was also taken to separate the two rivals, and to make the turbulent Lepidus set out without delay for Transalpine Gaul, which had fallen to him by lot. The incendiary indeed left Rome, at the head of a consular army ; but, instead of passing the Alps, continued in Hetruria, till his consulate was near expiring. He then drew near Rome with his army, which he had taken care to strengthen with new levies in Hetruria, and openly declared, that his design was to procure himself a second consulate by force, if he could not obtain it otherwise. He expected to have entered Rome without opposition ; but to his great surprise he found both his colleague and Pompey under arms, the one posted at the entrance of the bridge Milvius, the other at the foot of the Janiculus. As he was too far advanced to go back, he attempted to force his way into the city ; but was repulsed by Catulus and Pompey, and obliged to save himself by a shameful flight into Hetruria. The capital being delivered from all danger by the defeat of the seditious consul, Pompey was ordered to a to march against M. Junius Brutus, the father of the famous Brutus, who had declared for Lepidus, and commanded a great detachment in Cisalpine Gaul. Brutus, at the approach of Pompey, shut himself up in Mutina, where he was closely besieged, and at length forced to surrender up himself and his whole army at discretion. Pompey treated his troops with great humanity, but ordered Brutus himself to be beheaded, without regarding the hatred which so odious an execution might bring upon him.

b In the mean time, Lepidus, having assembled his dispersed forces, and made new levies in Hetruria and in the countries of the allies, appeared once more before Rome. But, finding Catulus ready to receive him, and being at the same time informed of the defeat of Brutus and reduction of Mutina, he retired a second time into Hetruria. Upon his retreat, the great elections were made with the usual tranquillity, when D. Junius Brutus, surnamed Lepidus, and Mamercus Æmilius Livianus were chosen consuls. And now Lepidus, having lost all hopes of obtaining the consulate, left Italy and went over to Sardinia, where he raised a new army with a design to carry the war into Sicily. But he was prevented by death from pursuing the wicked measures he had taken. He is said to have died of grief upon the receipt of a letter, assuring him, that his wife, in his absence, had proved unfaithful to him. His party fell with him; and Catulus and Pompey shared between them the glory of having saved Rome from the new misfortunes that threatened her.^w Lepidus dies in Sardinia.

c DURING these transactions at home, Muræna, whom Sylla had left in Asia, unjustly attacked the king of Pontus, and forced him into the second Mithridatic war, of which we have given a very particular account in our history of Pontus.

d Italy now enjoyed a profound tranquillity; but the party of Marius and Cinna was still kept up in Spain by the brave Sertorius, whose noble exploits, since his proscription and flight, we have, to avoid confusion, reserved for this place. Upon the first advantages gained by Sylla in Italy, Sertorius, who had been appointed by the Marian faction prætor of Spain, retired thither, to secure that country, which would be a refuge to his friends, and a support to his declining party. Notwithstanding the opposition he met with from the Barbarians, through whose countries he passed, he got safe to his government; and there, by his affable and obliging behaviour, so gained the affections both of the nobility and people, that all Spain declared for the new prætor. Thus that flourishing country was unfortunately brought to take part in the divisions of the republic, and by that means became the seat of the civil war, which ambition had begun at Rome. Sylla no sooner heard of the arrival of Sertorius in Spain, than he sent Caius Annius at the head of a powerful army to drive him from thence. Sertorius, having timely notice of the dictator's design, immediately detached Julius Salinator with a body of six thousand men to guard the narrow passes of the Pyrenees; which he did so effectually, that Annius, upon his arrival finding it impossible to open himself a way into Spain, incamped at the foot of the mountains, in great perplexity, not knowing what course to take. But, in the mean time, one Calpurnius Lanarius, being gained over by Annius, treacherously murdered Julius Salinator, which so terrified the troops under his command, that they abandoned the passes, and gave Annius an opportunity of penetrating into the heart of Spain. Sertorius not being strong enough to keep the field, retired with three thousand men to New Carthage, and there imbarquing on board a fleet, hastily got together, passed over into Africa, and landed on the coast of Mauritania. His men went ashore to supply themselves with fresh water; but, while they were straggling about with too much security, the Barbarians fell upon them, and put many of them to the sword. This new misfortune forced Sertorius to sail back to Spain; but finding the whole coast lined with Annius's men, he put out to sea again, not knowing what course to steer. At some distance from the coast he fell in with a small fleet of Cilician pirates, who were cruising between Africa and Spain, and having prevailed on them to join him in hopes of booty, he sailed for the island of Pityusa, now Ivica, on the coast of Africa, where he made a descent, overpowered the garison placed there by Annius, and got a considerable booty. This slight advantage brought Annius in person upon him with a great fleet, having five thousand soldiers on board. Though Sertorius's fleet consisted of vessels not built for strength, but for lightness, he made ready to engage the enemy. But a violent storm arising, most of his ships were driven against the rocky shore, and dashed to pieces. Sertorius himself, with the small remains of his shattered fleet, being prevented prevented by the fury of the weather from putting out to sea, and by the enemy from landing, was tossed about for ten days together, being all that time, as the sea ran very high, in great danger of perishing with all his men. As soon as the storm was over, he passed the streights of Gades, and landed near the mouth of the Bætis. There he met with some sea-men newly arrived from the Atlantic or Fortunate islands (Z), and was so taken with the account they gave him of those happy regions, that, being quite tired out with so many fatigues and dangers both by sea and land, he resolved to retire thither, and spend his life in peace and quietness, far from the noise of wars, and free from the troubles of government. He no sooner communicated his design to the Cilician pirates, than they abandoned him; and, chusing rather to rove about the seas in quest of spoils and riches, than to live in peace and quiet, set sail for Africa, to assist Ascalis king of Mauritania against his rebellious subjects. Sertorius, who only entertained a faint desire of a quiet and retired life, no sooner heard of this new war in Africa, than he likewise resolved to sail thither and join the enemies of Ascalis. He lost no time, but immediately put to sea, and landing on the coast of Mauritania, marched directly against Ascalis, defeated him in a pitched battle, and obliged him to take refuge in the city of Tingis, now Tangier, which he closely besieged. In the mean time, Pacianus, whom Sylla had sent to assist the king, advanced against Sertorius at the head of a considerable army. Hereupon the brave general, leaving part of his forces before the place, marched with the rest to meet Pacianus, whose forces, though far superior to his own in number, he entirely defeated, slew the general himself, and took the whole army prisoners. After this victory he not only reduced the city of Tingis, but made himself absolute master of the whole country. Having thus delivered the oppressed Mauritanians from the tyrannical yoke of Ascalis, he restored to them their estates, their cities, their laws, and their privileges, accepting only of such acknowledgements as the people freely offered him*.

HOWEVER, his reputation flew cross the sea. The Lusitanians, being threatened with a new war from Annius, sent an embassy to him, inviting him to come and take upon him the command of their armies. This was raising him to the height of his desires; he therefore immediately imbarqued with two thousand five hundred Romans, who had followed him in his flight, and seven hundred Africans, who were willing to share his fortune with him; and putting to sea steered his course towards Lusitania. In his passage he happened to fall in with the Roman fleet, commanded by Cotta; but having forced his way through it, he arrived safe on the Lusitanian coast, landed his men, and marched strait to mount Ballera, the place of the general rendezvous. There he put himself at the head of that warlike nation, and became, in a manner, king of Lusitania, the natives, who were well acquainted with his virtues, experience in war, and great abilities, investing him with an absolute and uncontrouled authority, and committing to his care themselves and their fortunes. And indeed no man was more worthy to govern a state, or command an army. He was, according to Plutarch,

* PLUT. in Sertor.

(Z) These islands, according to Plutarch, were only two in number, divided from each other by a narrow channel, and distant about ten thousand furlongs from the coast of Africa. The description he gives us of them agrees exactly with that which we read in the fourth book of the Odyssey. But after all, we are still at a loss to know what country the ancients meant by the Atlantic or Fortunate islands. Plato describes them in a very pompous manner in his Timæus and Critias; and the great extent he allows them, has inclined some, namely Ortelius and Sanfon, to believe, that he meant America. But no one, before Mr. Rusbeck, ever dreamt, that Plato in describing his Atlantis had Scandinavia in view, which comprehends the kingdoms of Norway and Sweden. That learned writer, in love with the colds and frosts of his native country, finds all the charms of this renowned island in those northern and frozen countries. To convince others of this, he urges no fewer than a hundred and two arguments in his work intitled Atlantica, and finds in certain ruins not far from Upsal the same situation and dimensions which Plato gives to the capital of Atlantis. Norway and Sweden are, we allow, most pleasant and delightful countries; but we can hardly persuade ourselves, that Homer had either of them in view, when he described the Elysian fields, which he places in the island of Atlantis. His description of that happy region is as follows:

Elysium shall be thine; the blissful plains
Of utmost earth, where Rhadamanthus reigns.
Joys ever young, unmix'd with pain or fear,
Fill the wide circle of th' eternal year.
Stern winter smiles on that auspicious clime,
The fields are florid with unfading prime.
From the bleak pole no winds inclement blow,
Mould the round hail, or flake the fleecy snow;
But from the breezy deep the blest inhale
The flagrant murmurs of the western gale.

We can hardly believe, that stern winter smiles either upon Norway or Sweden, that the fields there are florid with unfading prime, that no inclement winds blow from the bleak pole, &c. and therefore are inclined to think, that father Kircher guessed better than Mr. Rusbeck, when he took the Canaries and Afores for the Fortunate or Atlantic islands.

- ^a tarch, free from all vices, and an enemy to all sorts of pleasures; in adversity and dangers undaunted, and no ways puffed up with prosperity, but of an even mind, ever courteous and ever obliging. He was sparing and backward in punishing, but in rewarding liberal and magnificent, even to prodigality. As to war, none of the most famous and renowned generals of antiquity understood that art better than Sertorius. He did not confine himself to one uniform method in ranging his cohorts and disposing his squadrons, but varied it according to the character of his enemy. Though he approved of the order of battle established among the Romans, yet he would not servilely adhere to it on all occasions, but changed it when he thought proper, and by that means often broke the measures of the generals who opposed him. His masterpiece was the art of harassing the enemy, laying ambuscades, surprising them in narrow passes, tiring them with long marches, and avoiding a general engagement unless he was sure of victory. With these qualifications, Sertorius, at the head of eight thousand men, made war with four Roman generals, who had under their command a hundred and twenty thousand foot, six thousand horse, and two thousand archers and slingers. Titus Didius, governor of Bætica, was the first champion who entered the lists with him, and gave him battle among the mountains. But that weak general was defeated with the loss of two thousand men, and driven out of the field. ^{His character:} Defeats T. Didius.
- ^b Hereupon Sylla dispatched Metellus, one of the best generals then in Rome, to stop the progress of this new enemy. But the reputation of that great commander suffered much by this expedition. For he did not know which way to turn himself, having to do with a man of undaunted boldness and uncommon sagacity, who was continually molesting him, and yet could not be brought to a pitched battle; but, by the swiftness and dexterity of his Spanish soldiery, was continually changing his station, casting his army into all forms, and every day contriving new stratagems. Metellus on his first arrival sent for L. Domitius, then prætor of Hispania to his assistance. But Sertorius, informed of the march of Domitius, detached Hirtuleius or Herculeius, his quæstor, against him, who gave the Roman prætor a total overthrow. Hereupon Metellus ordered Lucius Lollius, prætor of Narbonne Gaul, to leave his province and join him. But Hirtuleius, meeting him in the neighbourhood of Ilerda, now Lerida, gained a complete victory over him, dispersed his troops, and killed his lieutenant-general. ^{Gains great advantages over the Romans.}
- ^c Upon the fame of these victories, all those, who were dissatisfied with the government of Sylla, especially such of the proscribed persons as could escape his fury, flocked to Sertorius from all parts. Insomuch, that he soon saw in his camp such a number of illustrious Roman citizens, that he formed a senate of them, whose authority he set up in competition with that of the senate of Rome. Out of them he likewise chose his quæstors, his military tribunes, and other officers of his army. Thus he erected Lusitania into a new republic, which, as it consisted chiefly of Romans, rivalled that of Rome. Sylla, highly provoked to see a proscribed person thus reigning in Spain, and the republic robbed of one of the finest parts of her dominions, was continually sending fresh supplies to Metellus; but Sertorius, at the head of a handful of men, who were accustomed to range about the mountains, to endure hunger and thirst, and to live exposed to the wind and weather without fire or covering, so harassed the Roman army, that Metellus himself began to be quite disheartened. If he sent out his men in parties to forage, Sertorius, who was well acquainted with the country, scarce ever failed of cutting off their retreat; if the whole army marched in a body, he was continually harassing and alarming them, falling on their rear, blocking up the narrow passes, intercepting their convoys, cutting off their stragglers, &c. if they laid siege to any town, he presently appeared, besieged them, and reduced them to great straits for want of provisions. By this means Metellus suffered the same inconveniencies as if he had been conquered, while Sertorius reaped all the advantages of a conqueror. ^{Harasses Metellus's troops.}
- ^d The latter being informed, that his rival had spoke of him with contempt, as if he declined fighting out of cowardice, immediately sent him a challenge, inviting him to put an end to the war by a single combat. But Metellus, who was advanced in years, wisely refused to enter the lists with a strong active man, then in the flower of his age, thinking that it became a general, as Theophrastus observes, to die like a general, and not like a gladiator. However, his declining the challenge brought him into discredit with the undiscerning multitude; and he, to recover his reputation by some signal action, turned his arms against Lacobriga (A), a considerable

able city of the Turduli, which he hoped to take in two days time, there being but one well within the city. But Sertorius found means to convey into the city, before Metellus invested it, six thousand skins full of water, and to remove all those who could be of no service during the siege; so that Metellus continued a long time before the place, without gaining the least advantage over the enemy. When he had spent most part of his provisions, he sent out Aquinus, at the head of six thousand men, to bring in fresh supplies from the neighbouring country. But the brave Sertorius falling unexpectedly on Aquinus, cut in pieces part of his detachment, and took the rest prisoners, the commander himself being the only man, who had the good luck to make his escape. And now Metellus, being reduced to great straits for want of provisions, shamefully raised the siege, and withdrew from before the place amidst the hisses of the Spaniards, who insulted him from their ramparts.

Sertorius having gained the esteem, love, and admiration of the Lusitanians by these repeated advantages, and much more by his obliging and insinuating behaviour, changed their savage and furious manner of fighting, brought them to make use of the Roman arms, taught them to keep their ranks and follow their ensigns, and, in short, out of a confused multitude of thieves and robbers, formed a regular well-disciplined army. He likewise bestowed liberally upon them gold and silver to adorn their arms, caused their shields to be wrought and ingraven with various figures, and, by conversing familiarly with them, prevailed upon them to lay aside their own dress, and assume the Roman toga or gown. But what delighted them most was, the care he took of their children. For he sent for all the children of the noblemen in those parts, placed them in the great city of Osca (B), and there appointed masters to instruct them in the Greek and Roman learning, that they might in due time, as he gave out, be capable of sharing with him the government of the republic. Under this pretence he really made them hostages for the fidelity of their parents (C), who nevertheless were wonderfully pleased to see their children going daily to school in good order, and handsomely dressed in fine long garments edged with purple. Sertorius paid large salaries for their learning, often inquired what progress they had made, examined them himself, and rewarded the most deserving with those Bullæ Aureæ, which were at Rome the chief distinction of children of high birth. At this time a custom prevailed among the Spaniards and Lusitanians, that when a great commander was slain in battle, all those who attended him died with him, either by the enemy's swords, or their own. This the inhabitants called an offering, or devoting of themselves (D). Of these Sertorius had many thousands, all resolved to sacrifice their lives for his safety, and stand by him to the last. Plutarch tells us, that his army being once defeated near a city in Spain, and the enemy pressing hard upon his broken troops, they, forgetful of their own danger, and concerned only for their general, took him upon their shoulders, and passing him from one to another, conveyed him into the city, and then shifted, in the best manner they could, for themselves. Nay, his soldiers not only revered him as an invincible general, but as a man inspired and a favourite of heaven. This opinion he gained among the superstitious Lusitanians by several artifices, and deluding impostures, among which that of the hind was none of the

(B) The city of Osca, now Huesca, stood in the country of the Hergetes, a people of Tarraconian Spain. It now belongs to the kingdom of Arragon.

(C) This was a true fetch in politics. Sertorius knew how to ingratiate himself with the people by the same means that assured him of their fidelity. Alexander the Great had done the same thing before him.

(D) The same custom obtained in Gaul, where a number of resolute men, called Soldurii, devoted themselves to a prince, or some great commander, to share with him both his good and bad fortune, and either to fall with him in battle, or kill themselves in case he was defeated. This was a point of honour, wherein none of them were ever known to fail (17). Dion tells us, that one Sextus Pacuvius or Apudius devoted himself in full senate to Augustus, after the manner of the Spaniards, and would have forced all the rest to follow his example. But this was the action of a vile mercenary flatterer, who meant nothing of what he said, and did it only to ingratiate himself with his prince; wherein indeed he succeeded, for in courts hypocrisy often prevails over truth. This custom did not only prevail in Gaul and Spain, but in many other parts of the world, and in our days in the island of Ceylan and in the kingdom of Tunquin. Those who thus devote themselves are in some places called The king's vassals in this world and in the next. We wish Plutarch had told us by what name those heroic persons were distinguished in Spain, as Cæsar has acquainted us what those of the same order were called in Gaul.

a the least. A Lusitanian, by name Spanus, meeting one day a doe, which in flying from the hunters had just dropped a hind-calf, took up the fawn, and brought it to Sertorius, who used to reward very liberally those who presented him with fruit, fowls, or venison. As the young hind was milk-white, the general was wonderfully taken with it, reared it up with great care, and made it so tame, that it followed him where-ever he went, without being in the least frightened at the noise and hurry of the camp. As he was well acquainted with the superstition and credulity of the Lusitanians, he gave out by degrees, that the hind was inspired, that it was given him by Diana, and that it discovered hidden mysteries. When he received any private intelligence of the enemy's designs or motions, he pretended, that the hind had informed him of b them in his sleep, and charged him to keep his forces in readiness. Upon the first notice of any advantage gained by the officers, who commanded under him, he used to bring forth the hind crowned with flowers, and encourage his soldiers to return thanks to the gods for the account they should soon receive of some prosperous success (E). By these and such-like devices he brought the Lusitanians to look upon him as a man sent them from heaven, or rather as a god under the appearance of a man. Hence Metellus, though an old and experienced general, could not, during Sylla's life-time, gain the least advantage over him, or prevail upon one city to declare against him. When Sylla was dead, the republic, alarmed at the extraordinary progress Sertorius
 c made in Lusitania, resolved to send another general against him with such a force as might crush him at once. All the officers of any note in Rome earnestly solicited so honourable a commission, and among the rest Pompey, who had just suppressed the troubles raised by Lepidus. We are told, that though all was quiet in Rome, Pompey still kept his army on foot in the neighbourhood of the city, and under various pretences refused to disband it, till the senate at last thought fit to decree him the government of Lusitania. L. Philippus was the first who made this motion in the senate, which was opposed by several senators, who were against bestowing so honourable an employment on a young man, before he had passed through the inferior offices. One of them, surprised at the motion, asked Philippus, whether his meaning was, that Pompey should be sent into Spain proconsul, that is, instead of a consul. No, replied Philippus, but
 d pro consulis, that is, instead of both consuls, intimating thereby, that the consuls for the year were men of no merit, and incapable of managing the war in that province. After a long and warm debate a decree passed, appointing Pompey commander in chief of the army, that was to march into Lusitania to the assistance of Metellus. It was no sooner passed, than Pompey set out from Rome, at the head of the troops he had kept together after the defeat of Lepidus 2.

He makes use of a hind to impose upon the superstitious Lusitanians.

Pompey appointed to command against Sertorius.

In the meantime, the republic chose for her new consuls Cn. Octavius Nepos and Caius Curio, who made it their whole business to support the regulations Sylla had made against the attempts of the tribunes of the people. The dictator had reduced their power almost to nothing, but upon his death their ambition revived. At the head of the college was at this time one Cneius Sicinius, whose chief talent was buffoonry, the art of mimicking, and turning into ridicule the most proper gestures and most serious discourses of the greatest orators. Though he was a man of no principles or probity, yet he had found means to please the multitude; and, depending upon their favour, he had the confidence to summon the consuls to appear in the comitium, and there give an account why they deprived the tribunes of their ancient prerogatives. The consuls obeyed the summons, and on the day appointed appeared before the people, when Curio spoke with all the dignity of a consul and all the force of a great orator, shewing, that the late disturbances owed their rise to the abuse of the too great power which the tribunes had usurped. While he was speaking, Sicinius mimicked all his gestures and motions, making wry faces to divert the attention of the people. But all in vain; truth prevailed over the fondness of the populace for buffoonries; the tribunes continued in the same low condition, to which Sylla had reduced them, and the patricians triumphed. The whole glory of this victory was owing to Curio; for his colleague Octavius, who was troubled with the rheumatism, kept the whole time a profound silence, sitting on the rostra wrapped up in linen, and covered over with plaisters, which gave the facetious tribune an opportunity to rally him, as he came down from the rostra, and tell him with a sneer, That he was obliged to his colleague, who, by throwing himself about as usual, had saved him from being devoured by the flies. In short, Sicinius was so very witty, that he was assassinated before his office expired, and the republic delivered from a dangerous citizen ^a.

(E) We meet in ancient history with many examples of such devices, made use of by the greatest generals, and wisest law-givers, the better to impose upon the superstition and credulity of the people. A few years before, Marius, as we have related above, imposed upon his soldiers by a Syrian woman, who passed for a great prophetess, and by tame vultures, which he had accustomed to follow him, and come to him, when called. These juggling tricks were not only practised in the times of ignorance and darkness, but are renewed in our days, in the days of the greatest light and knowledge.

begins to shine

THIS year Julius Cæsar; tho' but twenty-two years of age, began to shine at the bar. After he had signalized his valour at the siege of Mitylene, as we have related above, he applied himself to the study of eloquence, and this year accused Cn. Cornelius Dolabella, formerly prætor of Macedon, and honoured with the consulate and a triumph. He charged him with male-administration; but Quintus Hortensius and Caius Aurelius Cotta, the two greatest orators in Rome, pleaded with so much eloquence in favour of the accused, that he was acquitted. However, Cæsar gained the reputation of being one of the best orators of his age, and would have challenged the first place among men of that character, had he not proved, to the great misfortune of the republic, one of her greatest warriors (F). Not long after he had accused Dolabella, he imbarqued for Rhodes, with a design to improve himself in the art of oratory under Apollonius, one of the greatest rhetoricians of his time; but he was taken in his passage by some pirates, who, with a few large ships and a vast number of small vessels, infested those seas. When they demanded twenty talents for his ransom, he smiled at them, as not understanding the value of their prisoner, and voluntarily engaged to pay them fifty, that is nine thousand six hundred and eighty-seven pounds ten shillings. Accordingly he dispatched some of his domestics to raise the sum he had promised in the neighbouring cities, and in the mean time remained in the hands of those robbers, with only one friend and two attendants. During the thirty-eight days he spent among them, he applied himself to the study of eloquence and poetry, wrote verses, and composed speeches, which he repeated to them, reproaching those who did not admire them with barbarity and ignorance. He conversed familiarly with them; but always treated them with a high hand, and often in raillery threatened to have them crucified, if they disturbed him when he had a mind to sleep. The pirates, ascribing this free way of talking to simplicity and a juvenile vivacity, were mightily taken with it. When his ransom came, which the Milesians raised by a tax upon themselves, he immediately paid it; and being discharged, he went directly to Miletus, manned some ships there, and with them surprised the pirates, took most of them prisoners, and carried them to Pergamus. As it belonged to Junius, at that time prætor of Asia, to determine their punishment, Cæsar applied to him, while he was taking a progress through the Asiatic province. Junius, who was a very covetous man, and hoped to extort great sums from the pirates, answered, That he would think at his leisure what to do with the prisoners. Upon which Cæsar, taking his leave of him, returned to Pergamus, where he ordered the pirates to be brought forth and crucified; a punishment which he had often threatened them with while he was in their hands, and which they never dreamt he would be ever able to inflict upon them ^b (G). He then went to Rhodes, where he improved his talent for oratory, under the famous rhetorician Apollonius Molon (H), who at that time had Cicero for his auditor.

(F) In his pleadings, says Plutarch (18), he appeared with all the graces of an excellent orator, and gained much upon the affections of the people by the easiness of his address and conversation, in which he was accomplished beyond what could be expected from his age. He was by nature excellently framed, says the same writer, for a perfect statesman and orator, and took great pains to improve his genius that way in his youth; but he never rose up to that pitch of eloquence, to which nature would have carried him, being diverted by those expeditions and designs, which at length gained him the empire: whence he himself, in his answer to Cicero's panegyric on Cato, desires his reader not to compare the plain discourse of a Soldier with the studied harangues of an orator, who was not only endued with fine parts, but had employed his whole life in this one study (19).

(G) Plutarch, in this place, contradicts Suetonius, whom we have followed. The former writer tells us, that Cæsar was taken by the pirates near the island of Pharmacusa, on his return from Bithynia, where he had resided some time, at the court of king Nicomedes, as we have related above.

(H) Plutarch calls Apollonius Molon's son, and of one man makes two; for Apollonius himself, and not his father, was called Molon, as is evident from Suetonius, Quintilian, and Cicero, who often call him Molon simply, without the addition of the other appellation, which would have been very improper; if a IN the mean time Pompey, having spent the winter in Narbonne Gaul, and in the beginning of the spring passed the Pyrenees, after having surmounted the obstacles which some Gaulish nations threw in his way, appeared on the frontiers of Hither Spain. There he was informed, that the Roman troops, under the command of Perperna, or Perpenna, had, in spite of their general, joined Sertorius, and taken the military oath to him. Perperna, after the death of Lepidus, whose lieutenant he was, had got together the remains of his army, amounting to fifty-three cohorts, that is, Perperna retires to Spain. about thirty-two thousand men; and had marched with them into Spain, intending to settle there, as Sertorius had done, and to make war with Metellus by himself, thinking it below a man of his birth and rank to act in subordination to one, who was b not even a Roman; but when his soldiers understood, that Pompey had passed the Pyrenees at the head of a mighty army, they took up their arms and ensigns, and threatened to abandon Perperna, if he did not instantly lead them to Sertorius, and resign the command to a general, who was able to defend himself and those who served under him. Perperna complied, tho' much against his will, with their desire, joined Sertorius, and served under him as a subaltern. Sertorius, now at the head His troops join Sertorius. of a very considerable army, took the field, in order to stop the progress of Pompey, whose high character, founded on many glorious exploits, was a strong prejudice in his favour. He was in the flower of his age, at most about thirty, had been honoured some years before with a triumph and the surname of Great, and was now empowered to act separately and independently of Metellus, with the title of proconsul. c Upon his arrival, several cities, which had hitherto continued faithful to Sertorius, began to waver, and seemed inclined to open their gates to a general, whose great fame had already reached the most remote corners of Spain. Sertorius therefore, to prevent their defection by some signal action, and to make them sensible that Pompey's protection could avail them little against his power and resentment, entered the province of Hither Spain, which was most devoted to the republic, and there, tho' Pompey was advancing full march against him, laid siege to Lauron, now Liria, a strong city on the banks of the Turia. Pompey, not doubting but he should be able Sertorius besieges Lauron. to raise the siege, marched quite up to the enemy's lines, and thinking he had inclosed d them between his own army and the city, found means to convey a messenger into the place, to acquaint the garison, that those who besieged them were themselves besieged, and would be soon obliged to retire with shame and disgrace. Sertorius, when informed of this message, smiled, and turning to the officers about him, I will teach Sylla's disciple, said he, that it is the duty of a general to look as well behind him as before him. Having thus spoke, he sent orders to a detachment of six thousand men, who lay concealed among the mountains, to draw near to Pompey, and fall upon his rear, if he should offer to force the lines. Pompey, surprized at their sudden appearance, durst not stir out of his camp; but was forced to sit still, and see his friends and if he had been only the son of Molon. Plutarch falls into the same mistake in the life of Cicero, as the learned Rualdus observes. Thus far M. Dacier, in her notes upon Plutarch. But that learned critic is certainly mistaken, it being evident from Strabo, that Molon and Apollonius were two different men; for he tells us in express terms, that Molon and Apollonius were both natives of Alabanda, a city of Caria; that they were both scholars of Meneclæ the Alabandian; and that they both professed the same art at Rhodes, tho' Molon went thither later than Apollonius, who, on that account, applied to him that of Homer Ὀψὲ Μέλων; for he was likewise called by some Molon, by others Μαλακὸς, or the Soft (20). Cicero likewise distinguishes them, calling the one Molon, and the other Apollonius the Alabandian, especially in his first book de oratore, where he introduces M. Antonius speaking of him thus: For this one thing I always liked Apollonius the Alabandian; tho' he taught for money, he did not suffer any, whom he thought incapable of becoming orators, to lose their time and labour with him; but sent them home, exhorting them to apply their minds to that art, for which they were, in his opinion, best qualified. It were much to be wished, that those who, in our days, set up for teachers and schoolmasters, were as honest and disinterested as Apollonius. Of this Apollonius Plutarch relates, that as he was not well versed in the Latin tongue, he desired Cicero to declaim in Greek. The Roman was mightily pleased with this motion, supposing, that Apollonius could better correct him, in case he should say any thing amiss; but while those who were present, amazed at his eloquence and the purity of his diction, strove to outdo one another in commending him, Apollonius neither expressed any satisfaction in his countenance while his disciple was speaking, nor applauded him after he had done; but, without uttering a word, continued in his place musing and pensive. When he observed Cicero to be uneasy at this behaviour, he addressed him thus: Take courage, Cicero; I both praise and admire you; but I am sorry for poor Greece, when I see the two only ornaments that were left us, learning and eloquence, transferred by you from us to the Romans. This Apollonius supplied Apion the grammarian, if Josephus is to be credited (21), with the many falsehoods he published against the Jews and their temple.

and confederates ruined before its face: for the besieged, despairing of relief, delivered themselves up to Sertorius, who spared their lives and granted them their liberty; but burnt their city, not out of anger or cruelty, to which Sertorius was an utter stranger, but that it might be said, for the greater confusion of the admirers of Pompey, that tho' he was so near the fire, which burnt down a confederate city, as to be well warmed by it, yet it was not able to raise heat enough in him to make him attempt the relief of it^b. Frontinus tells us, that Pompey, without coming to a general action, lost, during the siege of Lauro, ten thousand men, cut off in small parties by Sertorius's horse, who were continually scouring the plains and intercepting all the enemy's convoys^c. However that be, it is certain, that Pompey, after the surrender of the place, retired with Metellus to the foot of the Pyrenees, and there, without putting their troops into winter-quarters as usual, suffered all the rigour of the season in tents, being afraid of a surprize from a general, whom they both dreaded and admired.

of the people
begin to recover their former power.

THE next year L. Octavius and Aurelius Cotta were chosen consuls, and upon a complaint made, that the famine occasioned in Rome by the Cilician pirates, who infested the seas, was owing to Sylla's having lessened the power of the tribunes of the people, Cotta was weak enough to give up one point in their favour, to the great prejudice of the republic. He consented, that, for the future, the tribunes might be promoted to superior offices, contrary to a law enacted by Sylla. Thus they began to recover by degrees their former power, which, in the end, proved the ruin of the republican government^d.

Hertuleius

BUT to return to Spain. As soon as the season was proper for action, Metellus took the field, and marched against Hirtuleius, one of Sertorius's lieutenants, engaged him, and, after a most obstinate dispute which lasted the whole day, put him to flight. Hirtuleius lost in the action twenty thousand men, was himself dangerously wounded, and very narrowly escaped falling into the enemy's hands^e. Sertorius, upon the news of this overthrow, advanced with all possible expedition to the banks of the Sucro in Tarraconian Spain, intending to attack Pompey, who was incamped there, before he could be joined by Metellus, and by that means repair the loss which his lieutenant had sustained. On the other hand, Pompey, fearing Metellus should share with him the glory of the victory, made what haste he could to engage Sertorius before his arrival. However, Sertorius, considering that the darkness of the night would be a great disadvantage to the enemy, whether they were conquerors or conquered, none of them being acquainted with the country, delayed engaging till the close of the day, and then advanced in order of battle against his rival, whose troops were drawn up in a large plain on the banks of the Sucro. Pompey, tho' well apprised of the enemy's design in putting off the engagement till the evening, would not decline it, for fear Metellus should in the mean time join him with his victorious troops, and rob him in great measure of the glory, which he promised himself from conquering a commander of so great reputation. The attack was begun with equal valour on both sides. Pompey, who commanded his own right wing, soon obliged Perperna, who commanded the enemy's left wing, to give way. Hereupon Sertorius, committing the care of his right wing to his lieutenants, flew to the assistance of the left; and having, what by promises what by menaces, brought his flying troops back to the charge, fell upon Pompey with such fury, that, in spite of his utmost efforts, he was forced to give way, and betake himself to flight. As he was flying, an African of a gigantic size, who pursued him close, had already lifted up his arm to discharge a blow at him with his broad sword; but Pompey, more active and nimble than the unwieldy African, prevented him by cutting off his hand at the first blow. He then continued his flight; but being wounded and thrown from his horse, he would have been made prisoner, had not the Africans, who pursued him, quarrelled about his horse's golden trappings and rich caparison. While they were dividing the spoil, Pompey made his escape, and, with much-ado, being wounded in the thigh with an arrow, reached his camp. On the other hand, Afranius, who commanded the left wing of the Roman army, had all the advantage over the wing Sertorius had left; he put them into disorder, forced them to retire in confusion, and pursued them so close, that he entered the enemy's camp with the fugitives; but while his troops were busy in rifling the tents, Sertorius came upon them unexpectedly, made a made a dreadful slaughter of them at the head of his victorious forces, and retook his camp. Early next morning, Sertorius drew up his army in the same plain, being resolved to venture a second engagement, which he had taken proper measures to make decisive; but in the mean time Metellus coming up, he drew off, and returned to his camp, saying, Had it not been for the old woman, meaning Metellus, I would have whipt the boy soundly, and sent him back to Rome^f.

b At this time Sertorius was greatly concerned for the loss of his hind, which had gone astray, being frightened with the noise and hurry of the late battle. He was thereby destitute of an admirable contrivance to encourage the superstitious people, and inspire them with an awful respect for his person; but, by good fortune, some of his men, who were wandering about in the night, meeting her and knowing her by her colour, retook her. The general was overjoyed with the news, and promised an ample reward to those who had found her, provided they kept it secret and locked her up carefully. A few days after he appeared in public with a cheerful countenance, and declared to the chief nobility, that the gods had foretold him in a dream, that some extraordinary good fortune would soon attend him. He then ascended his tribunal, and while he was there administering justice and giving audience to his officers and soldiers, the favourite hind being let loose, pursuant to his directions, no sooner discovered her master, than she ran bounding to him with great joy, leaped on the tribunal, laid her head in his lap, and licked his hand. Sertorius in return stroked c and caressed her with all the tokens of a real tenderness and affection, inasmuch, that tears ran down his cheeks. All those who were present, filled with wonder and astonishment, proclaimed him above the rank of common men, looked upon him as a person highly favoured by the gods, and with respectful congratulations and loud shouts of joy, attended him to his tent, protesting, that they were ready to shed the last drop of their blood in his defence^g.

Sertorius, not thinking it adviseable to engage Pompey and Metellus at the same time, retired in the night from his camp; and, upon his retreat, Pompey went out to receive and welcome Metellus. As he drew near, Pompey, out of respect to him as his superior officer, ordered his lictors to lower their fasces; but Metellus would d not assume any distinction, except that of giving the watch-word to the whole army while they incamped together. As a perfect harmony reigned both between the generals and the two armies, they agreed to march after Sertorius, and attack him in his new post. They found his army divided into two bodies, one commanded by Perperna, the other by himself. After they had continued some days in sight of each other, Metellus fell upon Perperna, and Pompey led his forces against Sertorius, in hopes of recovering the reputation he had lost in the late battle. The engagement was so furious and obstinate, that it lasted the whole day; but in the end Pompey was defeated Pompey de- anew and put to flight, after having lost six thousand men, among whom was feated anew. Memmius, his lieutenant, and one of the greatest officers of his time. On the other hand, e Metellus put Perperna to flight, and killed five thousand of his men; but Sertorius, having rallied the fugitives and renewed the fight, repulsed Metellus in his turn, and, cutting his way through the battalions that surrounded him, wounded him with his lance, and would have soon dispatched him, had not his troops, ashamed to leave their general in distress, returned to the charge. After they had rescued Metellus they fell upon the Lusitanians, who attended Sertorius, with such fury, that they obliged them to retire in great confusion. The brave general, having attempted several times in vain to rally his troops and lead them back to the charge, was forced at length to quit the field. He withdrew to a city among the mountains, not that he designed to stand a siege there, but only to deceive Pompey and Metellus. f Accordingly the two generals, giving over the pursuit of the Lusitanians, hastened to lay siege to the place whither Sertorius had retreated; but while they were forming their camp, he made a sally, and escaped with his troops cross the mountains into Lusitania, where he raised a sufficient number of forces to enable him to keep the field. All the cities in his interest sent him supplies of men, money, and provisions, with such expedition, that in a very short time he appeared again at the head of a formidable army, and offered the two generals battle, which they wisely declined; but they could not avoid the continual attacks of Sertorius, who fell upon them from all quarters, drove them from post to post, and, by intercepting all their convoys, Sertorius ob- liged by Me- tellus to quit the field.

^g Idem ibid.

Pompey and Metellus reduced them to such straits, that they were obliged to separate and retire, Metellus into Gaul, and Pompey into the country of the Vaccæi, whom Isidorus places at the foot of the Pyrenees. From thence he wrote a doleful letter to the senate, demanding a speedy supply of men and money, acquainting them with the wretched condition his troops were in, and adding, that if they delayed sending him powerful reinforcements, he should be forced to return into Italy with his army. To such extremities Sertorius brought the two greatest commanders and most experienced warriors of his age ^a.

Sertorius offers to lay down his arms.

HE was now in the height of his prosperity ; but nevertheless, as he was a sincere lover of his country and had a great desire to return home, he sent word to Metellus and Pompey, that he was ready to lay down his arms and lead a private life, provided the decree of his proscription were repealed. This great desire of seeing again his native country, was chiefly owing, as Plutarch informs us, to the tender affection and extraordinary respect he always had for his mother, under whom he had been brought up with great care, having lost his father when he was very young. When he afterwards received the melancholy news of her death, he was so much affected with it, that he had almost died himself of grief; he wept bitterly, and lay seven days together on the ground, without giving the word or being seen by his most intimate friends. The chief commanders of the army and persons of the greatest distinction, crowding round his tent, with much-ado prevailed upon him to appear again in public, and take upon him the management of affairs, which were then in a very prosperous condition. All this plainly shews, that he was of a mild and compassionate temper, naturally inclined to lead a quiet life, and that he was driven by his enemies to have recourse to arms, contrary to his own inclination. What answer Pompey and Metellus returned him, historians have not told us. All we know is, that the decree of his proscription was never repealed, nor he suffered to return to his native country. ^b

IN the mean time the fame of his noble exploits, and of the great advantages he gained every day over the two most renowned generals of the republic, flew as far as Asia. Mithridates the Great had been obliged by Sylla, as we have related in our history of Pontus, to submit to such conditions of peace, as that general had been pleased to impose upon him ; but, after the decease of Sylla, he raised a powerful army, with a design to renew the war, and improve the disturbances of the republic to his advantage. As his court was at that time filled with proscribed persons, who had fled from Rome, these, especially L. Magius and L. Fannius, advised him to enter into an alliance with Sertorius; and the king, pursuant to their advice, sent ambassadors into Spain, offering the Lusitanian general three thousand talents and forty gallies completely fitted out, on condition that he would suffer him to re-conquer those provinces of Asia, which he had been forced to give in virtue of his treaty with Sylla. Upon the arrival of the ambassadors, Sertorius called a council, when all to a man approved of the king's proposals, and were very pressing with Sertorius to comply with his request, since he demanded nothing but an empty consent to an undertaking, which they could no-ways prevent. And here we cannot sufficiently admire the constancy and magnanimity of that brave commander, who, we may say, appeared greater in this glorious negotiation, than at the head of his army. Tho' it would have cost him nothing to have granted Mithridates whatever he desired, and such a grant would have procured him great sums and a considerable armament; yet he would not by any means hearken to the proposal, saying, That it was his duty to enlarge the Roman dominions by his victories, and not to increase his own power by the diminution of the Roman territories. Having therefore sent for the ambassadors, he declared to them, that he was willing their master should re-conquer Bithynia and Cappadocia, kingdoms to which the Romans had no right; but that he would not consent he should set foot in the province of Asia, that is, the kingdom of Pergamus, which undoubtedly belonged to the common-wealth, and which he had given up by a solemn treaty. With this answer he dismissed the ambassadors; and when the king heard it, he could not help admiring the magnanimity of Sertorius. What would not this Roman prescribe to us, said he, if he were at Rome, since from the shores of the Atlantic ocean, he takes upon him to set bounds to our kingdom, and threatens us with war, in case we should make any attempts upon Asia? However, the king of Pontus, ^c ^d ^e ^f

a knowing how advantageous it would prove to his designs to foment the civil war, con-cluded the treaty upon Sertorius's own terms. The king supplied him with three thousand talents and a fleet of forty galleys; and Sertorius sent to the king a body of troops, under the command of Marcus Marius, or, as others call him, Marcus Varius, one of the senators, who had been proscribed by Sylla^c.

Sertorius enters into an alliance with Mithridates.

b WHILE Mithridates was making prodigious preparations for war in Asia, and Sertorius in Spain, P. Servilius, with the title of proconsul, cleared the coasts and seas of the pirates who infested them, took Isaure their capital (I), and was honoured with the surname of Isauricus, and with a triumph for his success. The next year Licinius Lucullus and Aurelius Cotta were chosen consuls. The former, by paying his court to a mistress of Cetbegus, one of the tribunes of the people, got the command of the troops that were to be sent into Cilicia. His colleague was appointed to command the fleet that was to guard Bitthynia against the invasion threatened by Mithridates; but, before he set sail, he procured an unlimited commission for M. Antonius, the father of the triumvir, which was that of guarding all the sea-coasts subject to the republic. He set out with great confidence in quest of the pirates, and engaged them off the island of Crete; but he had the mortification to see most of his ships taken, and his men hanged to the masts, with the chains which he had prepared for the enemy. This sight so grieved him, that he died a few days after^c. In the mean

c time Cotta arriving in Bitthynia, found Mithridates in motion at the head of a mighty army. All the cities of Paphlagonia opened their gates to him, imagining, that, in submitting to him, they submitted to the authority of Rome, because Marius, whom Sertorius had sent into Asia in quality of proconsul, always marched before the king's troops, attended by his lictors with their fasces. The Bitthynians likewise would readily have revolted, had not Julius Cæsar, who had retired to Rhodes, as we have related above, upon the news of their motions, crossed over to the continent, raised troops without any commission, and, driving the king's emissaries out of the country, kept the cities, which were ready to revolt, steady to their duty. This was, as it were, the first essay of this young commander, who, tho' only twenty-four years of age, already equalled the oldest generals in prudence and bravery^d. On the other

d hand, the consul Cotta, being defeated in a sea engagement by the fleet of Mithridates, was forced to take refuge in Chalcedon, where he was closely besieged; but his colleague Lucullus, marching to his relief, obliged Mithridates to retire. The king went from thence to besiege Cyzicus; but was obliged by Lucullus to drop that enterprize, after having lost the greatest part of his army, which, when he sat down before the place, was thirty thousand strong. The Roman, encouraged with this success, took several places from the enemy, and put an end to the campaign by a complete victory over the king's fleet, as we have related in our history of Pontus, to which we refer our readers for a full account of what we have only hinted at in this place.

e THE republic was no less successful in Spain than in Asia. The senators and other patricians who served under Sertorius, thinking they could now make head against the enemy without him, began to be jealous of his glory. They were headed by Perperna, who was continually inveighing, both in private and in public, against Sertorius and his senate. That ambitious patrician could not brook the authority which he had assumed over his army, and flattering himself that he should succeed him in the command of all the troops in Lusitania, he plotted his ruin, and drew into the conspiracy several officers, pretending, that Sertorius slighted the Romans, and confided only in the Lusitanians. The conspirators, not daring at first to make any attempt upon his life, by reason of the great affection the Lusitanians bore him, did all

(I) Isaure, called afterwards Isauropolis, and now Saura, was the capital of Isauria, a country of Asia Minor, comprehending part of mount Taurus and the mountains between Cilicia, Lycaonia, and Pamphylia. This city, in Pliny's time, had lost much of its ancient splendor. Servilius, besides Isaure, reduced several other cities, viz. Phaselis, Olympus, and Coricus, which were retreats for pirates. The first stood on the confines of Lycia and Pamphylia. Its inhabitants, who were for the most part pirates, made use of a sort of brigantine, which from them was called phaselus. They were so poor, according to the ancients, that they sacrificed nothing but salt-fish to their gods; and hence the proverb, sacrificium Phaselitarum, to signify a mean present or offering. The city of Olympus stood on the sea-coast of Cilicia; and that of Coricus was a famous port in the same country, and is now known by the name of Carco.

all that lay in their power to alienate their minds from him, and secretly destroy his interest among them. With this view the governors of the cities abused the inhabitants, punished them with the utmost severity, and loaded them with taxes, giving out, that all this was done by the express order of Sertorius. Hereupon several cities revolted, and great disturbances were raised all over Lusitania. Sertorius sent persons, in whom he thought he could confide, to appease the mutineers; but those, in whom he reposed most confidence, being gained over by his enemies, proved traitors to him, and instead of mitigating the people by gentle methods, exasperated them with an unseasonable severity, and left them at their departure more obstinate and more inclined to revolt, than they had found them. This incensed Sertorius to such a degree, that he caused some of the children of the Lusitanians, who were educated at Osca, to be put to death, and sold others for slaves. This is the only piece of cruelty and injustice, which the author of Sertorius's life can lay to his charge (K); on all other occasions he shewed a mildness of temper hardly to be matched ^w.

IN the mean time the base Perperna increased the number of the conspirators, and, amongst others, drew in Manlius, one of the chief officers of the army. This Manlius, having conceived a shameful passion for a young Roman, disclosed to him the whole conspiracy, telling him, that he should soon see him at the head of the army. The youth discovered to one Aufidus what he had learnt of Manlius; but as Aufidus himself was one of the conspirators, and knew not that Manlius was any-ways engaged in the plot, he made slight of what the youth said; but when the young Roman named Perperna, Gracinus, Q. Fabius, Tarquinius, Sertorius's two secretaries, and several others, who, Aufidus well knew, were all in the plot, he went immediately to Perperna, gave him notice of the danger they were in, and solicited him immediately to put their design in execution. Accordingly Perperna, with the consent of the other conspirators, pitched on that very day; and they all agreed to assassinate him at an entertainment, to which no-body but he and the conspirators should be invited. As it was no easy matter to engage him in a party of pleasure, they had recourse to artifice, and provided a messenger, who brought to him feigned letters, giving him notice of a signal victory obtained by one of his lieutenants over Pompey and Metellus. He was so well pleased with this news, that he readily came into the proposal of the perfidious Perperna, and promised to pass the evening with him and his friends in mirth and jollity. Accordingly, after he had returned solemn thanks to the gods for the pretended success, he went to Perperna's quarters, to rejoice with him upon the new victory. At all entertainments, where Sertorius was present, great order and decency was observed; for they all knew, that he could not bear any loose and indecent discourses: but in the midst of this entertainment, the conspirators, pretending to be warmed with wine, began to talk very loosely, on purpose to provoke their general and pick a quarrel with him. Sertorius, offended at their indecent and disrespectful behaviour, changed his posture, and leaning backward, pretended not to hear nor regard them. Then Perperna, taking a cup full of wine, let it fall, as he was drinking, out of his hand, which was the signal agreed on. Upon this Antonius, who was next to Sertorius, drew his poniard and wounded him. The brave general strove to raise himself; but Antonius, throwing himself upon his breast, held both his hands, so that, without being in the least able to defend himself, he lay exposed to the fury of the rest of the conspirators, who fell upon him and dispatched him. Sertorius was, without contradiction, one of the greatest soldiers the republick had ever bred.

(K) However, he endeavours to excuse it, and reasons thus: "The cruelty which Sertorius practised upon the Spanish hostages seems to argue, that his clemency was not natural, but only acted as his affairs required. As to my own opinion, I am persuaded that true virtue, established by reason and mature judgment, can never be totally perverted and extirpated by any misfortune whatever; not that I think it impossible, but that great indignities offered without cause, and frequent abuses put upon those of the best nature and most virtuous inclinations, may make some impression and alteration in their temper; and

" thus, I suppose, it happened to Sertorius, who, being exasperated by repeated injuries of ungrateful persons, was at last severe to those who had wrongfully injured him." Thus far Plutarch (22). What that writer did not think impossible, is not only possible, but very common; for nothing can be truer, than what Electra says in Sophocles; It is very difficult, my friends, for any one in my condition to keep within due bounds, and not repine at providence. Such woful calamities change our very nature, and force us, in spite of ourselves, to become wicked. This is the only reason that can be offered as an excuse for Sertorius.

- a bred. Rome was so fully convinced of it, that she sent against him two of the greatest generals she had, Metellus and Pompey; but the glory, which these two renowned warriors had acquired elsewhere, was eclipsed in Spain: they could never gain any considerable advantage over the Lusitanian general, and were at last by him driven quite out of the field, and forced to shelter themselves either in Gaul, or among the most inaccessible mountains. Pompey, who had been honoured in his youth with a triumph and the surname of Great, and had filled all Italy, Sicily, and Africa with the fame of his exploits, gained nothing in Spain, so long as Sertorius lived, but shame and disgrace. Upon his death, the treacherous Perperna took upon him the command of the army; but soon made it appear, that he understood no more how to command, than how to obey; for Pompey, who had continued for some time inactive in a corner of Hither Spain, no sooner heard of Sertorius's death, than he left the place of his retreat, marched against Perperna, gained an easy and complete victory over him, and took the traitor himself prisoner. As Perperna had, on Sertorius's death, seized on all his papers, he offered to shew Pompey letters from the greatest men in Rome, inviting him into Italy; but Pompey, not vouchsafing to see the perfidious wretch, ordered him to send to him all Sertorius's papers and writings sealed up. He no sooner received them, than he caused them to be burnt unopened, in the presence of all the officers of his army; and immediately after ordered Perperna to be put to death, lest he should name any of Sertorius's correspondents, and by that means give occasion to new disturbances. As to the rest of the conspirators, some of them were taken and put to death by Pompey's order; others fled into Africa, where they were murdered by the Mauritanians. In a short time not one of them was left alive, except Ausidus, who, not being much inquired after, died many years after in an obscure village of Spain, in extreme poverty and abhorred by all *. The death of Perperna put an end to the war, which had employed the greatest generals and the best forces of the republic almost ten years. Pompey, tho' he gained little reputation by this expedition, yet he had the glory of ending it successfully. He continued some time in Spain, to reduce the rebellious cities, and then returned with his army into Italy.
- d SCARCE was the rebellion in Spain at an end, when a new storm arose in the heart of Italy. In the next consulate of Terentius Varro and Cassius Varus, some slaves of Capua, having broke their chains, took up arms, and, under the conduct of Spartacus, a Thracian gladiator of uncommon abilities, first defeated the Capuan militia, and afterwards Claudius Pulcher, a Roman prætor at the head of three thousand men. These successful beginnings so raised the reputation of Spartacus, that he soon saw himself at the head of ten thousand men whom he led against the prætor Vatinius, and gave him a total overthrow. He then marched into Cisalpine Gaul, with a design to give his troops, who were mostly Gauls, an opportunity of returning into their own country; for he found them ungovernable, and therefore incapable of carrying on a war. But the next year, when Gellius Poplicola and Cornelius Lentulus were consuls, Cnixus, one of the chiefs of the Gaulish slaves, separated from him, and marched back into Apulia, where he was attacked and cut in pieces with his whole army, by the consul Gellius and the proconsul Anius. Upon the news of this defeat, Spartacus, who was in Cisalpine Gaul, and had nothing else in view but to pass the Alps and take shelter among the Transalpine Gauls, turned back, and falling upon the consul Lentulus, who pursued him, gave him a total overthrow. Then, without delay, he marched in quest of the consul Gellius, defeated his victorious army, and obliged both him and his troops to shelter themselves behind the walls of their cities. Never was the proud republic more humbled. Her two consuls and her invincible legions were forced to fly, in a shameful manner, before a Thracian, a gladiator, and a slave. Spartacus would not give quarter to any of the Roman prisoners, but in honour of Cnixus sacrificed them all round his funeral pile. As his army now consisted of a hundred and twenty thousand men, all fugitive slaves, he ravaged most of the provinces of Italy, without the least opposition, and then returned into Lucania, posted himself on the mountains near Thurii, and erected magazines in that city for the support of his numerous army.

THE next year, when Ausidius Orestes and Lentulus Sura were consuls, the senate gave the conduct of the war against the rebellious gladiators to Licinius Crassus, one of

of the chief commanders of Sylla's party, and who had a great share in most of his victories. Crassus, having raised in a few days six legions, detached Mummius, one of his lieutenants, with two of them, to watch the enemy's motions, while he came up with the rest of the army. The rash lieutenant no sooner discovered the enemy, than he drew up his troops in battalia, and challenged Spartacus, contrary to the express orders of his general. The Thracian accepted the challenge, and put the Romans to flight at the first onset. Crassus soon after arrived, and having reprimanded Mummius in the severest terms, he caused five hundred legionaries, who had retired at the approach of the enemy, to be decimated; which seasonable piece of severity made him as much respected by his troops, as he had been formerly beloved. He soon after marched in quest of the enemy, and falling in with a body of ten thousand rebels, who were laying waste the country, he fell upon them, and, cutting off their retreat, put them all to the sword. Hereupon Spartacus, after a fruitless attempt to get over to Sicily, posted himself in a peninsula near Rhegium. There Crassus shut him in with a ditch from one sea to the other, three hundred furlongs long, fifteen foot broad, and as much in depth. But the brave Spartacus, taking the opportunity of a snowy stormy night, filled up part of the ditch, forced his way through the enemy's army, and incamped again in the open country. Crassus was afraid lest he should march directly to Rome. But he was freed from this apprehension, when he saw a great body of the rebellious slaves upon some discontent revolt from Spartacus, and incamp by themselves. These Crassus attacked without loss of time, and defeated them after a long and obstinate dispute. Twelve thousand three hundred of the enemy were killed upon the spot, of which number only two were found wounded in the back, all the rest died fighting in their ranks with incredible bravery. After this defeat, Spartacus retired towards the mountains of Petilia. But his men, encouraged by a slight advantage gained over two of Crassus's officers, obliged him to march them back, and lead them against the Romans. This was what Crassus impatiently desired, being informed by his friends at Rome, that the people designed to recal him, and give the command of the army to their favourite idol Pompey. He therefore incamped near the enemy and offered them battle. As Spartacus could not retreat, being invested in his camp by Crassus, he drew up his army with all the skill of a great commander. When his horse was brought him before the onset, he drew his sword and killed him, saying, If I gain the victory, I shall have a great many better horses; if I lose it, I shall have no need of this. He then began the attack at the head of his infantry. His men, animated by his example, fought with unparalleled bravery. Victory was long doubtful, but at length declared for the Romans. Spartacus, after all his men were fled, stood his ground alone for a great while with invincible courage. Being wounded in the leg with a javelin, he fought on his knees, holding his buckler in one hand and his sword in the other. At last, being pierced with many wounds, he fell upon a heap of Romans, whom he had sacrificed to his fury. In this battle forty thousand of the rebels were killed upon the spot, whereas the Romans lost but a thousand men. However, the fugitives rallied again to the number of five thousand, and retired under the conduct of one Publipot into Lucania. Against these Pompey marched, and having defeated them without difficulty, wrote a bragging letter to the senate, wherein he vainly assumed to himself the glory of having finished the war. Crassus, said he, has overcome the gladiators in a pitched battle; but I have plucked up the war by the roots. This is the true spirit of ambition, which wrests every thing, even the actions of others, to its own advantage. Crassus was highly provoked at Pompey's vanity, which robbed him of the glory he deserved; but nevertheless, as he aspired at the consulship, and was well apprised that it was in Pompey's power to get him excluded, he dissembled his resentment, and even begged his rival's interest. Pompey, who stood himself for the same dignity, and had long desired to lay some obligation upon Crassus, readily embraced this opportunity, declaring in open assembly, that he should be as much obliged to his friends for the advancement of Crassus as for his own. Upon this declaration the tribes unanimously concurred in raising Pompey to the consulate, and giving him Crassus for his colleague. But this good understanding between the two rivals did not continue long. Pompey refused to disband the troops he had brought from Spain, till a triumph was decreed him. On the other hand Crassus, would not part with the command of the army he had led against Spartacus, so long as Pompey continued in arms. The latter gave out, that Pompey aspired at an absolute power, and intended legues growing daily wider, the senate and people, to prevent the evil effects of their mutual jealousies, earnestly intreated them to disband their armies, and sacrifice their private resentments to the public peace. But they both continued obstinate; Crassus pretending, that Pompey ought first to disband his army, since he had first finished the Spanish war; and Pompey protesting, that he would not dismiss his troops, till the arrival of Metellus, who was to triumph with him. The people, dreading to see Rome involved again in a civil war: even went so far as to beg of them on their knees in the comitium to be reconciled. But neither of them hearkening to the intreaties of the b people, a Roman knight, by name Ovatus Aurelius, who had spent some years of his life in the country, and was then accidentally in Rome, mounting the rostra, gave them an account of a vision he pretended to have seen in his sleep. Jupiter, said he, appeared to me last night, and admonishes you, O Romans, by my mouth, not to suffer the misunderstanding between the two consuls to continue any longer. When Ovatus had done speaking, the people renewed their intreaties, and then Crassus, moved with sentiments of piety, made the first advances, drew near to Pompey, and offered him his Are in appearance reconciled.

 hand. Pompey returned the civility; they embraced each other; and soon after they disbanded their troops by consent ^y.

HOWEVER, as their reconciliation was not sincere, each of them strove, by different
 c methods, to gain the favour of the people and strengthen his party. Pompey basely made his court to the multitude by reinstating the tribunes in their antient power, which greatly contributed to the destruction of the commonwealth. He likewise engaged M. Aurelius Cotta the prætor, to move, that some Roman knights might be appointed Pompey and Crassus affect popularity.
 to be his assessors, and to judge with him in civil causes. Thus the right of judging private causes, which had been taken from the knights by Sylla, was by means of Pompey restored to them; which engaged that powerful order to support him in all his pretensions with their whole interest. On the other hand, Crassus, to get the better of his rival in the esteem of the people, entertained them, though naturally covetous, with surprizing profusion and magnificence at ten thousand tables, and at the same time
 d distributed corn enough to all the populace to maintain their families three whole months. Such prodigious largesses will seem less surprizing, if we consider that Crassus was the richest man in Rome, and that his estate amounted to seven thousand talents and upwards, that is, to 1356250 l. sterling. But notwithstanding this mighty bounty, Pompey still maintained the first place in the affections and esteem of the multitude ^z. This year the censorship, which had been suppressed during the civil wars, was revived, L. Gellius Poplicola and Cn. Cornelius Lentulus being promoted to that dignity. These appointed Q. Catulus prince of the senate, struck the names of sixty-four antient senators out of the list, and made a census, in which they found, that the number of Roman citizens fit to bear arms amounted to four hundred and e fifty thousand.

AND now the consulate of Pompey and Crassus being expired, the republic raised to the fasces the famous orator Q. Hortensius and Q. Metellus, the son of Metellus Dalmaticus. As all was calm at Rome during their administration, Pompey no longer intermeddled in public affairs, neither frequenting the bar, as he had done formerly, nor the assemblies of the people. He seldom appeared in public; and when he did, he was always attended by a great number of clients, designing thereby to keep up the respect due to him, as a man of superior rank and uncommon merit. He even thought it beneath him to converse with the generality of the nobility, and therefore kept company only with a few select friends ^a. The following year the tribes raised raised L. Cæcilius Metellus and Q. Marcius, surnamed Rex, to the consulate. The former ^a died before he entered upon his office, and another, whose name has not been transmitted to us, was chosen in his room. But he also dying soon after his election, the people superstitiously took it for granted, that it was the pleasure of the gods that the republic should be governed one whole year by Marcius alone. During his administration, the senate, pretending that the Cretans had sided with Mithridates and given a retreat to the pirates, sent Q. Cæcilius Metellus with a fleet to reduce that island. But ^b of this expedition we have given a distinct account in our history of Crete.

IN the following consulate of C. Calpurnius Piso and M. Acilius Glabrio, Gabinus, tribune of the people, at the instigation of Pompey, who began to be weary of a retired life, proposed a law for clearing the seas of the pirates, whose numbers and power ^b daily increased. These robbers fitted out at first but a small number of light vessels; but upon their being protected by Mithridates, who, during his war with Rome, took them into his service, they equipped a thousand galleys, and exercised a kind of sovereignty over all the coasts of the Mediterranean. They spared not one temple that was famous for its riches on the coasts of Italy, Greece, and Asia. All the country-seats ^c on the sea-shore were a prey to them. They took slaves without number; blocked up all the ports of the republic; pillaged the city of Caieta; sunk part of a consular fleet at Ostia, and having made a descent near Misene, carried away the daughter of the old consul Antonius with several other persons of distinction. They even surprised and carried off two Roman prætors, Sextilius and Bellinus, in their purple robes with their ^d lictors and attendants. If any of the captives declared himself to be a Roman, the barbarians in derision threw themselves at his feet, begging his pardon, and imploring his protection. But after they had insolently sported with their prisoner, they often dressed him in a toga, and then, casting out a ship's ladder, desired him to return home and wished him a good journey. If he refused to leap into the sea, they threw him over-board, saying, that they would not by any means keep a free-born Roman in captivity. But the greatest calamity the world suffered by these tyrants of the sea was, the scarcity of provisions which they occasioned, not in Europe only, but likewise in Asia and Africa, no vessel venturing out without being taken. Gabinus therefore, who proposed a law for clearing the seas of these pirates, was much ^d applauded for his zeal, though in reality he had nothing in view, but the procuring of new honours for Pompey, who had restored the college of tribunes to their former authority. In virtue of the law which Gabinus proposed, the person, to whom the Roman people and senate should commit the management of this war, for the crafty ^e tribune did not name Pompey, was to have a power without controul or restriction. His authority was to extend all over the seas within the Straits, or the pillars of Hercules, and over all the countries for the space of four hundred furlongs from the sea. By the same law he was empowered to raise as many mariners and soldiers as he thought fit, to take what sums he pleased out of the public treasury, without being accountable for them, and to choose out of the senate fifteen senators to be his lieutenants, and to execute his orders, where he could not be present in person. As this arbitrary and unbounded authority was to be for three years, it gave a great deal of uneasiness and jealousy to the senate. They saw through the tribune's design, and several of them reproached Pompey with aiming at the sovereignty of Rome; nay, the consul Calpurnius told him smartly, that if he followed the footsteps of Romulus he would scarce avoid his end. But he was in danger of being tore in pieces by the people, for treating with such freedom their favourite. The conscript fathers, finding the people determined to pass the law, had recourse to their old method of disconcerting the measures of the tribunes, and gained over two of them, Trebellius and Roscius. ^e

The Gabinian law.

As no body doubted but this extensive commission, which the tribune Gabinus ^f called the proconsulate of the seas, was designed for Pompey, when the day appointed for holding the comitia came, in which the Gabinian law was to be received or rejected, the concourse was prodigious. The tribune Trebellius attempted to oppose it; but the tribes threatening to depose him, he was forced to give way and be silent. Then Catulus, prince of the senate, rising up, made a long speech, which was nothing but a panegyric upon Pompey. In the close of his harangue, he advised the people not to expose a man of his value, the greatest general of the republic, to so many dangers. For if you should lose him, said he, where could you find another Pompey? or ^{whom}

a whom would you put in his place? At these words the people, who had hearkened to the venerable senator with great attention, cried out with one voice; You, Catulus, we will put you in his place. Catulus, no longer able to resist the firm resolution of the whole people, and at the same time pleased with the esteem they shewed for him, waved his opposition and withdrew. Then the tribune Roscius attempted to speak, but being prevented by the clamours of the people, he held up two of his fingers, to signify, that he was for dividing that extensive commission between two persons, and not intrusting Pompey alone with such an ample and unlimited authority. Upon this the assembly made such a terrible outcry; that a crow flying accidentally over the comitium at that instant, was stunned and dropt down among the rabble^c. Hortensius and several other senators spoke with great eloquence, and were heard with attention; but their harangues made no impression on the multitude. Cicero never opened his mouth, though so fine an opportunity offered of displaying his talents. He did not care to make either Pompey, the senate, or the people, his enemies. The whole day being spent in speeches and debates, the determination was postponed to the next, when Gabinus's motion was agreed to by a great majority, and Pompey appointed to make war on the pirates with the title of proconsul. The people even granted him more than the tribune had desired; for they allowed him to equip five hundred ships, to raise a hundred and twenty thousand foot and five thousand horse; and to choose out of the senate twenty, or, as Appian has it, twenty-five senators for his lieutenants. He had also two quæstors allowed him, and six thousand Attic talents paid down to him before he left Rome. Thus the people, seduced by their tribunes, were running blindly into slavery; for it was now in Pompey's power to follow the example of Sylla, and make himself absolute master of the republic^d.

The Gabinian law passes.

Pompey's power.

HOWEVER, on this occasion he behaved with great integrity, and gained more glory than he had done by all his former exploits. He conducted the expedition with such prudence, and took such wise measures, that, instead of the three years allowed him, he quite cleared the seas in four months, after having taken or sunk, according to some, one thousand three hundred, according to others, eight hundred and forty-six of their vessels, cut ten thousand of them in pieces, and made himself master of a hundred and twenty towns or castles on the coasts, which they had seized. In this glorious expedition the proconsul set at liberty an incredible number of captives, and took above twenty thousand of the pirates prisoners, whom he sent to people the deserted cities of Cilicia, namely Mallus, Adana, Epiphania, and Soli, which latter he called from his own name Pompeïopolis^e.

He extirpates the pirates.

No sooner did the news of Pompey's victories reach Rome, than Manilius, tribune of the people, at the instigation of the proconsul's friends and agents, proposed a new law in his favour, importing, that Lucullus should be recalled from Asia, where he was waging war with Mithridates and Tigranes; that the conduct of the armies employed against those two princes should be committed to Pompey; that Cilicia, where Marcus Rex commanded, and Bithynia, which had been allotted to Acilius Glabrio, should be resigned to him; and that finally he should, at the same time, retain the same naval forces and sovereignty of the seas as before. This was appointing him absolute monarch of all the Roman dominions; for the provinces, which were exempted from his authority by the former decree, such as Phrygia, Lycaonia, Galatia, Cappadocia, Cilicia, Colchis, Armenia, &c. would by this new law be within the precincts of his province. This was the famous law, which from its author was styled the Manilian Law. When the tribune proposed it in the comitia, it raised such disturbances among the nobility and the zealous republicans, as are not easily described. They looked upon the new law as calculated for the establishing of tyranny; We have then got at last, said they, a sovereign; the republic is changed into a monarchy; the services of Lucullus, the honour of Glabrio and Marcus, two zealous and worthy senators, are to be sacrificed to the promotion of Pompey; Sylla never carried his tyranny so far, &c. They encouraged one another to use their utmost efforts in opposition to so scandalous a decree, and not to part with their liberty at so tame a rate. But notwithstanding the resolution they shewed in private, when the day came for the accepting or rejecting of the Manilian law, their hearts failed them; insomuch, that of all the conscript fathers, only Hortensius and Catulus had courage enough to speak against it. The latter especially made surprising efforts to dissuade the people from investing one man with such an

an absolute power ; he reproached them with the injustice they were going to do Lucullus, described to them in pompous terms his glorious exploits both by sea and land, enumerated the many evils which they had reason to apprehend from such an unbounded authority, &c. But finding the people heard with great indifference, and grew uneasy at his discourse; he directed his speech to the senate, and raising his voice, Let us fly, said he, conscript fathers, let us fly to some mountain, as our fore-fathers have done ; let us fly to some rocks, where we may shelter ourselves from the slavery with which we are threatened. Two great men spoke in favour of the law, viz. Cicero and Cæsar ; the former aimed at the consulate, which Pompey's party could more easily procure him, than that of Catulus and the senate. On this occasion he made that speech, which is still preserved, and will be the admiration of all ages. As for Cæsar, he was delighted to see the people insensibly lose that republican spirit and love of liberty, which might one day obstruct the vast designs he had already formed. Thus was the public interest, as it too commonly happens, sacrificed to private views. The decree passed by the suffrages of all the tribes ; and the people of their own accord conferred on Pompey as extensive an authority as Sylla had usurped by an armed force^f. He was still on the coasts of Asia, when news was brought him of the extraordinary power with which the people had vested him. He received it with an affected modesty and reluctance ; What ! said he, will Rome then burden me with a new war ? Must I never have any rest ? Must I sacrifice to the desires of my country the pleasures of a retired life, and the enjoyment of a beloved wife ? Happy, thrice happy are those who live in the inglorious croud, unknown and unregarded ! Plutarch tells us, that even his most zealous friends were highly displeased with such gross hypocrisy, well knowing what steps he had taken in order to procure this new commission. Lucullus, seeing himself thus degraded, returned to Rome, where he was received by the nobility with all possible marks of esteem, and honoured with a most pompous and magnificent triumph. As for Pompey, he pursued the war against Mithridates and Tigranes with great success, and performed those glorious exploits in Pontus, Albania, Iberia, &c. which we have described at length in our history of Pontus^g.

WHILE Pompey was extending the dominions of the republic in Asia, some wicked citizens were plotting her ruin at home. At the head of these was Lucius Sergius Catiline, who was descended of an illustrious patrician family, but had rendered himself infamous by a continued series of debaucheries, incests, murders, and the most horrible crimes. He is said to have debauched, when he was very young, a woman of distinction, and to have afterwards married the daughter he had by her. He was likewise accused of keeping an unlawful correspondence with Fabia Terentia, the vestal, sister to Terentia, Cicero's wife. He had committed murders without number, and had been, in the time of Sylla's proscriptions, the most merciless minister of that tyrant's fury. The favour of the dictator, his birth and courage, had raised him to the principal dignities of the republic. He had been quæstor, lieutenant in several armies, and had governed Africa in quality of prætor. But in all these different employments he had equally dishonoured himself by his debaucheries and enormous oppressions. As he had squandered away his patrimony, and was overloaded with debts, he had no prospect of retrieving his affairs, but by the subversion of the state. He therefore watched all opportunities of raising disturbances ; and one offered soon after his return from Africa, where he had been prætor. P. Autronius Pætus and P. Cornelius Sylla, the son of the dictator's brother, being chosen consuls, and afterwards disqualified for that office upon their being convicted of having openly bought the suffrages of the people, Catiline prevailed upon them to enter into a plot against the consuls who were chosen in their room, viz. Aurelius Cotta and Manlius Torquatus. His scheme was to assassinate them both, murder the greatest part of the senators, and seize the government. Besides Autronius and Sylla, he engaged a great many young men, who were undone by their excesses, and among the rest Cn. Calpurnius Piso, a youth of a noble family, but rash, factious, and by his excesses reduced almost to beggary. This wicked attempt was to be put in execution on the calends of January, when the new consuls took possession of their office. But the conspirators not having found a convenient opportunity that day, they put off the affair to the nones of February, the day appointed for the usual meeting of the conscript fathers. But this second attempt proved as unsuccessful as the first. Catiline gave the signal at an improper time a time, before the conspirators were got together ; so that no-body offered to stir ; by which means the lives of the consuls and senators were saved, and the most bloody and execrable conspiracy, which had been formed since the foundation of Rome, came to nothing. However, Catiline did not drop his wicked design ; as he had spent his patrimony in debauchery, and was plunged in debt, he had no resource but in the subversion of the republic ^h. But we shall leave him for a while to observe the conduct of another young Roman, who had the same view with Catiline of subverting the whole constitution, but took more prudent and better concerted measures for the executing of his design. This was Julius Cæsar, who, having passed through the offices of legionary tribune and quæstor, was this year raised to the ædileship, in which employment he made it his whole business to gain the affections of the people. Nothing could be more polite and engaging than his behaviour. His liberality knew no bounds, and the magnificence of his furniture and entertainments surpassed any thing that had ever before been seen in Rome. As he was naturally of a generous disposition, he is said to have owed above one thousand three hundred talents, that is, 251875*l*. sterling, before he entered upon any of the public offices. The immense sums he bestowed upon the populace gave no umbrage even to his enemies, who used to say, that this was a short-lived shew, which would soon end with his estate, and then he would be reduced to the state of a common citizen. Cicero only saw farther than the vulgar into the intentions of the ambitious youth. He was the first who had any suspicion of his aspiring at a sovereign power, and often used to say, that in all his other actions and intrigues he plainly discovered the air of a tyrant ; but when he saw his hair lie in so exact order, and observed him so often adjusting it with his finger, he could not imagine it should enter into such a man's thoughts to subvert the Roman state. Cicero did not discover that manly courage and intrepidity, which lay concealed under the appearance of luxury and effeminacy. As the office of ædile confined him to Rome, he undertook the repairing of the Appian way, and finished that great work almost wholly at his own expence. He entertained the people with a shew of three hundred and twenty couple of gladiators, and built porticos of timber with seats all round the forum, that the populace might see, without any inconvenience, the Megalesian games, which were exhibited at Rome, during his ædileship. By these means he so captivated the people, that they were now as much, if not more, devoted to him, than to Pompey. Depending upon the favour of the people, he made a funeral oration in praise of his aunt Julia, though she was the widow of Marius, whose name was odious to the senate and nobility ; and was even so bold as to bring forth on that occasion the images of Marius, which no-body had presumed to produce since the government first came into Sylla's hands. The nobility exclaimed against him for reviving the memory of one who had been declared an enemy to his country ; but the people applauded the action ; and this encouraged him to set up in the night-time the statues and trophies of Marius, which Sylla had ordered to be taken down. Next morning the people crowded to see them, and many of Marius's party even wept for joy at the sight of his statues and trophies. But the nobility inveighed bitterly against Cæsar, as if he had designs upon the government, and Catulus even accused him before the senate of aiming at the same tyrannical power which Marius had usurped. He closed his speech with this remarkable saying ; Cæsar no longer undermines the government, but openly plants his batteries against it. But the accused answered the invectives of Catulus with so much art and temper, that he was not only acquitted, but highly applauded by the people as a relation worthy of the great Marius. Julius Cæsar being thus become the idol of the people, he prevailed upon them to confer the consular dignity on L. Julius Cæsar, one of his own family, though of another branch. The colleague the republic gave him was C. Marcius Figulus, a man of a mild disposition, and an enemy to all factions and parties. During their administration, Cæsar got many of Sylla's partisans condemned, some to perpetual banishment, others to death, for the murders they had committed during the dictator's tyrannical reign. Among the latter was L. Bellicus, uncle to Catiline ; but Catiline himself was spared, though he had been the chief instrument of Sylla's fury ⁱ. He was a friend to Cæsar, and had communicated to him, as was supposed, his wicked design of subverting the government. Of this horrible conspiracy the ancients give us the following account :

Catiline, though he had failed in his two former plots, as we have related above, yet did not drop his wicked design of subverting the government, but having strengthened his

his party with a great number of senators and knights, waited only for an opportunity of putting it in execution. Among his accomplices in the senate were P. Lentulus Sura, P. Antronius, L. Cassius Longinus, C. Cethegus, Publius, and Servius Sylla, L. Vargunteius, Q. Annius, M. Porcius Læca, L. Bestia, and Q. Curius; and among the knights M. Fulvius Nobilior, L. Statilius, P. Gabinius Capito, and C. Cornelius. We are told, that M. Licinius Crassus was also privy to the plot, and that Cæsar favoured it underhand: these two cunning and equally ambitious men waited for the event before they would declare themselves. Besides the above mentioned senators and knights, Catiline drew into the plot all the debauched youth of Rome, who had squandered away their estates, and could no longer follow their extravagant courses; and likewise some of the old soldiers and officers of Sylla's army, who, after having consumed all the rewards of their former services in debaucheries, were longing for a new civil war, as the only remedy against want and poverty. As it was very difficult that the designs of such men as were continually rioting should long remain secret, Cicero was informed of them by Fulvia, a woman of distinction, but who dishonoured her family by a criminal correspondence with Quintus Curius, one of the conspirators. The young debauchee, finding himself scornfully treated by Fulvia, after he had spent his estate upon her, in order to recover her favour, boasted, that he should be soon rich enough to please her; adding, that the method he was taking to become so, was a secret which he would never disclose to her. This awaked her curiosity; and as she was more artful than her lover, she soon prevailed upon him by her caresses to unravel the whole plot. Whether Fulvia was really struck with the danger of the republic, or thought the undertaking would not succeed, as being managed in great part by young people, she made a full discovery of all she had heard to Cicero, but concealed the name of the person, who had given her that intelligence. This discovery Cicero, who then stood forth for the consulate, and had Catiline for his competitor, made use of to get himself chosen, and Catiline excluded. The colleague given him by the tribes was C. Antonius, a man naturally lazy, a lover of ease and pleasure, and who hitherto no further concerned himself in public affairs, than was necessary to shew that he was not absolutely unfit for them. As he was a man of little weight and easily manageable, Cicero flattered himself that he should be able, with a little art, to get the ascendant over him, and govern him as he pleased. They no sooner entered upon their office, than P. Servilius Rullus, tribune of the people, endeavoured to revive the old troubles about the distribution of the conquered lands. But he was vigorously opposed by Cicero, who by the force of his eloquence prevailed upon the people to sacrifice their private interest to the public tranquillity. The cause of the public disturbances being removed, the new consul applied himself next to draw off his colleague from the faction of the tribunes, which he favoured; and succeeded by changing provinces with him, and resigning to him the government of Macedon, which by lot was fallen to himself, and taking that of Gaul, which was less profitable, and had fallen to Antonius. This done, he made it his chief business to prevent any popular disturbance. One had like to have been raised in the theatre, on account of the new distinction which the tribune Otho had given to the Roman knights, allotting to them, in all public shews, the fourteen first ranks after those of the senators. But Cicero interposed, and harangued the people with such strength and success, that they willingly complied with Otho's regulation. By this means he stifled a sedition in its birth, of which Catiline might have made a very ill use^k.

In the mean time, Catiline, grown outrageous at Cicero's success, resolved to stand once more for the consulate, and prepared for an open rebellion, in case he should not succeed. He borrowed what money he could; and engaged his partisans to raise as much as possible upon their credit, and on securities. These sums were lodged in the hands of one Manlius, a soldier of fortune, who had served with great reputation of bravery under Sylla, and at that time resided at Fæsulæ in Hetruria. As that city was a colony of Sylla's soldiers, Manlius, who had great interest among them, engaged them in the plot, and made considerable levies throughout all Hetruria. Lucullus the famous general, whom Pompey had succeeded in the east, being informed of these preparations, made a report of what he had heard to the senate, and assisted the consul with all his interest in the prosecution of the traitor. Cicero at the same time kept up a strict correspondence with Fulvia, and even gained over some of the conspirators, who

- a who, pursuant to his directions, pretended to be the warmest promoters of the plot. It was by their means that he discovered the designs of Catiline, the various sentiments of his accomplices, their number and quality, and the general, as well as the private, views of each of the conspirators. By them he was informed, that on a day appointed the conspirators were to set fire to several parts of the city; that during the confusion and uproar, which so general a conflagration would occasion, some were to murder the chief men of the senate in their houses, others to assemble the mutinous populace, seize the capitol, and fortify themselves there, till Manlius arrived from Hetruria with his veterans. Two Roman knights were appointed to murder Cicero in his own house; but the consul, immediately informed of all that passed in their assembly, summoned the senate, and boldly informed the fathers, in Catiline's presence, of the danger they were in. He communicated to them the whole plot, and though he did not think proper to name those, by whom he had been informed, yet the senate by a public decree ordered the consuls to take care that the republic suffered no detriment; an ancient form, by which the magistrates for the time being had almost an unbounded authority conferred on them. Cicero, invested with such an ample power, dispatched without delay, some of the worthiest senators to the principal cities in Italy to keep them in awe. At the same time he placed guards in different parts of Rome to prevent the incendiaries. By his advice the senate promised not only a pardon, but ample rewards, to any of the conspirators, who should make farther discoveries of this black attempt.
- b But not one single man, which is very surprising, out of so great a number of profligates, appeared as an evidence against his accomplices. The consul might indeed, upon his own personal knowledge, have made use of the new power the senate had given him, and condemned Catiline and his adherents to death without appeal. But as this was a dangerous step, he thought it more advisable to induce Catiline to leave Rome, and take refuge in Manlius's camp near Fesulæ. With this view he assembled the conscript fathers, and Catiline appearing among the rest, as if he had been no ways concerned in the affair, those senators, near whom he came to seat himself, quitting their places, left him quite by himself. Then Cicero, no longer able to conceal his indignation, first read certain letters, which had been put into his hand by Licinius Cicero has argues the people against Catiline.
- d Craffus (M); and then directing his speech to Catiline, made that famous oration, which is still extant, and will ever be admired by all men of taste and judgment. Catiline heard his speech with the most artful dissimulation, and even had the assurance to intreat the conscript fathers not to suffer themselves to be prejudiced against him by the calumnies of his most bitter enemy, a new man, who had not in Rome so much as a house of his own, and who had forged a conspiracy in order to raise himself, and acquire the title of defender of his country. He added, that Cicero laughed in private at their credulity, and the false alarms he had given them. But when he began to proceed to invectives against the consul, he was interrupted by the cries of the whole assembly, the senate-house ringing with the names of incendiary, parricide, enemy to his country, &c. Catiline, highly provoked at these reproaches, and foaming with rage, cried out, Since you have provoked me to the utmost, I will not perish alone, but will have the satisfaction of involving those who have sworn my ruin, in the same destruction with myself. Having spoke thus, he instantly left the senate, and sending for Cethegus, Lentulus, and the other chief conspirators, he gave them an account of what had just happened in the senate; made them sensible, that he could no longer stay in Rome with safety; encouraged them to lay hold of the first opportunity of setting fire to the city, of assassinating the senators, and above all of destroying the consul, the only man who could render their designs abortive. He told them, that he was going to put himself at the head of the forces, which Manlius had raised for him in Hetruria, and that they should soon see him again with such a force as would strike the boldest of his enemies with dread and terror. After this conference he set out in great haste for Hetruria, attended by three hundred of his party. His sudden flight gave Cicero great pleasure; but as he was sensible how tender the people were of their privileges, and feared the tribunes might exasperate the populace against him, by suggesting, that he had banished a Roman citizen without consulting them, the next day he mounted the rostra, and in his second

(M) After Craffus had supped, one of his servants brought him a packet, which, he said, had been delivered to him by an unknown person. In the packet were several letters directed to different persons, and one to Craffus himself, which he read; and found therein the whole scheme of the conspiracy. The anonymous writer likewise advised him to leave Rome without delay, if he tendered his life. Upon this Craffus went directly to the consul, and delivered to him the packet, in order to clear himself of the suspicion, which his strict friendship with Catiline had raised.

second oration against Catiline, which is still preserved in his works, informed the assembly of the true state of affairs, assuring them with great firmness that no care or vigilance should be wanting on his part to guard them against the impending dangers¹.

Catiline declared an enemy to his country.

Is betrayed by the ambassadors of the Allobroges.

Cicero styled Father of his country.

IN the mean time Catiline arriving at Manlius's camp in the neighbourhood of Fæsculæ, took upon him the command of the troops, and at the same time assumed all the marks of a supreme magistrate, being preceded by lictors carrying their axes and fasces. The senate informed of so open a rebellion, declared Catiline and Manlius enemies to their country, and at the same time ordered the consul Antonius to take the field with a proconsular army, and Cicero to continue in Rome and there watch the motions of the conspirators. At the motion of Cicero a decree was also passed, promising impunity to all those who should abandon Catiline, and return to Rome within a limited time, and declaring those guilty of high treason against the state, who should join him. Notwithstanding this decree, great numbers of profligates flocked to him both from Rome, and the other cities of Italy. Among others the son of Aulus Fulvius, a venerable senator, set out for the army of the rebels; but his father dispatched messengers after him, who brought him back to Rome; where his father, in virtue of his paternal authority, condemned him to death, and caused his severe sentence to be immediately put in execution. In the mean time Lentulus and the other chiefs of the conspiracy endeavoured to draw into the plot the ambassadors of the Allobroges then at Rome, in order to get assistance from Transalpine Gaul. But the ambassadors imparted the whole affair to Q. Fabius Sanga, who was the protector of their nation, according to the custom of those times, when the different states subject to the republic had in the senate one who took care of their interests. Sanga, after having made them sensible of the danger of such an undertaking, brought them to the consul, who prevailed upon them to continue their negotiations with the conspirators, in order to procure by their means undeniable proofs of the conspiracy. Accordingly, the ambassadors made no difficulty to close with the proposals of the conspirators, but insisted on a written treaty as their credentials to their countrymen. This treaty was granted them, signed by all the chiefs of the plot; and it was agreed, that they should set out on the third of the nones of December, and take their way through Hetruria to get the treaty ratified by Catiline. Cicero, being informed by the ambassadors when they were to leave Rome, sent privately two prætors with a sufficient number of troops to lie in wait for them, seize them with the conspirators, who attended them, and bring them all back to Rome. The prætors faithfully executed their commission; the ambassadors together with Vulturcius, who had taken upon him to conduct them to Catiline, were stopped at the bridge Milvius, and brought back to Rome with all the papers, which either the Allobroges or Vulturcius had in their custody. This news Cicero received by break of day, and having now in his power undeniable proofs of the conspiracy, he sent, without loss of time, proper Officers to seize Lentulus, Gabinus, Cethegus, Statilius, and other chiefs of the conspiracy, in their houses. These were not sent to the public prisons, but, agreeable to the tenderness the Roman laws shewed to citizens, though suspected of the greatest crimes, were only committed to the care of some of the most illustrious senators. Then the consul, upon the deposition of the Allobroges, ordered the house of Cethegus to be searched; and having found there a great quantity of sulphur and tow, with arms of all sorts, he assembled the senate in the temple of Concord. There he produced his evidence, confronted the witnesses with the criminals, and prevailed on Vulturcius to discover the secrets of the plot. Cicero, having thus got the proofs he expected both from the witnesses and criminals, he assembled the senate again, when the conscript fathers returned him the thanks he deserved, and acknowledged, that by his wisdom, vigilance, and courage, he had discovered a detestable plot, saved Rome from the flames, and preserved the republic from utter ruin. Catulus and Cato went so far as to style him the father of his country, an appellation, which had never been given to any Roman before him. L. Gellius moved, that a civic crown should be given the consul, a mark of honour which had never been granted but in camps. After these applauses the conscript fathers entered into a debate concerning the punishment of the criminals; but before they came to any resolution, L. Tarquinius, one of the conspirators, appeared before the fathers, confessed his guilt, and accused M. Licinius Crassus, the richest man in Rome, of being concerned

a concerned in the conspiracy. But the very name of Crassus raised a great clamour in the assembly; his friends cried out, that Tarquinius had been suborned; and those very senators, who suspected Crassus, joined the majority in acquitting him. It was dangerous to provoke a man of his great interest; so that Tarquinius was the only sufferer by his accusation. He was condemned to imprisonment, and enjoined never to mention this affair again, unless it were to discover the person who had suborned him. The senate, after long and warm debates, came to no other resolution, than that the four chief criminals, Lentulus, Cethegus, Statilius, and Gabinus should be carried to the public prison, and there kept under close confinement, till the fathers agreed about the punishment that should be inflicted upon them. During these delays, Cethegus found means to convey letters to his friends and clients, encouraging them to raise the whole party, and try their utmost to rescue them out of prison. But Cicero, informed of this, posted troops on the ramparts, at the gates, and in the cross-ways, and having assembled the senate anew on the nones of December, he exhorted the fathers to come to an ultimate resolution concerning the prisoners. Syllanus, consul elect for the ensuing year, was, according to custom, asked his advice first; and he, without hesitation, declared, that, in his opinion, they all deserved to die. All who voted after him were of the same opinion, except T. Nero and Julius Cæsar. The latter made a famous speech in praise of clemency, which is still extant, and by all admired as a most artful piece of oratory. He concluded, saying, that in an affair, which concerned the lives of citizens and of the principal patricians in Rome, it was advisable not to be too hasty in giving judgment; but that they should be well guarded, and kept in some towns of Italy, till Catiline was vanquished. As Cæsar was an excellent orator, his speech made a great impression on the assembly. Most of the senators, and among the rest Syllanus, retracting what he had said, declared for Cæsar's opinion. But Cato, when it came to his turn to vote, represented in such lively colours the horrible designs of the conspirators, and shewed with so many unanswerable arguments, that Cæsar's clemency was incompatible with the safety of the state, that the whole senate returned to their former opinion, and sentence of death was pronounced against the conspirators without any opposition but from Cæsar only, who, obstinately persisting in his opinion, made such a noise, that the guards at the door came into the senate, and, thinking him a conspirator, would have killed him, had they not been prevented by Cicero and Curio (N). Cæsar's unseasonable mildness, and management in this whole affair, made most of the senators suspect he had a hand in the plot; nay, Curius undertook to prove from some writings of Catiline, that he had entered into engagements with the author of the conspiracy. But Cicero, who was sensible how great his interest was in Rome, avoided impeaching him with the rest, lest by the assistance of his friends and relations he should not only escape the rigour of the law himself, but should likewise save the rest of the criminals. As Cæsar was going out of the senate, the knights, who were upon duty, turned the points of their naked swords towards him, watching the consul's looks to receive his orders. But Cicero made them a sign to let him escape, either for fear of the people, or because he thought the murder illegal ^m.

As soon as the decree for the execution of the criminals was passed, Cicero, though it was late in the day, went directly from the assembly to the prison, and to prevent a rescue in the night, had them executed in his sight. As he was returning home after the execution, he turned to the populace, who crowded about him, and cried out, Vixerunt, They have lived, an expression then in use among the Romans to avoid saying, Mortui sunt, They are dead, death and dead being words of an ill augury, which conveyed melancholy thoughts to the mind. (N) There happened a ridiculous adventure during the heat of the contest between Cato and Cæsar. Servilia, Cato's sister, being in love with Cæsar, sent a slave to him with a letter, in which she expressed her affection in the most passionate terms. The slave, who was ordered to deliver the letter into Cæsar's own hands, not finding him at home, brought it to him in the senate. Cato no sooner saw the letter delivered, then he cried out, that it came from one of the conspirators, and insisted upon its being read to the assembly. Cæsar smiling, gave him the letter, and Cato, after he had perused it, threw it back to him, saying with his usual sourness, Take it, drunkard (25). This reproach Cæsar well deserved; for in his youth he was greatly given to drinking.

who had resolved to break open the prisons in the night and rescue them, were a thunderstruck, when they heard they were executed, lost all hopes, and immediately dispersed. It is impossible to express the joy which the people shewed, when they heard that the plot was suppressed, and the conspirators punished. They conducted the consul to his house with extraordinary shouts and acclamations : as it was night, fires were made in the streets, through which he passed ; and the whole city was illuminated, men, women, and even children calling him, as he passed by, the deliverer of Rome, the second founder of the city, the father of his country, &c. This night was more glorious to him, than a day of triumph had ever been to the greatest general. No consul ever since the birth of the republic had done her more important services. Others had enlarged her territories by their victories, but Cicero saved the b lives of his fellow-citizens, and the state itself from utter ruin ^a.

Disturbances
raised by Cæsar and the

Cicero and Antonius had no sooner yielded the fasces to D. Junius Syllanus and L. Licinius Murena, than Q. Metellus, and L. Bestia, two tribunes of the people, to rob Cicero of the honour of putting an end to the rebellion, made a motion for recalling Pompey from Asia to march against Catiline. Cæsar, jealous of Cicero's glory and growing interest, supported the tribunes ; but Cato, with great intrepidity, opposed the motion ; whereupon the two tribunes and Cæsar raised such a tumult, that he was driven from the rostra by violence, and narrowly escaped with his life. However, the tumult was no sooner appeased, than the people returned in crowds to the comitium, supported Cato, and prevented Metellus from publishing the edict. When the senate were informed of these violences, they deprived both the tribunes and Cæsar, who was then prætor, of their offices. Metellus left Rome, and set out for Asia to complain to Pompey of the small concern the Roman people shewed for his glory ; but Pompey paid little regard to his complaints. As for Cæsar, he at first refused to comply with the decree of the senate ; but at length, fearing the resentment of the fathers, he laid down his office, and shut himself up in his house. The multitude, who adored him, offered to restore him to his post ; but he wisely refused it without the consent of the senate. This conduct charmed the fathers to such a degree, that, after many encomiums, they reinstated him in his prætorship. Thus, by the departure of Metellus, and the political moderation of Cæsar, tranquillity was restored to the city. d battle.

Antonius commits the command of the
treius.

DURING these transactions at Rome, Catiline made it his whole business to lead his army into Transalpine Gaul, where the whole nation seemed ready to declare for him. To prevent this, Q. Metellus Celer, leaving Picenum, which he had guarded the last year, posted himself with three legions at the foot of the Alps. On the other hand, Antonius, Cicero's late colleague, kept following Catiline in the rear ; so that the rebels were in a manner hemmed in by two bodies of troops. In this situation Catiline resolved to attack Antonius, who, as he had been formerly of his faction, seemed to act but faintly against him. With this view he marched back, and meeting the proconsul near the city of Pistoria, now Pistoia, he drew up his men in order of battle. In the first line he posted eight cohorts, which were the best armed ; in the second the veterans, who had served under Sylla, and in the third his new levies, armed only with knotty clubs, long poles, or the implements of husbandry. Having drawn up his troops he led them to a great distance from his camp to shew that he was fully resolved to give battle. Antonius observed the enemy's motions, but would not stir out of his camp, though all the officers of the army pressed him not to let slip the opportunity that offered of putting an end to the rebellion at once. Should Catiline escape, said they, and get into Gaul, what will be the fate of Italy ? Who knows how much blood must be spilt before the rebels are crushed ? But Antonius would not by any means consent to an engagement ; which some historians ascribe to a secret inclination he had for the party, which he was ordered to destroy. Whatever were his motives, when the legionaries absolutely insisted on their being led against the enemy, he pretended to be indisposed, and committed the conduct of his army to Petreius, who had served above thirty years, and had raised himself by his merit from a private soldier to the post of lieutenant-general, in which quality he now served under Antonius. The soldiers, not doubting of victory under so brave and experienced a leader, marched out of their camp in two lines, and fell upon the enemy with a fury hardly to be expressed. The rebels sustained the onset with equal intrepidity and resolution, and, being encouraged by the example of their leader, obliged Petreius's first line to give ground.

- a ground. But that brave commander flying to their relief with a body of fresh men, the rebels were in their turn forced to retire in disorder. Hereupon Catiline, reproaching his men with cowardice, and putting them in mind of the promise they had made before the battle, either to conquer or die, brought them back to the charge, and renewed the fight with such vigour, that the victory continued doubtful, till Manlius and the officer of Fesula, who commanded the wings, were both killed. Then Catiline, being no longer able to govern so great a body himself, his ranks were broken, and most of his men, especially in the wings, dispersed. Hereupon the head of the rebels, Catiline ^{des-} resolving not to outlive the ruin of his party, threw himself in a great rage into the ^{fiat.d and} midst of the enemy, and there found the death which he sought. He no sooner fell, ^{killed.} than his whole army betook themselves to flight, leaving Petreius master of the field. That prudent commander would not suffer his men to pursue the fugitives, but allowed them all, as they were for the most part Roman citizens, to escape and return to their own houses. Of the rebels three thousand were killed on the spot. Catiline was found on a heap of dead bodies, still breathing, and with those marks of fierceness in his countenance, notwithstanding the agonies of death, which had rendered him formidable to his enemies during his life. And now nothing more seemed wanting with regard to the conspiracy, than to punish Catiline's accomplices. L. Vettius, a Roman knight, became their accuser, and included Cæsar, now prætor, in the num- ^{Cæsar privy to} ber. Q. Curius likewise accused him to the senate of being one of the chief conspi- ^{the conspiracy.} rators, and in proof of his deposition quoted the testimony of Catiline himself, by whom he said he had been told the names of all the conspirators, and particularly that of Cæsar. As for Vettius, he offered to produce the accused's own hand-writing, which had been found among Catiline's papers. But Cæsar called upon Cicero to witness the discoveries he had made to him concerning the plot; and Cicero's testimony was his justification; not that the orator thought him clear from all guilt, but because he was afraid to rank so popular a man among the criminals. After this several decrees were issued out against the rest of the conspirators, and such effectual care was taken of the public peace, that in all the provinces, where any seditions had happened, the rebels were suppressed, and the guilty punished.
- a IN the mean time the pontifex maximus dying, Cæsar was by the suffrages of the ^{Cæsar chosen} people advanced to that high station, though he had Servilius Isauricus and Lutatius Ca- ^{pontifex maxi-} tulus, two of the greatest men of the republic, for his competitors. But the joy he felt on this occasion was in great measure allayed by his domestic misfortunes. His wife Pompeia, the daughter of Pompeius Rufus, entertained a strong inclination for a young patrician, named P. Clodius. As Clodius, though yet a youth, was infamous for his lewdness and debaucheries, Pompeia could not, without exposing her character, even speak to him in public. At home she was narrowly watched by the virtuous Aurelia, Cæsar's mother, and by his sister Julia, who entertained some suspicions of her. As she could therefore find no other opportunity of meeting Clodius, she took advan- ^{p. Clodius} tage of a very solemn feast, which was to be celebrated in her husband's house. o SALLUST. ibid.

(O) We learn from Cicero all that is to be known of the Good Goddesses, and of the sacrifices offered to her. In his oration concerning the answers of the aruspices, he speaks thus; "What sacrifice is there so ancient as that which has been handed down to us from our first kings, and is coeval with Rome herself? What sacrifice is there so private and secret as that which is concealed not only from the eyes of the curious and inquisitive, but from the sight of all men, and whither neither the most profligate wickedness nor impudence ever yet presumed to enter? This sacrifice no man, except Clodius, was ever so impious as to violate, no man, but Clodius, ever thought, without the utmost horror, of assisting at it. This sacrifice, which is performed by the vestal virgins, which is performed for the prosperity of the Roman people, which is performed in the house of the chief magistrate, celebrated with unknown ceremonies, and in honour of a goddess, whose very name to know is sacrilege; this sacrifice Clodius profaned, &c." Since then, at the very time when this adventure happened, the ceremonies observed in that sacrifice were absolutely unknown to the people, and locked up under so religious a secrecy, that all were ignorant of the very name of the goddesses, we are not to wonder, that the ancients have left us in the dark as to the nature of this sacrifice. One thing indeed seems unaccountable: Cicero tells us, that the name of the goddesses was concealed from the men, but revealed to the women: how then could it remain such a secret? This is much to the honour of the Roman women. Plutarch takes the good goddesses to be the same with the Gynæcea of the Greeks, that is,

name was concealed from the men, and known only to the women. At this sacrifice it was unlawful for any man to assist; nay it was deemed a sacrilege even for the master of the house, or his children, to be at home while the ceremony was performing. Some writers tell us, that the women, who assisted at the ceremony, carried their superstition so far as even to cover the pictures of men and male-animals with thick veils. On this solemn day, and in the house set apart for this religious use, Clodius and Pompeia agreed to meet. Clodius, in order to get admission, was to come in the habit and disguise of a singing woman; for the solemnity was attended with dancing and music. A female slave, who was in the secret, had orders to receive him and conduct him to his mistress's apartment. Clodius, being yet very young, was by his face and appearance, taken for a woman and readily admitted. The maid, who was in the secret, no sooner saw him than she ran to inform Pompeia; but as she did not return so soon as Clodius expected, he grew uneasy; and not thinking it safe to continue long in the same place, he took several turns in the rooms, avoiding the lights as much as possible for fear of being discovered. As he was thus walking about slowly by himself, one of Aurelia's maids, taking him for a female musician, asked him to sing; which he refusing to do, the maid put several questions to him, and obliged him at last to speak, which he no sooner did, than his voice betrayed him. Whereupon the woman shrieking ran into the rooms where the ceremonies were performing, crying aloud, that she had discovered a man. The women all in a fright threw a veil over the mysteries, stopt the ceremonies, and, having ordered the doors to be shut, ran about with lights in search of the sacrilegious man, whom they found in the maid's room, who was privy to the appointment. There they seized him, and having driven him out of doors, though it was yet night, they went home to acquaint their husbands with what had happened. The next morning Clodius's impious attempt was the subject of every conversation, and all agreed, that he ought to be punished with the utmost severity. Accordingly he was accused of prophaning the holy rites, but the populace declared in his favour; so that the judges, fearing to provoke the multitude, acquitted him. Cæsar immediately divorced Pompeia; but being summoned as a witness against Clodius, he said, that he had nothing to charge him with. As this looked like a paradox, the accusers asked him, why then he had parted with his wife? Because, said he, I cannot bear that my wife should be so much as suspected. He declined appearing against Clodius, to gratify the populace, who, he saw, were very earnest to save him^a.

THE next year M. Pupius Piso, one of Pompey's lieutenants, was, upon his recommendation, raised to the consulate, and with him M. Valerius Messala. Soon after their election, news was brought, that Pompey, after having reduced several kingdoms in the east, was preparing to return to Rome. Some, fearing he should turn his victorious arms against his country, were for raising troops, and guarding against any attempt of that nature; but he resolved on a conduct very different from what was dreaded. He was very desirous of making himself absolute in the republic; but at the same time so weak as to imagine, that he could attain and preserve a kind of arbitrary power by such gentle methods, as would carry no odium with them. Agreeable to this false notion, he disbanded his troops, as soon as he landed at Brundisium, and proceeded to Rome with as small a train as if he had been returning from a journey of pleasure. The whole city went out to meet him, and received him with loud acclamations. He demanded a triumph, which, as he well deserved it, was readily granted him. The procession lasted two days, and was by far the most magnificent that had ever been seen in Rome. Before his chariot marched three hundred and twenty-four captives of great distinction, among whom were Aristobulus king of Judea and his son Antigonus; Oltaces king of Colchis; Tigranes, the son of Tigranes king of Armenia, with his wife and daughter; five sons and two daughters of Mithridates king of Pontus; a queen of Scythia, &c. The spoils that were carried before him were valued above three millions sterling; and the gold and silver coin, which he delivered to the quæstors, amounted to thrice that sum, not reckoning the large donatives which he bestowed on his soldiers; for he ordered one thousand five hundred drachmas is with the goddess of the women; and adds, that the Phrygians, who claimed a particular title to her, said she was mother to Midas, that the Romans pre-

a drachmas to each soldier of his army, that is, near fifty pounds sterling, and rewarded all the officers in proportion. He did not put any of the captives to death, as other generals used to do, neither did he keep them in prison; but sent them all, except Aristobulus and Tigranes, back to their respective countries, at the expence of the public^r. The solemnity was no sooner over, than Pompey betook himself to a private life, declining, from a pretended modesty, even the use of those titles and privileges with which he had been honoured. His aim was to assume a sovereign authority in the state, without appearing to desire it; but he soon found, that it was easier to give law to subalterns in a camp, than to govern his equals in a free state without force. There were many, who made as great a figure in Rome as himself, b and were ready to oppose the sovereignty at which he aspired. Lucullus, who had paved the way for his conquests in the east, did not think himself at all inferior to this celebrated conqueror. Crassus had been Pompey's rival ever since he robbed him of the honour of a triumph, by assuming to himself the glory of having put an end to the war with the slaves, as we have related above. Pompey indeed outshined Crassus in glory; but the immense riches of the latter put him at least upon a level with his adversary; for he is said to have been worth seven thousand talents, that is one million three hundred fifty-six thousand two hundred and fifty pounds sterling. Cato was too zealous for the public good to let Pompey give any wound to the liberty of his country. Cicero was not so disinterested in his views as Cato; but was at bottom a c good republican, and his eloquence made him formidable. Cæsar, who, we may say, was at this time only beginning to shew himself, was too ambitious to submit to any superior. However, Pompey had interest enough to get L. Afranius and Q. Metellus, who had served under him, promoted to the consulate. They no sooner entered upon their office, than he made two attempts, which turned both to his confusion, viz. that lands should be given to his veterans, and that all his acts in the east should be approved by one decree. He made the motion himself; but it was almost unanimously rejected by the fathers, and no-body opposed it with more warmth than the consul Metellus, who had indeed made his court to Pompey, in order to raise himself, but hated him in his heart, for having divorced his sister Mucia (P), which d he looked upon as an affront offered to the Cæcilian family. As for the other consul, he was a man of no weight, and intirely incapable of business. Pompey, enraged at the refusal of the senate, had recourse to the tribunes, and prevailed upon Flavius Nepos, one of that college, to propose his request to the people; but Lucullus, Cato, and Metellus opposed the tribune with great steadiness and resolution. Their opposition occasioned a tumult in the forum, and the furious tribune went so far as to send the consul Metellus to prison; but Pompey, who was the author of the tumult, not caring to incur the hatred of the senate, ordered the consul to be set at liberty, under pretence that the consul had desired it. He was now fully convinced, that to pretend e to reign in a republic, otherwise than by force of arms, was a chimerical project; but as he could not conquer his boundless ambition, he made it his whole business to gain over to his interest the seditious Clodius, a man of a most abandoned character, but greatly favoured by the populace, and a declared enemy to the senate. The illustrious conqueror of the east demeaned himself so far as to join this profligate patrician, and to use his utmost endeavours to get him raised to the tribuneship, tho' he knew, that Clodius's only aim in aspiring at that office was, to revenge himself on Cicero, who had appeared as a witness against him, when he was accused of having profaned the mysteries of the Good Goddesses. Hence the bitter complaints which Cicero made of him in several of his letters. This conduct greatly lessened the high opinion, which both the people and the nobility had entertained of him before his return^r.

Sinks in his reputation.

She was sister to the two Metelli, Celer and Nepos; and he could not but foresee, that he should incur the displeasure of those two patricians, who made a considerable figure in the

IN the mean time the government of Farther Spain, which comprehended Lusitania and Bætica, that is Portugal and Andalusia, falling by lot to Cæsar, after his prætorship, he was preparing to set out for his new province; but being stopped by some of his creditors, Crassus, to whom he applied, took upon him to satisfy those creditors, who would be put off no longer, and became his security for eight hundred and thirty talents, that is, one hundred sixty thousand eight hundred and twelve pounds sterling. Upon this Cæsar, being at liberty to go to his government, set out without delay. In his journey, as he was crossing the Alps, he passed by a small village, which had but few inhabitants, and those wretchedly poor, which gave occasion to some of his friends to ask him by way of railery, Whether there was any canvassing there for offices, or any contention among the barbarians who should be uppermost? To this question Cæsar answered very seriously, That he had rather be first man among those poor Barbarians, than the second in Rome (Q). It is easy to imagine, that Cæsar, with these sentiments, could not continue idle in his province. To find himself work there, he made war on the innocent Spaniards, and, advancing as far as the ocean, subdued several nations, which had never before been subject to Rome. Having settled his province in peace, he returned to Rome, carrying with him sufficient sums to discharge his debts, which amounted to one million six hundred thousand pounds sterling, so great was his extravagance and profusion. His heart was set on a triumph and the consulate; but chiefly on the latter, which he could not obtain, without appearing personally in the comitium. On the other hand, those who demanded a triumph were obliged to halt in the suburbs, and there wait for the answer of the senate. Being therefore reduced to the dilemma either of laying aside the thoughts of a triumph by going into the city, or to give up the consulship by staying in the suburbs, he readily renounced the former, and pursued the latter, leaving nothing unattempted in order to succeed. His management on this occasion was a master-piece of policy, and the foundation of his future grandeur. The two citizens, who at this time made the greatest figure in the republic, were, without dispute, Pompey and Crassus; but these two powerful citizens were declared enemies, and, all things considered, much upon a level. As they had both great interest, Cæsar plainly saw, that he could never obtain the consulship, without gaining one or other of them to his cause; but the difficulty was which to choose. If he closed with Pompey, he would meet with a strong opposition from Crassus's friends; and if he joined Crassus, he was sure to have all Pompey's party against him. He therefore undertook to reconcile the two rivals, and, by proposing to them a triumvirate, in which should be lodged all the authority of the senate and people, he prevailed upon them to make up their differences, and to enter into a strict friendship with each other. In order to make their confederacy the more indissoluble, they solemnly bound themselves by mutual oaths and promises to assist each other, and to suffer nothing to be undertaken or executed, without the unanimous consent of all three. Thus was the first great triumvirate formed, by which Rome became a prey to three men, who, by the interest of their united parties, arbitrarily disposed of all the dignities and employments in the commonwealth. The public were long strangers to the mysteries of this new cabal. Nothing more appeared to the senate than the reconciliation of Pompey and Crassus, and Cæsar was congratulated by all ranks of men for having brought it about. Cato alone foresaw the evil consequences of this new alliance, and exclaimed against it, saying, That Rome had lost her liberty; but no-body hearkened to him, till it was too late to follow his prudent counsel. This association subsisted to the death of Crassus, and was followed by the intire subversion of the republican state.

(Q) Plutarch adds to this, that while he was one day reading the history of Alexander the Great, he appeared very thoughtful, and at last burst out into tears, answering his friends, who asked him the reason of his grief, Do you think I have not just cause to weep, when I consider, that Alexander, at my age, had conquered so many nations, while I have yet done nothing that is memorable?

C H A P. XI.

The history of Rome, from the first triumvirate to the death of Crassus.

- THE first benefit Cæsar reaped from this association was, his promotion to the consulate, Pompey and Crassus employing all their interest in his favour. He had but two competitors, L. Luceius Hirrus and M. Calpurnius Bibulus. The former, a man of great learning (R), was but little versed in public affairs; and therefore Cæsar, well apprised that if he had him for his colleague, he should reign alone, did his utmost to get him elected. He was not ashamed openly to purchase the suffrages of the people with large sums; but the senators, being resolved to have him excluded and Bibulus chosen, agreed among themselves to defeat Cæsar's measures in his own way, and to offer the people greater sums than he had done. Cato himself, tho' a rigid stoic, was of opinion, that the laws, forbidding all sort of bribery, ought to be dispensed with on this occasion; so that it was resolved, that Bibulus should buy the suffrages of the people, and that each senator should pay his share towards raising the promised sums. By this means Luceius was excluded, and Bibulus appointed to be Cæsar's colleague. The first thing Cæsar did, after entering upon his office, was, to confirm all Pompey's acts, pursuant to his promise. After this he made it his whole business to gain the affection of the people. With this view he drew up an agrarian law, with such wise restrictions and provisos, that the senators themselves could not justly find fault with it; for it enacted only, that certain lands in Campania, belonging to the public, should be divided among such of the poor citizens, as had three children, or more. Cæsar declared in the senate, that he would do nothing without the consent of the conscript fathers, nor propose any of his friends for commissioners, nor any person else, who might be liable to suspicions; but that they should be all men of unblemished characters and known abilities. The fathers had nothing to object against the law itself; but, as they were well apprised of the legislator's ambitious views, they put off from day to day giving their assent to it. Cæsar complained of these delays; and then Cato told him in plain terms, that he did not disapprove of the distribution of the lands as proposed, but dreaded the consequences of it: We do not care, said he, that you should purchase the favour and affections of the people at the expence of the public treasury. This open declaration piqued Cæsar, who ordered his lictors to carry Cato to prison; but he soon after privately ordered the tribunes to release him. The example of Cato was followed by the consul Bibulus and most of the senators, who declared, that they had nothing to object against the law; but that they would suffer no innovations. Hereupon Cæsar had recourse to the people, and having summoned them to assemble, appeared in the comitium, attended by Pompey and Crassus. He mounted the rostra, and directing his speech to his two associates, asked them, Whether they did not approve of the law? It is easy to imagine, that two men of his own cabal would speak the same language as he. They both answered, That they would support his motion, with all their power, against the enemies of the people, who opposed it. Pompey went further, adding, with more warmth than prudence, If any one opposes this law with the sword, I will resist him with sword and buckler. Pompey, by this rash answer, which was no-ways suitable to his dignity and was contrary to his true interest, made himself odious to the senate, and at the same time gained no credit among the people, who thought themselves indebted to Cæsar only for so beneficial a law. However, Bibulus opposed it with great courage; but the

Which is rejected by the senate.

(R) If we may judge of his learning from the account Cicero gives of him, he was one of the best historians of Rome. Besides the history of the war of the allies, he wrote that of Cicero's consulship, at the request of the consul, who had himself already published one of his own in Greek and Latin.

the people, losing all regard for the consular dignity, treated him with the utmost indignity, drove him out of the assembly, broke his fasces, wounded his lictors, &c. The senators, dreading the fury of the populace, held their peace; so that the law passed without any further disturbance^a.

And at last

THIS victory over the senate and Bibulus made Cæsar in great measure absolute in Rome. His colleague was scarce ever mentioned; no deference was paid to his orders; they all looked upon Cæsar as the only consul, and called this year ironically the year of the consulate of Julius and Cæsar. And now the suspicions entertained of the confederacy between the triumvirs being confirmed by Cæsar's marrying his daughter Julia to Pompey, Cato, who was a sincere friend to his country, loudly exclaimed against the arbitrary power usurped by the triumvirs; and when the agrarian law was brought before the senate to be confirmed by them, he continued inflexible, opposing it with great warmth, tho' threatened with banishment; but at length Cicero telling him, That if Cato did not want Rome, Rome wanted Cato; upon this consideration he acquiesced, and the law was established in full force. And now Cæsar resolved to gain the favour of the knights, as he had done that of the people. With this view he abated a third part of the rents which they paid annually into the public treasury, and by this means attached them unalterably to his interest. Having thus secured to himself both the people and knights, he governed Rome with an absolute sway. Cicero exclaimed against the triumvirate, and, by some severe jests (S), provoked them to such a degree, that they resolved upon his ruin; and, in order to compass it the more effectually, they got his mortal enemy, P. Clodius, promoted to the tribuneship. We shall soon see the seditious Clodius vent his rage against this great orator, and forward the ruin of the republic, by the banishment of one of the chief supporters of the public liberty^w. Cæsar, having thus established the power of the triumvirate, applied himself to his own private interest. Pompey had got two consuls elected for the next year, who were personally devoted to him, viz. L. Calpurnius Piso and A. Gabinius. Cæsar, fearing Pompey might attempt a superiority over him during their administration, attached Piso to himself, by marrying his daughter Calpurnia. Having thus secured his interest at Rome during the next consulship, he applied himself both to the senate and people, and, with the assistance of Pompey and Crassus, procured the government of Transalpine and Cisalpine Gaul, contrary to all law, for five years together, with the command of four legions.

Clodius resolved
of Cicero.

UNDER the next consulship of Calpurnius Piso and A. Gabinius Nepos, the triumvirate still continued to govern Rome by the consuls themselves, who were their creatures. As Cicero adhered steadily to the interests of the republic, the consuls gave Clodius full liberty to vent on him all his fury. Cicero was looked on as the father and defender of his country, and the service he had done the republic was yet fresh in every one's memory; the tribune therefore was obliged to have recourse to craft and cunning to compass his ruin. His first step was to gain the affections of the people, by passing several laws favourable to them; then he obliged both the knights and senators, by lessening the power which the censors had of degrading them; and in the last place he paid his court to the consuls, by assigning them provinces of a very great extent. The consuls had hitherto chosen their provinces by lot; but Clodius pretended, that the right of assigning them was lodged in the people, who accordingly gave to Piso, Macedon, Achaia, Thessaly, and Beotia; and to Gabinius, Syria and most of the eastern kingdoms. Cicero, who had too much sagacity not to see through the tribune's design, secured to himself a faithful friend in L. Ninnius Quadratus, another of the tribunes, who so effectually opposed all the attempts of Clodius, that he could not proceed. Hereupon Clodius, fearing Ninnius, or, as others call him, Mummius, might by self into contempt by the low conceits and stale allusions, which he put off for wit. He has dropt several things of this nature, even in his most eloquent discourses. Macrobius tells us, that one of Cicero's freed-men was at the pains of collecting all his master's witticisms, under the title of Ineptiæ. It is surprising, that a man of so much sagacity should not think such puns and ridiculous conceits unbecoming the gravity of a magistrate.

- a by his opposition overturn all his schemes, had recourse to artifice, and assured Cicero, What steps he took to compass it. that he would undertake nothing to his prejudice, provided he would persuade Ninnius not to oppose his measures. We are told, that both Cæsar and Pompey basely demeaned themselves to assure the orator, that the tribune had no design to hurt him; and that Cicero, deceived by these false assurances, desired Ninnius to wave his opposition, and slept in security. In the mean time, Clodius got another law passed, enacting, That when a tribune of the people should propose any law in the comitia, no regard should be had to the denunciations of the augurs. As most of that college favoured Cicero, the tribune was afraid, lest they should, under pretence of religion, prevail upon the people to reject the decree, which he had already drawn
- b up against Cicero. And now the tribune, thinking himself in a condition to carry his point, mounted the rostra, and proposed the following law, at which all these preparations aimed, viz. That whoever had been concerned in the death of a Roman citizen, before the people had passed sentence on him, should be deemed guilty of treason, and punished as a state criminal. Proposes a law aimed at Cicero. Cicero, well apprised that he was the person aimed at by this law, and seeing himself in so great danger, changed his habit, and, letting his beard grow, went about in deep mourning, soliciting the assistance of his friends. Many of the knights testified their regard for him, by changing their habits, and, in a negligent
- c dress, supplicating in his behalf. Among these was the son of Crassus the triumvir, who had been taught by Cicero the rules of eloquence, and had made an extraordinary proficiency under so great a master. This young patrician, at the head of twenty thousand young Romans of his age, attended Cicero where-ever he went. Clodius, on the other hand, attended by a numerous body of armed men, insulted Cicero, where-ever he met him, reproached him with want of courage, and, interrupting him in his humble addreses to the people, encouraged his enemies, who were the dregs of the populace, to throw stones and dirt at the orator and his company, who dared not return the like treatment, for fear of violating the sacred person of a tribune. The senate, affected with the unjust prosecution of a man, whom they looked upon as the chief ornament of their body, assembled, in order to decree, that the people should put on mourning, as in a public calamity; but the consuls, whom Clodius had gained over, opposed it,
- d while he himself with a band of armed slaves beset the place where the senate met, and with menaces deterred them from coming to any resolution. It must be owned; that Cicero on this occasion acted a part unworthy of his former constancy. He ran from house to house with sorrow and consternation in his face, imploring the protection of his friends, and cringing, with a shameful meanness of spirit, even to his enemies. The advice his friends gave him served only to embarrass him the more. Lucullus was for having recourse to arms and repelling force by force. The knights declared for him, and with them the better part of the citizens; but Cato and Hortensius advised him not to tarnish his past glory, by filling Rome with slaughter, and exercising the same cruelties on his fellow-citizens, which he had so severely condemned
- e in Catiline. Cicero, greatly perplexed and not knowing how to escape the fury of the mad tribune, had at length recourse to Cæsar, intreating him, that he would take him with him into Gaul as one of his lieutenants. This was, all things considered, the safest method he could have taken; and Cæsar, who wanted nothing else but to get him out of Rome, where he might, by his eloquence, raise great disturbances, readily consented to his request. Clodius was well apprised, that, by this means, his prey would escape him; and therefore, in order to divert him from accepting the new employment, he feigned himself disposed to a reconciliation, and sent him word by some common friends, that he had been informed, that his wife Terentia had been the chief cause of his giving evidence against him in the affair of Pompeia, and that now he was determined to drop the prosecution, and live again in amity with him. Cicero, tho' a man in other respects of uncommon sagacity, was so far imposed upon by his enemy's fair words and promises, that he changed his mind; and refused to attend Cæsar into Gaul. This so provoked Cæsar, that he joined Clodius against him, and engaged Pompey not to intermeddle in his behalf. Here-upon Clodius resumed his impeachment, and accused Cicero before the tribes, of have-
- f ing put Lentulus, Cethegus, and other Roman citizens to death, without a lawful trial. Cicero, seeing himself thus exposed anew to the rage of the furious tribune, had recourse to Pompey; who was indebted to him for most of his employments, and had ever professed a great friendship for him; but Pompey was retired to one of his country-houses, for fear of being reproached with his unfaithfulness, if he did not stir in behalf of his friend. Cicero immediately dispatched Piso his son-in-law to him, and, upon his delaying to return, went himself; but Pompey, not able to bear the sight of his old friend, who had done him so many good offices, and whom he had engaged his word with Cæsar not to assist, went out at a back-door, ordering his servants to tell Cicero, that he was returned to Rome. Cicero, no longer doubting but he was abandoned by him, having called together his true friends, asked their advice, when Lucullus, who was an old experienced commander, was for taking up arms; but the rest of his friends advised him to give way to the storm and retire from Rome. As he could not bear the thoughts of shedding the blood of his fellow-citizens, he followed their advice, left Rome at midnight, and resolved to retire to Sicily, where Vigilius was prætor, who owed his fortune to him; but the ungrateful governor refusing him admittance into the island, he imbarqued at Brundisium, and sailed to Dyrrachium, where he discovered so much dejection and meanness of spirit, as were a reproach to his great abilities and the philosophy he professed. He himself acknowledges, that, in the height of his grief, he was going to lay violent hands on himself; but was prevented by his friend Atticus * (S).

Clodius gets the decree of his banishment passed.

In the mean time, Clodius got the decree of his banishment passed, confiscated his effects, which, to the immortal honour of the exile, no-body would buy when exposed to sale, burnt to the ground his houses in the country and his fine palace in Rome, and ordered the pontifices to consecrate the ground, on which his city-house stood, to the goddesses Peace and Liberty, to make the restitution of it in a manner impossible. Thus Clodius triumphed at Rome; but as Cato still thwarted him in his pernicious attempts, he prevailed on the people to pass the most unjust decree possible, purely to gratify a private resentment of his own, and then, by another decree, obliged Cato to put the first in execution. Clodius had been taken in his youth by the pirates, while he was serving in the east; and Ptolemy, king of Cyprus, a covetous prince, had refused to pay his ransom. This Clodius took greatly amiss; and now that he was the reigning tribune, he resolved to be revenged on the king of Cyprus; and accordingly got a decree passed, depriving him of his dominions, under pretence that he had forfeited them by his ill conduct. Cato was charged with the execution of this scandalous decree; and that he might be kept the longer from Rome, he was ordered at the same time to resettle some citizens of distinction in Byzantium, who had been driven from thence by the populace. When Cicero and Cato were gone, the furious tribune, and the triumvirs, whose tool he was, reigned without controul; but in the mean time, news being brought to Rome, that the Helvetians, having abandoned

(S) Cicero came first to Vibo, called also Hipponium, which stood on the coast of Brutium, and had chosen Cicero for its patron or protector; but one Vibius, on whom Cicero had conferred many favours, not only refused to admit him into his house, but would not even suffer him to come into the city. However, one Sica, who held a farm near Hipponium, received and entertained him, till he set out for Brundisium. Thither the people of the country guarded him, the neighbouring country being infested by a troop of exiles of the Catilinarian faction, under the command of Autronius, whose resentment Cicero had reason to fear. Before he imbarqued at the port of Brundisium, he spent some days with his friend M. Lænius Flaccus, who had a country-house near that city. He was then in a most deplorable condition, not knowing what place to chuse for his residence during his exile. Greece and Epirus were beset by a troop of robbers in the pay of Autronius, his sworn enemy. The government of Macedon had been given to the consul Piso, an avowed friend to Clodius. Asia only offered him a secure retreat; and therefore he imbarqued at Brundisium, resolving to sail to Cyzicus, a city of Myfia. This he himself declares in a letter, which he wrote before he imbarqued to his wife Terentia, and to his children Tullia and Cicero. I have spent thirteen days, says he, at Brundisium, in the house of M. Lænius Flaccus. This faithful friend is affected with my misfortunes, and, in spite of the furious Clodius, entertains me with great civility. I am going to leave him and imbarque for Macedon, whence I intend to proceed to Cyzicus, and there finish my course. Accordingly, on the thirteenth of April, he took leave of his friend Flaccus, who, with his father and children, attended him to the port, where these illustrious friends parted, after having given each other reciprocal assurances of the most sincere friendship. Cicero had at first a favourable wind; but a few hours after a violent storm obliged the pilot to return to the same port. When the storm was appeased, he put to sea again, and landed at Dyrrachium, now Durazzo. There the inhabitants received him in such a manner, as might have allayed his grief if he had been capable of any comfort; but he discovered a weakness on this occasion, which could not have been expected from a man bred up in the study of philosophy. He grew melancholy, was ever sighing, and turning his eyes towards Italy. The Greeks, who came to visit him, being quite tired with his complaints, were forced to invent dreams, and draw good presages of his speedy return from the most trifling events, in order to pacify him. So very different are sometimes the greatest men from themselves in times of adversity! Cicero, after a short stay at Dyrrachium, repaired to Thessalonica, and there resided, till he was recalled from banishment.

- a done their country, and burnt down their towns and houses, were preparing to enter Gaul by way of Geneva, Cæsar, whose province Gaul was, found himself obliged to leave Rome, and hasten to the defence of the country committed to his care. Accord- ingly he repaired thither in such haste, that he reached the banks of the Rhone in eight days. Upon his arrival, he broke down the bridge of Geneva; and as he found but one legion in the province, he deferred giving answer to the Helvetians, who desired leave to pass through the country of the Allobroges, till he had covered the frontiers of his province, by carrying on a wall from the lake Lemanus, or lake of Geneva, to mount Jura, now Mont S. Claude. This wall was nineteen miles in extent, sixteen foot high, and defended by a deep ditch and castles at proper distances.
- b As Cæsar did not set out from Rome till about the beginning of April, and this work was completed before the ides, or the thirteenth, of the same month, it is manifest, that, besides the Roman legion, great numbers of the inhabitants were employed in it. When the deputies of the Helvetii returned at the time appointed for an answer, Cæsar told them, that the Romans never suffered foreign armies to march through their countries; and that, if they attempted to force a passage, he would repel force with force. Upon this, the whole nation of the Helvetians appeared in a body; and then Cæsar, persuaded that he could not resist them with the few troops he had, left Labienus, one of his lieutenants, to defend his lines, and hastening back brought from thence in a very short time five legions. With these he fell upon the
- c Helvetians, while they were embarrassed in passing the Arar, now the Saone, cut in pieces those who had not yet crossed the river, and, throwing a bridge over it, advanced against the rest. The Helvetians, somewhat disheartened at the loss they had sustained, sent deputies to the Roman camp to treat of an accommodation; but as they refused to give hostages, Cæsar detached his cavalry, with orders to harass them on their march. The Roman horse, having attacked them in narrow roads, were repulsed with no small loss, which raised the courage of the Helvetians, while the Romans began to be somewhat disheartened for want of provisions. Cæsar had none but the Ædui, the faithful allies of Rome, to depend on for a speedy supply of corn. Their country lay between the Seine, the Loire, and the Saone, was extremely fruitful, and capable of supporting an army far more numerous than that of Cæsar; but the
- d Roman general, to his great surprise, found the corn fail when he most wanted it. The Ædui indeed had promised to supply his troops with provisions; but they postponed from day to day the sending of the convoys which they had promised; so that the army was reduced to great straits. Cæsar therefore, suspecting the fidelity of the Ædui, resolved to find out the true cause of these artful delays. In order to this he examined Liscus, the chief magistrate of the Ædui, and a lord of the country named Divitiacus, who served both in the Roman army. The former told him, that Dumnorix, younger brother to Divitiacus, designing to usurp the sovereign power, and depending on the assistance of the Helvetians, had, to gratify them, privately conveyed the corn out of the province, and raised the price of it, hoping by that means to make the Roman army perish with famine. Divitiacus owned the same thing, but without naming his brother. Cæsar was inclined to punish Dumnorix with severity; but pardoned him at the entreaty of his brother Divitiacus.

AND now Cæsar drew near Bibraëte (T), the capital of the Ædui, to facilitate the conveyance of the corn, which those faithful allies had promised. When the enemy saw him retreat, they pursued and attacked him; whereupon a bloody battle ensued, which lasted from noon till night. The Helvetians behaved with incredible bravery; but at length were forced to give way, and retire to a hill, where they had placed their baggage and their women, and surrounded them with their waggons as with a rampart. Thither Cæsar pursued them, made himself master of their baggage, and took

(T) The modern geographers are divided in their opinions as to the situation of Bibraëte, as Cæsar and Strabo call it. They all agree, that it was the most considerable of all the cities of the Ædui, from the Doux to the Saone; but most of them pretend, that it stood where the city of Autun now stands. It was called first, according to them, Bibraëte, and afterwards Augustodunum, from the emperor Augustus. The latter name it retained, say they, till the time of the emperors Constans and Constantine, by whom it was rebuilt, and from them took the name of Flavia, both those princes being descended from the Flavian family. M. Valois places the ancient city of Bibraëte near a village called Beauvray, about two leagues from Autun; and others take the town of Pebrac, on the borders of Auvergne and Gevaudan, to be the ancient capital of the Ædui.

took a great many prisoners, among whom were the wife and daughter of the famous Orgetorix, the first author of the transmigration. After this overthrow, the Helvetians, disheartened at the loss they had sustained, which amounted to one hundred and thirty thousand of their people, had recourse to the clemency of the conqueror; who, having obliged them to lay down their arms and give him hostages, sent them back to their own country, with orders to rebuild their cities and villages. Only the Boii were allowed, at the request of the Ædui, to settle in Gaul, whence they formerly came. This victory made the Roman name formidable throughout all Gaul; congratulations were brought to Cæsar from all parts, and the Ædui implored his protection against Ariovistus king of the Germans, who, taking advantage of the differences which had long subsisted between them and the Arverni (U), had joined the latter, made himself master of great part of the country of the Sequani (W); and obliged the Ædui to give him their children as hostages. Cæsar, pleased with this new opportunity of acquiring glory, promised them his assistance; and accordingly dispatched ambassadors to Ariovistus, inviting him to an interview; which he declining, Cæsar sent other deputies, desiring him to restore to the Ædui their hostages, and to bring no more troops over the Rhine into Gaul. At the same time he put him in mind of the favour he had shewn him during his consulate, since, by his means, he had been declared a friend and ally of the Roman people. Ariovistus answered, That he had a right to make war when and where he pleased; that he was not obliged to give any person an account, either of the victories he gained, or of the terms he prescribed to the conquered; that he would not restore to the Ædui their hostages, &c. Cæsar no sooner received this answer, than he marched to Vesontio now Besançon, the capital of the Sequani, to prevent its being surprized by Ariovistus. There the Romans received such accounts of the formidable stature and looks of the Germans, as alarmed them. Cæsar therefore having called a council of war, reproached them in such strong terms with their fears, that they were ashamed of the weakness they had discovered. He then led them against the enemy; but when they came within five miles of their camp, Ariovistus sent to desire an interview with the Roman general; which was readily granted. Both commanders repaired to the place agreed on, which was a rising ground in the midst of a large plain. During the conference, in which they treated each other with great haughtiness, the horse that attended the king drew near to those of Cæsar, and discharged a shower of darts and stones at them. Cæsar restrained the ardour of his men; but immediately broke off the conference and retired to his camp, whither he was followed by deputies from the king, desiring, that ambassadors might be sent him to treat in an amicable manner. Cæsar readily complied with his request; but Ariovistus, as soon as they arrived in his camp, treated them as spies, put them in irons, and decamping the same day, posted himself so as to intercept the Roman convoys. Cæsar followed him, and, drawing up his men for five days together in a neighbouring plain, bid the enemy defiance; but Ariovistus kept close in his camp, and Cæsar was informed, that the women in the enemy's camp, who pretended to prophesy, had foretold, that they could not be victorious till after the new-moon. Upon this intelligence, the proconsul marched all his legions up to the German trenches, which forced Ariovistus to come to a battle, in which he was intirely defeated, and most of his troops cut in pieces. The king, with much difficulty, escaped cross the Rhine; but two of his wives and one of his daughters perished in the flight. Another of his daughters was taken prisoner, with many Germans of distinction. After this victory, Cæsar put his troops into winter-quarters, and, crossing the Alps, returned into Cisalpine Gaul, which was a part of his government, to make there the necessary preparations for the next year².

Clodius insults Pompey.

At Rome the tribune Clodius, who was intirely devoted to Cæsar, being sensible of the superiority that general was gaining over Pompey, whose glory he had almost eclipsed in one campaign, began to insult him, and even talked of disannulling all his acts. He had already taken young Tigranes out of the hands of L. Flavius the prætor,

² Cæs. ibid. c. 18—55.

(U) The country of the Arverni lay, according to Strabo, between the ocean, the Pyrenees, and the Rhine. Lucan tells us, that the Arverni pretended to derive their origin from a colony of Trojans, who settled among the Gauls, under the conduct of Antenor. This fable Sidonius, to do honour to his Nation, adopts for a certain truth. The Arverni, in ancient times, were one of the most powerful nations of Gaul.

a prætor, to whose custody Pompey had committed him, and sent him back into Armenia, where it was feared, he would raise new troubles. This treatment roused Pompey, who now began to think of recalling his old friend Cicero, whom he had so basely deserted. As this could no otherwise be done, than by a decree of the senate, or of the people, and the latter was impracticable during the tribuneship of Clodius, he made it his business to engage the conscript fathers in his behalf; but the consuls, Piso and Gabinus, rendered all their attempts abortive, so that nothing could be done this year in favour of the illustrious exile. The next year, the first thing the new consuls, P. Cornelius Lentulus and P. Cæcilius Metellus, proposed in the senate, was the recalling of Cicero, which met with a general approbation; but when the b affair was brought before the people, Clodius appeared armed in the comitium, at the head of a company of gladiators, to oppose it with open violence. Then Milo, who was at the head of the tribunes, hired another company of gladiators to repel force with force. The conscript fathers, depending on the protection of Milo, passed the decree in the most solemn and pompous manner; as did also the people when it was brought before them, notwithstanding the warm opposition of Clodius. In the mean time, Cicero, informed of what passed at Rome, left Theſſalonica, where he resided, and came to Dyrrachium, and from thence set sail for Brundisium, where his reception was a kind of triumph. From Brundisium he set out for Rome, and had the pleasure to see all Italy take part in his joy. Every colony and municipium sent c deputies to congratulate him; and the nearer he came to Rome, the more the crowds increased. As he was just ready to enter the city at the gate Capena, the whole senate met him in a body and conducted him, amidst the shouts and acclamations of the people, to the capitol, from whence he was carried to his habitation, as he himself expresses it, on the shoulders of all Rome. After his return, he soon began to reassume his former ascendant over the senate, and as corn was become exceeding dear at Rome, he procured for Pompey, his benefactor, the honourable commission of supplying the city, with an unlimited power in all the ports of the Mediterranean for five years. After this he prevailed on the pontifices to put him again in possession of the ground, on which his house had stood, and on the conscript fathers to rebuild, at the expence of the public, his houses both in the city and country.^a nation, who possessed the country now known by the name of Cambresis, joined the Atrebates and Veromandui, that is, the inhabitants of the territory of Arras and of the Vermandois, and, having secured their wives and children in inaccessible places, stood on their defence. In the mean time, Cæsar advanced, and arrived in the enemy's country; but while his legions were busy in pitching their camp, the Nervii, who lay concealed in a neighbouring wood, sallying out of their ambuscade, attacked the Roman cavalry, put them to flight, and then fell on the legionaries with a fury not to be expressed. As this attack was unexpected, Cæsar had in a manner every thing to do at the same instant. The banner was to be erected, the charge sounded, the soldiers at a distance recalled, the army drawn up, and the signal given. In this surprise Cæsar ran from place to place, exhorting his men to remember their former valour; and having drawn them up in the best manner he could, caused the signal to be given. The legionaries made a vigorous resistance; but as the enemy seemed determined either to conquer or die, the success was different in different places. In the left wing the ninth and tenth legions did wonders, drove the Atrebates into a neighbouring river, and made a great slaughter of them. In another place the eighth and eleventh legions repulsed the Veromandui, and drove them before them. But in the right wing the seventh and twelfth legions suffered extremely. They were intirely surrounded by the Nervii, all the centurions in the fourth cohort being slain, and most of the other officers wounded. In this extremity, Cæsar, seizing the buckler of one of the private men, put himself at the head of his broken wing, renewed the attack, and being joined by the two legions, which he had left to guard the baggage, fell upon the Nervii, already fatigued, with fresh vigour, and made a dreadful havock of them. However, that warlike nation did not give ground; as soon as one fell, another stood upon his body, and supplied his place. In short they were almost all cut in pieces; and then their old men, with their women and children, surrendered to the conqueror, who left them in possession of their cities and liberty. Then Cæsar advanced against the Advatici (Y), who, upon his approach, pretended to give up their arms, and submit; but treacherously concealed a third part of them, and made an attack on the Romans in the night. This so provoked the Roman general, that he broke down the gates of their city the next day, put a great number of them to the sword, and sold the rest, to the number of fifty-three thousand, for slaves. At the same time P. Crassus, the son of the triumvir and one of Cæsar's lieutenants, subdued seven other nations (Z), and took possession of their cities. The fame of these exploits brought the proconsul ambassadors with offers of submission from several nations beyond the Rhine; but as the season was far advanced, he put his troops into winter-quarters in the territories of the Andes, Taurones, and Carnutes, now the Angevins, the Tourangeaux, and those of Chartrain, and repassing the Alps, spent the winter in Insubria^b. By these conquests Cæsar effaced the remembrance of Pompey's victories in the east, and at the same time by the prodigious sums he heaped up in Gaul, chiefly by robbing the temples of their treasures, he purchased himself many friends in Italy.

THE following year Marcus Philippus and Cornelius Lentulus were raised to the consulate. During their administration, Ptolemy Auletes, king of Egypt, who had been driven from the throne by the Alexandrians, was restored to it by Gabinus, proconsul of Syria, as we have related at length in our history of Egypt. In Gaul Galba, one of Cæsar's lieutenants, was attacked in his winter-quarters at Ostodurus, now Martaigac in Lower Valais, by a great body of Gauls, whom he defeated, killed above ten thousand of them, and then, after having burnt Ostodurus, marched into the country of the Allobroges, to spend the rest of the winter there in more peaceable quarters. In the mean time, Cæsar, who was in Illyricum, which was part of his province, being informed, that the Veneti, that is, the ancient inhabitants of Vannes in Bretagne, with some other nations near them, had endeavoured to recover their hostages

^b CÆS. I. II. c. 1---33.

(Y) The Advatici were the remains of those Cimbri and Teutones, whom Marius had defeated in Italy. They had been left on the banks of the Rhine to guard the baggage and booty of their countrymen, and had settled there, after the intire defeat of the Cimbri.

(Z) These seven nations were the Veneti, Unelli, Osismii, Curiosolitæ, Sesuvii, Aulerce, and Rhedones, that is, according to the modern geographers, the inhabitants of Vannes, Coutance, Treguier, Cornouaille, Sees, Maine, and Rennes.

a hostages, and were making great preparations for war, sent orders for building a fleet on the Loire, and made all haste to the army. Upon his arrival, he appointed Brutus admiral of the fleet, which he found ready equipped; and the new admiral putting to sea, engaged the enemy's fleet, and gained a complete victory over them. Hereupon the Veneti immediately submitted; but Cæsar put their chief men to death, The Veneti, Unelli, Aulerci, &c. subdued. and sold the rest for slaves. At the same time Titurius Sabinus, whom he had detached against the Unelli, defeated Veridorix their chief, and subdued them, with the Aulerci and Lexovii (A). Crassus, whom he had sent into Aquitaine, besieged the capital of the Sociates, and reduced it; but the rest of the Aquitani still refusing to submit, Crassus marched against them, and killed near thirty thousand of them in one battle.

b The consequence of this victory was the reduction of all Aquitaine. And now all the nations in Gaul being disarmed, except the Morini and Menapii, that is, the ancient inhabitants of the territory of Teroüenne, of Guelthers, Fuliers, and Cleves, Cæsar himself marched against them; but, as they retired to inaccessible fastnesses, all he could do was to burn and ravage their country; after which he put his troops into winter-quarters in the countries of the Aulerci and Lexovii, and, repassing the Alps, as usual, spent some months in Cisalpine Gaul. From thence he influenced all affairs at Rome, Cæsar excites Clodius to commit violence in Rome. and encouraged his chief agent Clodius to pull down Cicero's new house; but Milo opposed the furious tribune, and prevented the execution of his design. And now Pompey began to be extremely jealous of Cæsar, whose victories in Gaul intirely eclipsed the glory he had acquired in the east. Cæsar likewise took umbrage at Pompey's joining Cicero; however, they both kept up the appearance at least of friendship, being apprehensive, that Crassus would leave them, if they came to a quarrel. Besides Cæsar stood in great need of Pompey's assistance, to get Domitius Ahenobarbus excluded from the consulate, who had declared, that he would, if raised to that dignity, shorten the time of Cæsar's proconsulate. To exclude Ahenobarbus was no easy matter; he being supported by Cato, who was returned from Cyprus, and by all the enemies of the triumvirate, who were very numerous. Among all the well-wishers of the republic, Cicero was the only person who kept measures with the triumvirs, the remembrance of his banishment having made him more circumspect.

d As it was the common interest of the triumvirate, that Ahenobarbus, a sincere friend to his country, should be set aside at the next election, Pompey and Crassus agreed to stand in competition with him; but as they despaired of success without the concurrence of Cæsar, they both went to Luca, where he spent the winter, to propose their scheme to him, and engage his interest. There they found so many prætors and proconsuls making their court to him, that one hundred and twenty bundles of rods were seen at a time. Pompey and Crassus no sooner informed him of their design, than he came heartily into their measures. He was indeed sensible, that a second consulate would increase the power of Pompey and Crassus; but it was more for his interest, that they should succeed, than that the consulship should be conferred on Ahenobarbus, who was intirely under the influence of Cato. Cæsar therefore closed with the proposal, and ordered his agents and emissaries at Rome to spare no expence in purchasing the suffrages of the tribes. As all this was kept secret, Ahenobarbus, not suspecting that the two triumvirs would be his competitors, went very early on the day appointed for the election to solicit the suffrages of the people. He was attended by Cato, who was to present him to the tribes, and by a slave, who, as it was yet dark, carried a flambeau before him; but he had not gone far, before some assassins, who lay in wait for him, killed the slave, and falling on the candidate and his friend, would have dispatched them likewise, had they not saved themselves by flight. Ahenobarbus escaped unhurt; but Cato was wounded in the arm. This notorious act of violence roused the zeal of the senate; but the furious Clodius, at the head of an armed mob, opposed all their measures; and at the same time Caius Cato, another tribune, protested against holding the comitia; so that the consular year being expired, the republic fell into an inter-regnum; which so grieved the senators, that they went into mourning, as in a time of public calamity. As the fathers were well apprised, that these disturbances were occasioned by Pompey and Crassus, they asked them in full senate, Whether they aspired to the consular dignity? They owned they did; and then the other

other candidates desisting; through fear of the triumvirs, the comitia were held without the least disturbance, and Pompey and Crassus unanimously chosen ^a.

Cæsar, now under no apprehension of being recalled from Gaul, hastened thither to oppose the Usipites and Tenchtheri (B), who being driven out of their own country by the Suevi, had crossed the Rhine, with a design to settle in Belgic Gaul. As soon as he appeared, the Germans sent him a deputation, offering to join him, if he would assign them lands. Cæsar answered, That there was no room in Gaul for newcomers; but that he would desire the Ubii; the people of Cologne, to give them leave to settle in their territories. Then they desired time to treat with the Ubii; and in the mean while, falling treacherously upon some Roman squadrons, killed about seventy men, Cæsar, exasperated at this perfidiousness, immediately marched after them, ^b and coming up with them; when least expected, made a dreadful slaughter of the unhappy wretches; who were but indifferently armed. They fled in the utmost confusion; but Cæsar pursued them to the conflux of the Rhine and the Maese, where the slaughter was renewed with such fury, that of four hundred thousand souls very few escaped. After this, being resolved to break into Germany, and spread the terror of the Roman name among those barbarous nations, he ordered a bridge to be built over the Rhine; which wonderful undertaking being completed in ten days, he entered Germany, plundered and sacked the country of the Sicambri (C), terrified the Suevi (D), and having made them sensible that there was a more formidable nation in the world than themselves, he returned into Gaul, and broke down the bridge he had ^c built. This expedition into Germany was finished in eighteen days ^d.

AND now Cæsar, having reduced all Gaul, and struck terror into the German nations, bordering on the countries which he had subdued, resolved to pass over into Britain, and punish those islanders for sending continual supplies to the Gauls against the Romans. This was a dangerous enterprize; and therefore, before he embarked in it, he carefully inquired of the merchants, who traded to the British islands, what sort of people they were; in what manner they made war; under what laws they lived, and which were their best ports. After this, he sent Volusenus over into Britain, to view the coast, while he himself, crossing the country of the Morini, came to the place where the passage from the continent to the island is narrowest. Thither he ordered ^d all the ships to repair, which he had made use of against the Veneti. In the mean time, the Britains, informed of these preparations, dispatched deputies to him, offering to submit to the republic and to give hostages. Cæsar sent the ambassadors back with fair promises, and with them one Comius of Atrebatum; a man well known in Britain, charging him to gain over to the Roman interest as many cities as he could, and to persuade them to send him hostages; but Comius, not caring to trust the inhabitants, continued five days on the coast; and then, without so much as landing, returned to make his report to Cæsar of what he had observed. Cæsar, leaving Sulpicius Rufus in Gaul to guard the ports, put to sea with two legions, and made the British coast the next morning, which he found lined with men to oppose his landing. ^e As he could not conveniently make a descent in that place, the eminences, which the inhabitants had seized, being so near the shore, that they could from thence harass the Romans with their darts, without being exposed themselves to any danger, he sailed eight miles farther, and there met with such a vigorous opposition, that he was in danger of being obliged to return to sea, till the standard-bearer of the tenth legion, leaping boldly into the water, encouraged, by his example, the others to follow him. They all leaped out of their ships, through fear of leaving a Roman eagle in the hands of the enemy, and, advancing through a shower of darts, gained the shore, engaged the Britains on firm ground and put them to flight. The Britains were so terrified with the success of the Romans, that they desired a peace; which was granted ^f them, of the Sicambri. All we know of them is, that they lived near the rivers Lippe and Ifel, and that they possessed a pretty large territory in Germany.

a them, upon their delivering some hostages ; but in the mean time, Cæsar's transports being, for the most part, shattered by a violent storm, and provisions growing scarce in his camp, the Britains, instead of sending him the rest of the hostages, drew together what troops they could, and falling on the seventh legion, which Cæsar had sent to get provisions, would have cut them all off; had not the general come very seasonably to their assistance and disengaged them. In this extremity Cæsar lost no time in refitting his ships, procuring provisions, and securing his camp. However, the Britains attacked him anew, and fought with great bravery and intrepidity ; but, being defeated a third time, they had recourse to the clemency of the conqueror, who was glad to grant them a peace, upon their delivering up to him double the number of hostages which he had required before. With these hostages, as the season was far advanced, he put to sea, and returned to Gaul, without the loss of one ship, There he put his troops into winter-quarters; and, repassing the Alps, returned to Insubria ^{c.}

While Cæsar was thus employed in Gaul, Pompey and Crassus governed Rome very arbitrarily, without any regard either to the senate or people. C. Trebonius, tribune of the people, in order to put the consuls upon a level with Cæsar, proposed a law, appointing Crassus governor of Syria, Egypt, and Macedon, and Pompey of the two Spains, for five years. Cato opposed this dangerous proposal, till he was seized by the tribune's orders and sent to prison. As Cæsar's commission was near expiring, and by this law all power would be vested in Pompey and Crassus, Cæsar's friends opposed it, till the tribes agreed to continue him in his government of Gaul for five years longer. Then the Trebonian law passed by a great majority, enacting, that they should have the above-mentioned governments ; that it should not be in any one's power to recal either from his province, till five years were expired ; that they might raise as many troops as they judged necessary ; and lastly, that they might draw what supplies of men and money they thought proper from the kings and states in alliance with Rome. This law plainly tended to the total destruction of the republican state, and made the triumvirs sole masters of the government. Pompey chose to stay in Rome; but Crassus, extremely desirous of making war upon the Parthians, embarked at Brundisium, before his consulate expired, and set sail for Asia. Pompey, the more to engage the people in his interest, built a stone theatre at a vast expence, and diverted the multitude with most magnificent shews, in which five hundred lions and eighteen elephants appeared in the arena.

The Trebonian law.

The next year Domitius Ahenobarbus and Claudius Pulcher were raised to the consulate. The former was an avowed enemy to the triumvirate ; and Cato, now prætor, was in a condition to assist him : but as the triumvirs were at the head of three great armies, they feared nothing either from the consul or the prætor. Cæsar and Crassus were indeed at a great distance from Rome ; but Pompey, without any regard to law or precedents, having raised an army, to put himself, as he said, upon a level with the other two, kept it at the very gates of Rome ; so that the most zealous republicans durst not attempt any thing against the triumvirs, or in favour of the public liberty. While Pompey was thus keeping the capital in awe, Cæsar was intent on another expedition to the British islands. This was first retarded by Indutiomarus, a chief of the Treviri, who raised an insurrection among his countrymen, but submitted as soon as Cæsar drew near him ; and afterwards by the revolt of Dumnorix the Æduan, who was killed by the Roman cavalry, whom Cæsar sent against him. These obstacles being removed, Cæsar embarked with five legions and two thousand horse, and landing in Britain without opposition, forced one of the enemy's intrenchments, and afterwards defeated Cassivelaunus, general of all the British forces ; which so terrified the enemy, that they never after appeared in the field with any considerable body. Whereupon Cæsar advanced farther into the country, and, in spite of all opposition, passed the Thames, his men wading up to the neck in the water. However, Cassivelaunus, with only four thousand of his charioteers, harassed the Romans to such a degree, that Cæsar would probably have found it very difficult to have reduced him, had he not been assisted by Mandrabatus, prince of the Trinobantes, who, out of hatred to Cassivelaunus, by whom his father Inmanuentius had been killed, prevailed on his countrymen to join Cæsar. Then Cassivelaunus, after some unsuccessful attempts in Cantium or Kent, submitted to the conqueror, and gave hostages.

hostages. Whereupon Cæsar, fearing some new tumults in Gaul, embarked his troops, and returned to the continent before the autumnal equinox ^f (E).

Julia.

ON his return, he received letters from Rome, acquainting him with the death of his daughter Julia, who was, we may say, the great cement of peace between her father and husband; and had, by her good offices, hitherto prevented them from coming to an open rupture. Her virtue and extraordinary qualities had so endeared her to all ranks of men in the republic, that she was honoured after her death, with a mark of distinction never before bestowed on any of her sex. She was buried in the Field of Mars, an honour allowed only to the greatest heroes of the republic ^g.

Cæsar, on his return to Gaul, found a famine in the country; which obliged him to divide his troops; and put them into different quarters, for their better subsistence. This gave the Eburones, now the people of Liege, an opportunity of taking arms against Sabinus and Cotta, whom Cæsar had posted in their country with only one legion and five cohorts. At the same time Ambiorix, a leading man among the Gauls, pretending friendship, told Sabinus and Cotta, while they were besieged in their camp, that all the Gaulish nations were marching against them, and offered to conduct them safe through his dominions to Cæsar or Labienus. The Romans in this distress accepted the offer; but were by the treacherous Ambiorix led into an ambuscade, and most of them cut in pieces. Ambiorix elated with this success, proclaimed it in the neighbouring nations; and then the Advatisci, falling unexpectedly upon Quintus Cicero, whom Cæsar had posted among them with one legion, reduced him to great straits; but the brave Roman defended himself with great gallantry, till Cæsar, whom he found means to acquaint with his danger, came to his relief and defeated the enemy. The news of this victory soon reached Labienus, who was likewise attacked by the Rheni, among whom Cæsar had quartered him with one legion. Indutiomarus, being joined by the Senones, came and insulted him in his camp; but the Roman, after pretending fear for some time, made a vigorous sally, put the enemy to flight, and killed Indutiomarus, the chief author of the revolt. This victory gave Cæsar a little more quiet during the rest of the campaign, which was the most difficult, as well as the most glorious, of any he had made in Gaul; but, after all, he lost so many men this summer, that he was forced to have recourse to Pompey, who was weak enough to spare him two legions out of the army, which he kept for ostentation only near Rome. Pompey was blind to Cæsar's designs; but Cato foresaw the evils he was bringing on the republic, tho' it was out of his power to prevent them. All he could do was, to attempt the rooting out of bribery and corruption. In order to this, he enacted a law, forbidding the buying of votes at elections; and thereby incurred the hatred both of the rich, whom he endeavoured to deprive of a sure way of obtaining honours, and of the poor, whom he would have excluded from a means of living without labour; neither did the law put a stop to the evil. When the election of new consuls came on, the candidates bought no more single votes of the people, but with large sums purchased the protection of the triumvirs, or of the present consuls; and those who offered most would have been chosen, had not Q. Mutius Scævola, one of the tribunes and a true republican, by raising difficulty upon difficulty, got the assembly dissolved as often as it was called, till at length the consular year expired before the election was made, and then a long inter-regnum ensued ^h.

Pompey.

Pompey, who commanded an army in the neighbourhood of Rome, fomented discord in the capital, and, by his private intrigues, got the election of consuls put off for seven months; during which time his friends, to sound the disposition of the people, said in all places, that it was necessary, in the present situation of affairs, that Rome should be governed by one man; nay, the tribune C. Luceius went so far, as to propose to the people the raising of Pompey to the dictatorship; but Cato opposed

(E) Cæsar, notwithstanding the great advantages he gained, according to his account, in Britain, abandoned the island, without leaving any troops in it, or fortifying any single place; which inclines us to believe, that the reputation he acquired in these two expeditions, was not near so great as it is represented in his commentaries. The poet Lucan tells us in express terms, that he turned his back to the Britains: Territa quæ sitis ostendit terga Britannis, says he.

Dion writes, that, in one action, the Britains entirely routed the Roman infantry; but were afterwards put in disorder by the cavalry. Horace and Tibullus insinuate, in several places of their works, that, in their time, the Britains were not looked upon as a conquered nation. Whence it is pretty plain, that his expedition into Britain was not so successful, as he represents it to have been.

a the motion with such eloquence and resolution, that he had like to have got the tribune deprived of his office. Then Pompey, fearing to disgust the people whose favour he courted, and in order to remove all suspicions, suffered Domitius Calvinus and Valerius Messala to be chosen consuls; but this did not restore peace to the city. The five remaining months of the consular year were spent in factions and massacres. Those who stood candidates for the curule offices brought their money openly to the place of election, where it was without shame distributed among the heads of the factions; and those who received it employed force and violence in favour of the persons who paid them: so that scarce any office was disposed of, but what had been disputed sword in hand, and had cost the lives of many citizens¹.

b DURING these transactions at Rome, Crassus, whose unsuccessful expedition against the Parthians we have described at length in our history of Parthia^k, after having lost his son in that war, was himself killed, and his whole army, except five hundred horse, either cut in pieces, or taken prisoners. His death gave rise to the civil war, which soon after broke out between the two surviving triumvirs; for, while he lived, he was a check to them both, and balanced their interests: but he being taken off, an open field was left for their ambition and emulation to contend in. Pompey would bear no rival, and Cæsar no superior; and hence those disturbances, which ended at length in the ruin of Pompey and the utter destruction of the republican state, as we shall see in the following chapter. The death of Crassus.

C H A P. XII.

The history of Rome, from the death of Crassus to the death of Pompey.

c ON E of the triumvirs being dead, and another at a great distance from Rome, Pompey, who continued in the capital, raised great disturbances there, hoping by that means to get himself promoted to the dictatorship. The city was now, in a manner, a seat of war between the candidates for offices; insomuch, that the people being afraid to meet in the Campus Martius, the comitia were deferred, and another inter-regnum ensued. These disturbances were greatly increased by the death of Clodius, who was killed by his mortal enemy Milo. This event, which Cicero endeavours to disguise with all the art of eloquence, is thus related by historians: As Milo was going from Rome to Lanuvium, with his usual guard of domestics, he met Clodius on the road, who was returning from his country-house. Milo was in a chariot, with his wife and other women; but Clodius on horseback, and well attended. They met near Bovillæ, and, tho' their looks were not very cordial, they passed each other without any insult. But the masters were scarce passed, when their slaves began to quarrel, and exchanged several blows with each other. Hereupon Milo, alighting out of his chariot, fell upon Clodius's slaves sword in hand; and his attendants, encouraged by the example of their master, wounded many of Clodius's retinue. In this scuffle Clodius himself, being dangerously wounded with a blow on the head, one of his slaves carried him to a neighbouring inn, or, as some say, to his own house. Thither Milo followed him, and, thinking it more easy to escape condemnation by killing his enemy, than by suffering him to live after he had been wounded, completed the work, which one of his slaves had begun. Some writers tell us, that Milo, finding his rival ready to expire of the wound he had received before, left him in that condition, Clodius is killed by Milo.

tion, and returned with all speed to Rome, to prevent what might be related and exaggerated there to his prejudice. However that be, the bloody body of Clodius was brought to the city by his brother Appius, which raised a general commotion among the people, who looked upon the deceased tribune as their boldest protector; and the most resolute enemy of the senate and nobility. They ran to Milo's house to set fire to it; but he repulsed them at the head of his slaves, and killed several of the mutinous multitude in the fray. Then they carried the dead body to the senate-house, and there pulling to pieces all the seats of the senators, they made a funeral pile of them, on which they placed the body, and then set fire to it, which burnt with so much fury, that the stately building, where the senate used to assemble, was soon reduced to ashes. In the mean time, Milo, having sent for a great number of his slaves out of the country to guard his person, made use of an artifice with respect to the murder, which he imagined must be effectual. He gained M. Cæcilius, one of the tribunes, who, having called an assembly of his own creatures, ordered Milo to appear at his tribunal with a design to acquit him. But the people, more transported than ever, fell upon Milo and his tribune, who narrowly escaped being killed, dispersed the assembly, and, under pretence of seeking for Milo's friends, committed all sorts of violences; insomuch, that no-body durst appear in the streets, unarmed and unguarded. During these disturbances, Pompey's friends revived the old proposal of nominating him dictator. The senate assembled, but while they were consulting about raising him to that dignity, Cato, who was always watchful over the public liberty, insinuated, that it would be more proper to chuse him sole consul, since a consul was bound, when called upon, to give an account of his administration to the senate and people, whereas a dictator was accountable to no-body for his conduct. Cato's expedient was approved of, and Pompey declared sole consul, a thing never known in Rome before. At the same time new troops were allotted to him, a thousand talents, that is, 193750 l. sterling allowed him yearly for their maintenance, and he continued in the government of Spain for four years longer, with a power to govern that province by his deputies. Pompey no sooner entered upon his new office, than he ordered Milo to be tried for the murder of Clodius. On the day appointed for the trial, Appius Claudius, brother of the deceased, appeared against him, and was heard with great attention. Cicero undertook the defence of the accused, but was so terrified by Pompey's presence and the soldiers about him, that he could scarce open his mouth; so that Milo was condemned to banishment. He chose Marseilles for the place of his abode, whither Cicero sent him the speech, which he had composed in his defence. We are told, that Milo, in reading it, cried out, It is lucky for me that Cicero could not pronounce this harangue; for if he had, I should not have eat so good fish as I now do.

WHILE Pompey was ruling arbitrarily at Rome, Cæsar was securing his conquests in Transalpine Gaul. Ambiorix, the Nervii, Adriatici, and Menapii, had revolted at the instigation of the Treviri, and the revolt had spread to other nations. He therefore first reduced the Menapii, and then marched against the Treviri and Eburones. The former he found already subdued by Labienus, and the latter at his approach retired, under the conduct of Ambiorix, to the woods and marshes, whither no army could follow them. In the mean time, winter approaching, Cæsar retired to Insubria, that he might be within reach of the capital. He was afraid lest Pompey, who was no longer attached to him by ties of blood, or by the regard he had for Crassus, should gain such a superiority over him, as it would not be easy for him to conquer. To prevent this, he sent immense sums to Rome to be distributed by his agents among the populace, paid the debts of some, lent money to others without interest; and in short, after having conquered the Gauls, as one of the antients expresses it, with the Roman steel, subdued the Romans with the Gaulish gold. But he had not been long in Insubria, when news was brought him, that the Gauls had taken up arms in his absence, that they had made Vercingetorix, a young and brave prince, their generalissimo, and that almost all the nations bordering on the ocean had joined in the revolt. Hereupon the proconsul repassed the Alps, flew with incredible expedition to Narbonne, from thence through deep snows to the country of the Nervii, where he gathered together his scattered troops, and then laid siege to Noviodunum, a city of the Bituriges, which brought Vercingetorix to its defence. But he was defeated and obliged to retire. Cæsar, having made himself master of Noviodunum, led his troops against Avaricum, now Bourges, one of the strongest cities in Gaul; took it by storm, notwithstanding the a the vigorous resistance of the garison, and made such a slaughter of the Gaulish troops, that of forty thousand men scarce eight hundred escaped. His next attempt was on Gergovia, the capital of the Arverni, which he besieged in sight of Vercingetorix. But, while he was pursuing the siege, he received advice, that the Nitbiobriges, now the people of Agenois, had revolted, and that some of the chief men among the Ædui had formed a treacherous scheme of carrying off to Vercingetorix ten thousand men, whom they were to send to the Romans. Upon this advice, Cæsar, leaving Fabius to guard his camp before Gergovia, went to meet the Ædui, who begged for mercy, and were incorporated among the Roman auxiliaries. But soon after the whole nation of the Ædui shook off the Roman yoke, and murdered all the Italians in their capital.

b This made Cæsar uncertain what measures to pursue. At length he resolved to attack the enemy's camp, which he did with good success, till his men, contrary to his orders, abandoning the attack of the camp, fell unexpectedly on the town in hopes of surprising it. But Vercingetorix defended it so effectually, that Cæsar, after the loss of seven hundred men, was forced to raise the siege. From thence he hastened to No- viodunum, where he had left his military chest, baggage, and provisions; but the revolted Ædui had seized all and set fire to the city. Then Cæsar, resolving to join, if possible, his lieutenant Labienus, marched to Agendicum, now Sens, and at the same time Labienus, upon a report of Cæsar's distress, hastened to the same place; and conducted his march through the enemy's country with great skill and dexterity. Ca- mulogenus, a Gaulish general, attacked him with great courage; but the Roman defeated him, reached Agendicum, where he had left his heavy baggage, and from thence went to meet Cæsar. Notwithstanding this defeat, almost all the nations of Celtic Gaul joined in the revolt; and, having appointed Vercingetorix their generalissimo, had the resolution to come and attack Cæsar, who defeated them, and obliged them to retreat to Alesia, a town of the Mandubii, now, as is commonly believed, Alise in Burgundy. Cæsar pursued them, and laid siege to the place. As it was very advantageously situated, Vercingetorix, after he had sent messengers into all parts to raise new forces, shut himself up in it with eighty thousand men. Cæsar immediately invested the place, surrounded it with a double circumvallation, and fortified his camp with all possible art and care, intending to reduce the enemy by famine. As the garison was very numerous, they were soon reduced to great distress for want of provisions; and then Vercingetorix drove out of the city all the useless mouths; but Cæsar, refusing to accept of their surrender, inhumanly suffered them to perish within the circumvallation. At length the desired succours arrived to the number of a hundred and sixty thousand men, under four Gaulish generals, the chief of whom was Comius, prince of the Atrebates, on whom Cæsar had bestowed many favours. They made several attacks on Cæsar's trenches, and fought three battles; but being always defeated and repulsed with great loss, Vercingetorix, despairing of success, surrendered at discretion. Cæsar reduced all the Gauls in the place to slavery, except the Arverni and the Ædui, whom he spared, hoping to gain over the two chief nations of Celtic Gaul by the distinction he shewed them. His expectations were not frustrated; the Arverni immediately submitted, and the Ædui received him into their capital, where he spent the winter in tranquillity, after he had placed his army in different quarters to keep the provinces in awe. Thus ended a campaign, in which Cæsar gained more glory, for his conduct as general and his bravery as a soldier, than any Roman commander had ever done before him. ¹ At Rome twenty days of public prayers were ordered, to return thanks to the gods for this extraordinary success.

f At Rome, Pompey, to strengthen himself with a new alliance, married Cornelia, the daughter of Cæcilius Metellus, a senator of great interest and highly esteemed by the patricians. As Cæsar was greatly beloved by the people, Pompey now made it his whole business to establish his interest among the nobility. With this view he associated his father-in-law with him in the consulate, though that dignity had been conferred on him without a colleague; which moderation gained him the affection of the senate. When the time came for the electing of new consuls, Cato, actuated only by a zeal for the public good, appeared among the candidates; but the tribes preferred to him Claudius Marcellus and Sulpicius Rufus, who were both in Pompey's interest. During their administration, Cicero was obliged to exchange the robe for the sword, in virtue of a law made by Pompey during his late consulship, which required all those who had been been consuls or prætors for some years, to repair to such provinces as should fall to their lot, and exercise there their respective offices of proconsuls and proprætors. Cilicia and the island of Cyprus fell to Cicero's lot, who immediately imbarqued at Brundisium with two legions, and arriving in Cilicia, incamped near Iconium, where he was informed by Antiochus, king of Comagene, that the Parthians had passed the Euphrates. Upon this, Cicero, crossing Cappadocia, came to Cybistra, in the straits of mount Taurus, in order to prevent the enemy from making incursions into his province. Upon his arrival he received certain advice, that the Parthians were assembling about mount Amanus. Hereupon he hastened thither, surprized the enemy, made a great slaughter of them, and recovered many castles which they had seized. But what gained him most glory was, the taking of Pindenissum, a strong town in Cilicia, which he reduced after a siege of fifty-seven days. In short, though he was more of an orator than a soldier, he supported his character in this new employment with great dignity, and performed such military exploits as induced his soldiers to salute him imperator^m. His brother Quintus Cicero, who attended him in this expedition, and had served in Gaul under Cæsar with great reputation, had, no doubt, his share in the glory of this campaign.

IN the mean time, Cæsar spent the winter at Bibraëte, the capital of the Ædui, his cares being divided between the important business he had to transact at Rome, and the necessary preparations for finishing the war with the Gauls the next campaign. At Rome his party prevailed in the comitium, and the people, whom he had artfully gained by his bounties, openly declared for him. But the senate seemed to favour Pompey's interest more than his. The consul Marcellus, who was intirely and blindly devoted to Pompey, proposed in the senate the recalling of Cæsar before his time expired; and because this motion was rejected, he did all that lay in his power to disgrace and expose the proconsul of Gaul. Among other things, he ordered a senator of Novocomum, which Cæsar had declared a Roman colony and presented with the freedom of Rome, to be whipt, telling him, that he laid that mark upon him to let him know he was no citizen of Rome, and bidding him, when he went back, shew his shoulders to Cæsar. Soon after Cæsar moved the senate for the prolongation of his proconsulate; but, as Pompey and his agent Marcellus had a much greater ascendant over the conscript fathers, his request was rejected. When news of this refusal was brought him into Gaul, he is said to have clapt his hand on his sword, crying out in the presence of his officers, What Pompey refuses me, this shall give me. Plutarch puts these words in the mouth of an officer, whom Cæsar had sent to Rome, and who waited for the result of the debate at the door of the senate-houseⁿ.

Subdues the Bituriges, Carnutes, &c.

THE proceedings of the Roman senate engaged Cæsar to use all possible expedition in putting the last hand to his conquest. The Gauls, after the battle of Alésia, resolved to act separately, and raise, in defence of the poor remains of their liberty, as many different armies as they had provinces. This Cæsar knew, and notwithstanding the rigor of the season, he marched against, and successively subdued, the Bituriges, Carnutes, and Rhemi. He then turned towards the country of the Bellovaci, whom he defeated in a pitched battle, killed Correus, one of their chief commanders, and by this single victory quieted all Belgic, and the provinces bordering on Celtic Gaul. After this he entered the country of the Eburones and laid it waste, while Labienus did the same in the country of the Treviri. In the mean time Dumnarus, general of the revolted Andes, besieged Limonum, now Poitiers, in the country of the Pictones; but Caninius and Fabius, two of Cæsar's lieutenants, advancing to the relief of the place, Dumnarus raised the siege in order to return into his own country. Fabius pursued him, and, coming up with him, defeated his army, killed twelve thousand of them on the spot, and, having dispersed the rest, entered the territories of the Carnutes, and subdued both them and the nations bordering on the ocean, whom Cæsar calls Armorici. And now the only Gaulish generals, who kept the field, were Drapes the Senonian and Luterius the Cadurcean, who retired to a strong place called Uxellodunum (E). Thither

(E) Sanfon takes Uxellodunum for Cabors in Quercy; wherein he seems to be mistaken, since the ancients give Cabors the name of Devona, Dibona, and Divona. Besides, Hirtius, in his continuation of Cæsar's commentaries, places Uxellodunum on the confines of Quercy, whereas Cabors was, according to all the modern geographers, in the centre of that province. Whence father Briet and Cellarius are of opinion, that the ancient city of Uxellodunum stood near Usseldun, or, as others call it, Usselon, near the borders of Limousin.

Thither Caninius followed them, and defeated the two generals; but as the place was well garisoned and stored with provisions, he could not reduce it. As it was the only city which now held out, Cæsar hastened thither from the farthest parts of Belgic Gaul; and having soon reduced the place by depriving it of water, he cut off the right hands of all those who were fit to bear arms, to terrify other cities from the like revolt. And now Cæsar, having subdued all Gaul from the Pyrenees and Alps to the Rhine, reduced his conquests to a Roman province under the government of a prætor. During his several expeditions into Gaul, he is said to have taken eight hundred cities, to have subdued three hundred different nations, and to have defeated in several battles three millions of men, of which one million were killed and another taken prisoners; circumstances which would seem greatly magnified, were they not vouched by Plutarch and other unexceptionable historians, both Greek and Roman.

AFTER Cæsar had put his troops into different quarters, in order to preserve peace in all parts of Gaul, he went to spend the winter at Nemetocenna in the centre of Belgium. There he governed the vast continent he had subdued, with such mildness and prudence, as shewed him equally qualified to preside over nations and to command armies. In the mean time, Pompey got two of Cæsar's most avowed enemies, Claudius Marcellus and Æmilius Paulus, promoted to the consulship, and Scribonius Curio, another of his creatures, put at the head of the tribunes. Curio was a young patrician of extraordinary talents and great eloquence, but one of the most vicious and debauched young men in Rome. His father, who had been distinguished by a consulate and a triumph, had given him a great example; but the son only abused the gifts of nature and fortune. We are told, that young as he was, he had contracted debts to the amount of six hundred thousand great sesterces, that is, 4,843,750 l. sterling. Appius Clodius Pulcher, who was generally thought an enemy to Cæsar, and Calpurnius Piso, were chosen censors. So that of all the chief magistrates, Calpurnius, Cæsar's father-in-law, was the only one on whom he could depend; but neither his character nor his office were such at present as gave him any great weight. His colleague was indeed more bold; he degraded several of the Roman knights and senators, and among the rest Sallust the historian, whose enormous debauchery was branded with infamy. The two censors took the last census under the republic, in which they computed three hundred and twenty thousand citizens fit to bear arms, and ended it with a lustrum.

SUCH was the state of affairs at Rome when Cæsar, after having spent the winter in Transalpine Gaul, repassed the mountains, in order to observe more narrowly the steps which Pompey and his enemies were taking against him at Rome. During his stay in Cisalpine Gaul, he was informed, that the two consuls had sworn his destruction; and that, to compass it with more ease, the tribune Curio was preparing a law, depriving him of his government and of the command of the army in Gaul. But, in a few days, he overturned all the schemes, which his competitor had been forming against him for several years. The riches he had heaped up in Gaul were immense. He had indeed distributed vast sums among persons of all ranks, and even among the slaves at Rome; but he had still reserved vast treasures for himself. With these he endeavoured to draw off from Pompey those very friends whom he had raised to the magistracy. Marcellus was proof against all temptation; but his colleague Æmilius Paulus was bought at the price of fifteen hundred talents, that is, 310625 l. sterling. With this money he built that stately edifice, which was afterwards called the Basilica of Paulus. As the tribune Curio was over-run with debts and devoted to his pleasures, Cæsar, by enabling him to satisfy his creditors and plentifully supplying him with money for his debaucheries, secured him in his interest. Nevertheless Curio did not discover at once the change which Cæsar's money had wrought in him, but gradually and with circumspection. Pompey continued to repose an intire confidence in him, and was continually pressing him to propose his law for the recalling of Cæsar. But the crafty tribune postponed it, from month to month, under frivolous pretences; and when he was at length forced to act, Cæsar's last year being near expired, he found means to do Cæsar the most important service without declaring for him. He made a motion both to the senate and people, that they would either continue both generals in their commands, or reduce both, and left it to them to take their choice. The tribune foresaw, that Pompey would never consent to lay down the government of Spain, or part with the command of the army ; and therefore made this motion, that Cæsar might draw from Pompey's refusal a pretence for continuing himself in his province at the head of his troops. Cornelius Scipio, one of Pompey's friends, remonstrated, that in the present case a great difference was to be made between the proconsul of Spain and the proconsul of Gaul, since the term of the former was not yet expired, whereas that of the latter was. To this Curio replied, that in the present crisis, when the republic was in a manner subject to two absolute sovereigns, there was no medium. Both ought to be discharged, said he, or both continued in their office. Who-ever continues alone in arms, will become the tyrant of Rome. If they continue both armed, the power of the one will balance that of the other ; and we shall be secured by their mutual fears. The senate were for recalling Cæsar and continuing Pompey in his office ; but the people were inclined to favour Curio's motion. Pompey himself, being greatly embarrassed, left Rome, under pretence of going to his government ; but went no farther than to a country-house at a small distance from Rome, whence he wrote a very artful letter to the senate, acquainting them, that he was ready to resign all his employments and disband his army, provided Cæsar did the same. Curio, well apprised that Pompey's view was to induce the senate to recall Cæsar, told Pompey, on his return to Rome that it was his duty to begin what he proposed, and assured him, that his example would be followed by Cæsar. Pompey insisted upon Cæsar's resigning the first, since his term was expired. Whereupon Curio proposed, that both should be ordered to lay down their commissions, and declared enemies to the republic, if they refused to comply with the order. The fathers all inclined to recall both rivals ; but were for obliging Cæsar to resign the command of his army before Pompey gave up his. Whereupon Curio, who represented the people at the head of the tribunes, would not suffer them to deliberate any longer about the dismissal of either. Then they only decreed, that one legion out of each army should be sent into Syria, where Bibulus wanted a reinforcement against the Parthians. Pompey at the same time demanded of Cæsar the legion which he had formerly lent him. Cæsar knew the reason of this order and of Pompey's design, which was to weaken his army ; but nevertheless he delivered up the two legions to Appius Clodius, whom the senate had sent to receive them and conduct them into Italy. Cæsar, on their quitting his army, loaded the officers with presents, and gave each private man two hundred and fifty drachmas, that is, about five pounds of our money. When the two legions arrived in Italy, instead of being sent into the east, they were both, by an order from the consul Marcellus, added to Pompey's troops. Cicero at this time returned to Rome from his government of Cilicia, and demanded a triumph for his victory over the Parthians. His absence had prevented him from joining either party, and his present pretensions obliged him to stand neuter. He therefore took upon him the office of mediator ; but Pompey would now hearken to no terms of accommodation ; Appius having, on his return from Gaul, to flatter Pompey's ambition, spread abroad, that Cæsar's troops were dissatisfied with their general, for having engaged them in so many dangerous expeditions ; that they suspected him of aiming at absolute authority ; and therefore, on their first entering Italy, would all to a man declare for him and the senate. This false representation gave Pompey great confidence, and made him neglect the necessary preparations to oppose so powerful a rival. Cicero, amazed to find him deaf to all terms of accommodation, and at the same time neglecting to strengthen his army with new levies, asked him, with what forces he designed to make head against Cæsar ? To this Pompey proudly answered, that he needed but stamp with his foot, and an army would start out of the ground. He spoke with so much confidence, because he flattered himself, that, in case of an open rupture, Cæsar's army would abandon him. In the mean time, Pompey having got two of his friends, Clodius Marcellus and Cornelius Lentulus, chosen to the consulate, Cæsar, before they entered upon their offices, wrote to the senate, desiring them to continue him in his government, as they had continued Pompey. But his request being rejected, he repassed the Alps with the third legion, and advanced to Ravenna, whence he wrote a letter to the new consuls, wherein, after an honourable mention of his conquests and exploits, he declared, that he was willing to resign all his power, provided Pompey did the same. Hereupon warm debates arose in the senate ; but it was at length almost unanimously decreed, that Cæsar should give up his government and the command of the army ; and that he should be treated as an enemy to his country, if he did not, within a limited time, comply with this decree. Cassius Longinus, Marc Antony, and Curio, three of the tribunes, a tribunes, protested against the proceedings of the senate. But the consuls, having first attempted in vain to make them desist from their opposition, drove them out of the senate with disgrace. Cæsar, informed of all these transactions, that he might have the appearance of justice on his side, wrote again to the senate with a great deal of temper, desiring, that since they were determined to deprive him of his government of Gaul and the command of the army, they would at least continue him in the government of Illyricum and allow him two legions. It is probable, he would never have made these proposals, if he had believed the senate would have complied with them. But he was well apprised, that the opposite faction had resolved to reduce him to the state of a private person. He therefore affected a great deal of moderation, b though he was all the while determined, neither to part with the command of the army, nor his government. At length the three tribunes, his friends, not thinking themselves any longer safe in Rome, where the consuls threatened to degrade them, retired in the night in the disguise of slaves to take shelter in Cæsar's camp at Ravenna. Upon their departure, the fatal decree was issued, which put the republic in a flame, and brought it to its destruction : Let the consuls for the year, the proconsul Pompey, the prætors, and all those in or near Rome, who have been consuls, provide for the public safety by the most proper means. This was proclaiming war. So that two powerful parties were seen to take up arms, both pretending to have nothing in view but the defence of their common laws and liberty, while their chiefs aimed only at establishing their own power and authority on the ruins of that liberty, which they affected c to defend. Pompey's party had a more specious outside : he covered his designs with the awful name of the commonwealth, which acknowledged him for her general, and the whole senate with the consuls followed his ensigns. On the other hand, the people and their tribunes were with Cæsar ; so that in reality the two legislative powers were divided between these two mighty rivals. The above-mentioned decree was no sooner passed, than the consul Marcellus went with his colleague Lentulus a little way out of town to a house, where Pompey then was ; and presenting him with a sword, We require you, said he, speaking in the name of both, to take upon you with this the defence of the republic and the command of her troops. Pompey declared he would obey their d orders ; adding with a feigned modesty, Unless a more happy expedient be first found out. By the same decree, which deprived Cæsar of his government and the command of the army, Lucius Domitius was appointed to succeed him, and impowered to raise four thousand new levies to enable him to take possession of his government ².

AFTER the senate had taken this fatal resolution against Cæsar, they met daily to consult about the most proper measures for carrying on the war, in case Cæsar refused to comply with their decree. Pompey lodged in the suburbs, not being allowed as general to enter the city ; and there the senate assembled to hold their consultations. They first considered what name they should give the enterprize, and determined to call it a tumult, which was ranking it among those sudden commotions which are e raised and suppressed in an instant. So that Rome either did not know, or did not dread, the enemy she was bringing on herself. In the next place, they ordered Pompey to assemble thirty thousand Roman troops, and take into the service as many foreign forces as he should think proper. Levies were made accordingly in all haste, and money taken out of the public treasury to defray the expences of one campaign. As for Pompey, he was wholly intent on appointing such governors for the provinces as were most firmly attached to him. He gave Syria to Cæcilius Metellus Scipio, his father-in-law, who immediately set out with young Pompey to assemble a fleet on the coast of Asia. L. Domitius Ahenobarbus was nominated to succeed Cæsar, pursuant to the decree of the senate, in the government of Transalpine Gaul ; but he imprudently shut himself up in Corfinium before he left Italy. Cato was appointed proprætor of Sicily, Cotta of Sardinia, and L. Ælius Tubero of Africa. M. Calpurnius Bibulus and Cicero were charged to guard the coasts of Italy. The other provinces, viz. Pontus, Bithynia, Cyprus, Cilicia, Macedon, &c. were all bestowed on Pompey's friends, who from this time assumed the character of generalissimo of the republic, and governed with as absolute a sway as if he had been king of Rome ³.

f IN the mean time, the three tribunes, Curio, Antony, and Longinus, who had been driven from Rome, arriving in Cæsar's camp, disguised like slaves, he shewed them in that condition to the legion he had then with him, exaggerating the violence which had had been offered them by the senate, and the unwarrantable steps the patricians had taken against himself; in the close of his speech, he exhorted his men to defend the honour and character of their general, under whom they had made war with success for nine years together. When he had done speaking, they all cried out, that they were ready to maintain the rights of their general and of the tribunes of the people, and revenge the injuries which had been done them. When he found he could depend on his soldiers, he resolved to begin hostilities without delay, and, entering Italy properly so called, to make himself master of Ariminum, a city bordering on Cisalpine Gaul, which was part of his province. As this was a bold step, and an open declaration of war, he carefully concealed his design, and sent a detachment towards the Rubicon, ordering the officer, who commanded it, to wait for him on the banks of that river. The next day he assisted at a shew of gladiators, and made a great entertainment. Towards the close of the day he rose from table, desiring his guests to stay till he came back, which, he said, would be very soon. But, instead of returning to the company, he immediately left Ravenna, where he then was, after he had ordered some of his most intimate friends to follow him, through different roads, to avoid being observed. He himself travelled in a hired chariot, and drove first another way, but at some distance from the town turned towards Ariminum. When he reached the banks of the Rubicon, which parted Cisalpine Gaul, his province, from Italy, all the misfortunes of the succeeding war offered themselves to his mind, and kept him some time in suspense. He often changed his opinion without speaking a word, being one minute determined to cross the river, and another to go back, computing with himself how many calamities his passing it would bring upon the republic, and what an account of it would be transmitted to posterity. As he had been brought up in the bosom of a commonwealth, he could not look on the approaching ruin of his country without concern; and therefore turning to Asinius Pollio, If I do not cross the river, said he, I am undone; and, if I do cross it, how many calamities shall I by this step bring upon Rome! Having thus spoke he mused a few minutes on the hatred and inveteracy of his enemies, and then crying out, The die is cast, he threw himself into the river, and, crossing it, marched with all possible expedition towards Ariminum, which he reached and surprised before day-break (F). From thence, as he had but one legion with him, he immediately dispatched orders to the great army he had left in Gaul to cross the mountains, and join him^r.

It is impossible to express the terror and fear all Italy and Rome herself was in, upon the unexpected news of this enterprise. They imagined this renowned commander already at the gates of the city, with the formidable army he commanded in Gaul. Nothing was seen but terror and confusion, the country people crowding into the city for safety, and the citizens flying into the country. The senate met several times without coming to any resolution. Several senators, without proposing any thing themselves, only contradicted the advice of others. Pompey himself was no less alarmed than the other senators; as he had not yet drawn together his troops, who were quartered in different provinces at some distance from the capital, he was no-ways in a condition to make head against Cæsar. But nothing gave him greater uneasiness, than the reproaches which many of his own party threw out against him, some charging him with indiscretion in arming Cæsar against himself and the government, and others blaming him for having neglected the necessary preparations. M. Favonius, alluding to the rhodomontade mentioned above, desired him to stamp with his foot, and make armies start up, as he had promised. Every senator thought himself privileged to reproach and advise him. In this confusion, Pompey, seeing himself in Rome without troops, and fearing, if he should arm the people, they would declare against him, resolved to retire to Capua, where the two legions were encamped which Cæsar had surrendered to Appius. He communicated his design to the senate, and from whom the unknown man snatched his instrument, and sounding the charge, threw himself into the river, and crossed it. Hereupon Cæsar, without further consideration, followed him, crying aloud, Let us go whither the gods calls us, and the fury of our enemies drives us; the die is cast.

a at the same time declared, that if any senator or magistrate refused to follow him, he should be treated as a friend to Cæsar, and an enemy to his country. Upon this declaration the consuls, the senators, and all the magistrates, left Rome in great haste, and attended Pompey into Campania ¹. Pompey abandons Rome.

In the mean time, Cæsar, having raised new troops in Cisalpine Gaul, sent Marc Antony with a detachment to seize Aretium, and other officers to secure Pisaurum and Fanum, while he himself marched at the head of the thirteenth legion to Auximum, which opened its gates to him. From Auximum he advanced into Picenum, where he was joined by the twelfth legion from Transalpine Gaul. As Picenum readily submitted to him, he led his forces against Corfinium, the capital of the Peligni, which

b Domitius Abenobarbus defended with thirty Cohorts. But Cæsar no sooner invested it, than the garison betrayed their commander, and delivered him up with many senators, who had taken refuge in the place, to Cæsar, who, to shew his great moderation in the midst of victory, granted them their lives and liberty (G). Domitius, fearing the resentment of the conqueror, had ordered one of his slaves, whom he used as a physician, to give him a dose of poison. When he came to experience the humanity of the conqueror, he lamented his misfortune, and blamed the hastiness of his own resolution. But his physician, who had only given him a sleeping draught, comforted him, and received his liberty, as a reward for his affection ¹. Pompey, thinking himself no longer safe at Capua, after the reduction of Corfinium, retired to Brundisium, with a design to carry the war into the east, where all the governors were his creatures. Cæsar followed him close cross Apulia, and arriving with his army before Brundisium, invested the place on the land-side, and undertook to shut up the port by a staccado of his own invention. But before the work was completed, the fleet, which had conveyed the two consuls with thirty cohorts to Dyrrachium, now Durazzo, being returned, Pompey resolved to make his escape, which he conducted with all the experience and dexterity of a great officer. He kept his departure very secret; but at the same time made all necessary preparations for the facilitating of it. In the first place he walled up the gates, then dug deep and wide ditches cross all the streets, except only those two that led to the port; in the ditches he planted sharp-pointed stakes, covering them with hurdles and earth. After these precautions, he gave express orders that all the citizens should keep within doors, lest they should betray his design to the enemy, and then in the space of three days imbarqued all his troops, except the light-armed infantry, whom he had placed on the walls; and these likewise, on a signal given, abandoning their posts, repaired with great expedition to the ships. Cæsar, perceiving the walls unguarded, ordered his men to scale them and make what haste they could after the enemy. In the heat of the pursuit, they would have fallen into the ditches, which Pompey had prepared for them, had not the Brundisians ². Takes Corfinium.

(G) Domitius, as soon as Corfinium was invested, found means to convey a letter to Pompey, wherein he pressed him to march directly to the defence of a place of such importance. Lose no time, said he, but lay hold of the favourable opportunity which fortune now offers you of surrounding Cæsar. If you make haste, the war will be at an end. Consider, your credit is at stake. You cannot in honour reject the request of the many senators and Roman knights, who are shut up in this place. They have recourse to you, as to their deliverer, and take it for granted, that you will not abandon thirty-three cohorts of the best of your troops to the mercy of the enemy, who hastens to his own destruction. But Pompey's answer was very different from what Domitius expected: He told him, that he could not in his present situation hazard a battle, the loss of which would infallibly bring with it the ruin of the republic. He reproached him with having undertaken the defence of Corfinium, and shut himself up in that place contrary to his opinion. He advised him to abandon the place, and join the consular army, with all possible expedition. But as this was not now in his power, he prepared to sustain a siege, provided his machines, assigned his troops their posts, and, in order to encourage them, promised each soldier four acres of land. Cæsar, on the other hand, provided his camp with all things necessary for a siege; and in the mean time, the eighth legion joined him with twenty cohorts of Gauls and three hundred German horse. For these he formed a new camp, and appointed Curio to command in it. Domitius, though he expected no succours, did all that lay in his power to persuade his men, that all the forces of the republic were marching to his relief. But a report being spread, that he designed to escape privately, they mutinied, ran to his quarters, and, having seized him, opened the gates to the enemy. As this tumult happened in the night, Cæsar, lest the darkness should encourage his men to plunder and commit violences, deferred entering the town till the next morning. At break of day Lentulus Spinther, one of the senators who were shut up in the place, waited on Cæsar, who received him with great marks of friendship, which induced the others to submit and surrender the place at discretion. Cæsar not only gave Domitius his liberty, but restored to him the money which he had taken out of the treasury for the paying of his troops, and was lodged in the hands of the magistrates of Corfinium.

sians warned them of the danger, and by many windings and turnings led them to the haven, where they found all the fleet under sail, except two vessels, which had run a-ground in going out of the harbour. These Cæsar seized, took the soldiers on board prisoners, and brought them ashore. Cæsar, seeing himself by the flight of his rival master of all Italy from the Alps to the sea, was desirous to follow and attack him, before he was joined by the supplies which he expected from Asia. But being destitute of shipping, he resolved to go first to Rome and settle some sort of government there, and then pass into Spain to drive from thence Pompey's troops, who had taken possession of that great continent under the command of Afranius and Petreius. Before he left Brundisium he sent Scribonius Curio with three legions into Sicily, and ordered Q. Valerius, one of his lieutenants, to get together what ships he could, and cross over with one legion into Sardinia. Cato, who commanded in Sicily, upon the first news of Curio's landing there, abandoned the Island, and retired to the camp of the consuls at Dyrrachium: and Q. Valerius no sooner appeared with his small fleet off Sardinia, than the Caralitani, now the inhabitants of Cagliari, drove out Aurelius Cotta, who commanded there for the senate, and put Cæsar's lieutenant in possession both of their city and island. In the mean time, the general himself advanced towards Rome, and that with the more confidence, because he had made himself master of all Italy, without shedding one drop of blood. On his march he wrote to all the senators then in Italy, desiring them to repair to the capital, and assist him there with their counsel. Above all, he was desirous to see Cicero; and therefore, after having pressed him in vain by Oppilus and Cælius, their common friends, to come and meet him, he turned out of the road, and went to his country house, where he had a long conference with him, but could not prevail upon him to return to Rome (H). As Cæsar drew near the capital, he quartered his troops in the neighbouring municipia; and then advancing to the city, out of a pretended respect to the ancient customs, he took up his quarters in the suburbs, whither the whole city crowded to see the famous conqueror of Gaul, who had been absent from Rome near ten years. And now such of the tribunes of the people as had fled to him for refuge, reassumed their functions, mounted the rostra, and endeavoured by their speeches to reconcile the people to the head of their party. Marc Antony particularly and Cassius Longinus, two of Cæsar's most zealous partizans, moved, that the senate should meet in the suburbs, that the general might give them an account of his conduct. Accordingly, such of the senators as were at Rome assembled, when Cæsar, with that dignity and eloquence, which were natural to him, made a speech in justification of all his proceedings, encouraged the timorous, gave great hopes to the wavering, and concluded his harangue with proposing a deputation to Pompey, with offers of an accommodation in an amicable manner. He even desired the conscript fathers, to whom in appearance he paid great deference, to nominate some of their venerable body to carry proposals of peace to the consuls and the general of the consular army. But not one of the senators would take upon him that commission, some being afraid of Pompey, who had declared all those enemies who should stand neuter, and others plainly seeing that Cæsar did not mean what he said (I). He then began to think of providing himself with the necessary

(H) In this conference Cæsar earnestly pressed Cicero to return to the capital. I have seen Cæsar, says he, in one of his letters to Atticus (28). who earnestly pressed me to return to Rome; but I withstood his desire. He looked upon my absence as a tacit condemnation of his proceedings against Pompey, and is persuaded, that most of the senators are induced to retire into the country by my example. Cæsar, in order to prevail upon Cicero to come to Rome, told him, that he had nothing else in view, but to employ him in bringing about a lasting accommodation between him and Pompey. To this Cicero replied, that he would readily attend him to the capital, upon condition, that he should be at full liberty to declare his opinion concerning the present state of affairs. But Cæsar not liking this condition, You must not then take it amiss, replied Cicero, that I persist, in my resolution of not going to Rome; if I am not allowed to speak my mind, I ought not to appear in the senate.

Cæsar, little satisfied with this answer, took his leave of Cicero, after having intreated him in a friendly manner not to take any step in so nice an affair, without mature deliberation.

(I) Cæsar tells us, that he attempted several times to make up matters with Pompey in an amicable manner. On his march to Brundisium he sent Gn. Magius, one of Pompey's chief officers, whom he had taken prisoner, to invite his rival to an interview. But, as the consuls had already set sail for Dyrrachium, Pompey answered, that he could do nothing in their absence. In the first days of the siege he attempted once more to draw Pompey to a conference, and with this view sent Caminius Rebilius, one of the chief officers of his army, to mediate an accommodation, together with P. Scribonius Libo, Pompey's particular friend. But he returned the same answer, viz. that he could not come to an agreement in the absence of the consuls. Cæsar in his

- a necessary sum for the carrying on of the war, and had recourse to the public treasury. But Metellus, one of the tribunes, opposed him, alledging a law, forbidding any one to open the treasury, but in the presence, and with the consent, of the consuls. To which Cæsar replied, Arms and laws do not well agree; when I shall have laid down my arms, then I will hearken to laws, and let you make as long harangues as you please; but at present I advise you to retire. Having thus spoke, he went directly to the temple of Saturn, where the public money was kept. But the keys of the treasury having been carried away by the consul Lentulus, he ordered the doors to be broke open. This Metellus opposed, and then Cæsar, in a passion laying his hand on his sword, threatened to kill him, if he gave him any further disturbance, adding, This you know, young man, is harder for me to say, than to do. These words so terrified Metellus, that he withdrew; and then Cæsar took out of the treasury, which was ever after at his command, an immense sum, some say three hundred thousand pounds weight of gold. With this supply of money he raised troops all over Italy, and sent governors into all the provinces subject to the republic. He made Marc Antony commander in chief of the armies in Italy, sent his brother C. Antonius to govern Illyricum, assigned Cisalpine Gaul to Licinius Crassus, appointed M. Æmilius Lepidus governor of the capital, and having got together some ships to cruise in the Adriatic and Mediterranean seas, he gave the command of one of his fleets to P. Cornelius Dolabella, and of the other to young Hortensius, the son of the famous orator. As Pompey had sent governors into the same provinces, by this means a general war was kindled in all the parts of the known world. However, Cæsar would not trust any of his lieutenants with the conduct of the war in Spain, which was Pompey's favourite province, but took it upon himself; and, having settled his affairs in great haste at Rome, returned to Ariminum, assembled his legions there, and, passing the Alps, entered Transalpine Gaul. There he was informed, that the inhabitants of Marseilles had resolved to refuse him entrance into their city, and that L. Domitius Abenobarbus, whom he had generously pardoned and set at liberty after the reduction of Corfinium, had set sail for Marseilles with seven gallies, having on board a great number of his clients and slaves, with a design to raise the city in favour of Pompey. Cæsar, thinking it dangerous to let the enemy take possession of such an important place, sent for the fifteen chief magistrates of the city, and advised them not to begin a war with him, but rather follow the example of Italy and submit. The magistrates returned to the city, and soon after sent Cæsar the following answer: since the Roman people are divided into two parties, we will not take upon us to determine on which side the right lies. We have great obligations, and an equal affection for both competitors; they are both our patrons, both our benefactors; and therefore that we may not help one against the other, our port and the gates of our city shall be shut to both. In the mean time, Domitius arriving with his small squadron was received into the city, and declared general of all their forces. Hereupon Cæsar, justly provoked at such unfair dealings, immediately inc vested the town with three legions, and ordered twelve gallies to be built at Arelas, now Arles, in order to block up the port. But as the siege was like to detain him too long, he left C. Trebonius to carry it on, and D. Brutus to command the fleet, while he continued his march into Spain, where he began the war with all the valour, ability, and success of a great hero. Pompey had three generals in this great continent, which was divided into two Roman provinces. Varro commanded in Further Spain; and Petreius and Afranius, with equal power and two considerable armies, in Hither Spain. Cæsar, while he was yet at Marseilles, sent Q. Fabius, one of his lieutenants, with three legions, to take possession of the passes of the Pyrenees, which Afranius had seized. Fabius executed his commission with great bravery, entered Spain, and left f the way open to Cæsar, who soon followed him. As soon as he had crossed the mountains, he sent out scouts to observe the situation of the enemy; by whom he was informed, that Afranius and Petreius, having joined their forces, consisting of five legions, twenty cohorts of the natives, and five thousand horse, were advantageously posted on a hill of an easy ascent in the neighbourhood of Ilerda, now Lerida in Catalonia. Upon this advice he advanced within sight of the enemy, and incamped in a plain first speech to the senate shewed a great inclination to compose matters in an amicable manner, and desired the conscript fathers to depute some of their body, with proposals of an accommodation, both to Pompey and the consuls. But men of penetration plainly saw, that Cæsar was more averse to any sort of accommodation than Pompey himself, and that he talked of it only to lessen the odium of his proceedings, and throw the whole blame of the war on Pompey and his party.

between the Sicoris and the Cinga, now the Segro and the Cinca. Between the eminence, on which Afranius had posted himself, and the city of Ilerda, was a small plain, and in the middle of it a rising ground, which Cæsar attempted to seize, in order to cut off by that means the communication between the enemy's camp and the city, from whence they had all their provisions. This occasioned a sharp dispute between three of Cæsar's legions and an equal number of the enemy, which lasted five hours with equal success, both parties claiming the victory. But after all, Afranius's men, who had first seized the post, maintained themselves in possession of it in spite of Cæsar's utmost efforts. Two days after this battle continual rains, with the melting of the snow on the mountains, so swelled the two rivers, between which Cæsar was incamped, that they overflowed, broke down his bridges, and laid under water the neighbouring country to a great distance. This cut off the communication between his camp and the cities that had declared for him, and reduced him to such straits, that his army was ready to perish for famine, wheat being sold in his camp at fifty Roman denarii per bushel, that is, 1 l. 12 s. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. sterling. He tried to rebuild his bridges, but in vain, the violence of the stream rendering all his endeavours fruitless ^a.

UPON the news of Cæsar's distress, Pompey's party at Rome began to take courage. Several persons of distinction went to congratulate Afranius's wife on the success of her husband's arms in Spain. Many of the senators, who had hitherto stood neuter, hastened to join Pompey, taking it for granted, that Cæsar was reduced to the last extremity, and all the hopes of his party lost. Of this number was Cicero; who, without any regard to the remonstrances of Atticus, or the letters Cæsar himself wrote to him (K), desiring him to join neither party, left Italy and landed at Dyrrachium, where Pompey received him with great marks of joy and friendship. But Cicero soon repented of the little regard he had paid to the advice of his friends, and could not forgive himself his having too easily given credit to the reports that were brought from Spain. He ever appeared gloomy, thoughtful, and uneasy, and even vented his ill humour in severe jests on Pompey (L). The offensive things he threw out on all occasions, and his unseasonable jests, led some to suspect, that he kept a correspondence with Cæsar. However that be, Pompey would neither trust him with any command, nor impart to him his designs; nay, he went so far as to bid him be gone to Cæsar's camp, where he would have less reason to jest, and more to be afraid. Neither did his old friend Cato give him a very favourable reception. He was displeased at his having so unseasonably declared for a party, which he might have served more effectually, by keeping an exact neutrality. Cicero was so strongly affected with these reproaches, that he left the camp, and did not appear even at the battle of Pharsalia.

Cicero repairs to Pompey's camp.

Reduces all Spain.

BUT the joy of Pompey's party was not long-lived. For Cæsar, after having attempted several times in vain to rebuild his bridges, caused boats to be made with all possible expedition; and while the enemy were diverted by endeavouring to intercept the succours that were sent him from Gaul, he laid hold of that opportunity to convey his boats in the night on carriages twenty-two miles from his camp; where with wonderful quickness a great detachment passed the Sicoris, and, incamping on the opposite bank unknown to the enemy, built a bridge in two days, opened a communication with the neighbouring country, received the supplies from Gaul, and relieved the wants of his soldiers. Cæsar, being thus delivered from all danger, pursued the armies of Afranius and Petreius with such superior address and conduct, that he forced them to submit without coming to a battle, and by that means became master of all Hither Spain. The two generals disbanded their troops, sent them out of the province, and returned themselves to Italy, after having solemnly promised never to assemble forces again, or make war upon Cæsar ^a. Upon the news of the reduction of Hither Spain,

(K) In one of these letters he expresses himself thus: It will not be believed, that the justice of my enemy's cause has induced you to declare against me. Every one will think that you have been displeased at some action of mine, which would most sensibly grieve me. A man of honour, who loves the peace and welfare of his country, ought to avoid taking any side in a civil war. You cannot do better, nor more for your reputation, than to avoid engaging yourself, upon any account whatsoever, in these broils.

(L) Pompey having told him one day, that he had joined the army at Dyrrachium a little too late; How too late? replied Cicero; I do not find your affairs in such forwardness. Another time, when he was told, that seven eagles had been taken in Pompey's camp, and that the augurs looked upon this as a happy omen; it would be very lucky indeed, said he, if we were at war with the magpies.

- a Spain, the Spaniards in Further Spain and one Roman legion deserted from Varro, Pompey's governor in that province, which obliged him to surrender his other legion and all his money. Cæsar, having thus reduced all Spain in a few months, appointed Cassius Longinus to govern the two provinces with four legions, and then returned to Marseilles, which city was then just upon the point of surrendering, after a most vigorous resistance. Though the inhabitants had by their late treachery deserved a severe punishment, yet he granted them their lives and liberty, but stripped their arsenals of their arms, and obliged them to deliver up all their ships. From Marseilles Cæsar marched into Cisalpine Gaul, and from thence hastened to Rome, where he laid the foundations of his future grandeur. He found the city in a very different state from that in which he had left it. Most of the senators and magistrates were fled to Pompey at Dyrrachium. However, there were still prætors there, and among them M. Æmilius Lepidus, who was afterwards one of the triumvirs with Octavius and Marc Antony. The prætor, to ingratiate himself with Cæsar, nominated him dictator, of his own authority and against the inclination of the senate. Cæsar accepted the new dignity, but neither abused his power as Sylla had done, nor retained it so long. During the eleven days he held the dictatorship, he governed with great moderation, and gained the affections both of the people and patricians. He recalled all the exiles, except Milo, who had murdered Clodius. He granted the rights and privileges of Roman citizens to all the Gauls beyond the Po, and, as pontifex maximus, filled up the vacancies of the sacerdotal colleges with his own friends. Though it was expected, that he would have absolutely cancelled all debts contracted since the beginning of the troubles, he only reduced the interest to one fourth. But the chief use he made of his dictatorship was, to preside at the election of consuls for the next year, when he got himself and Servilius Isauricus, one of his most zealous partisans, promoted to that dignity. And now, being resolved to follow Pompey and carry the war into the east, he set out for Brundisium, whither he had ordered twelve legions to repair with all possible expedition. But on his arrival he found only five there. The rest, being afraid of the dangers of the sea and unwilling to engage in a new war, had marched leisurely, complaining of their general for allowing no respite, but hurrying them continually from one country to another. When at last, said they, and where will this Cæsar suffer us to enjoy some quiet? He carries us from place to place, and uses us as if we were not to be tired out, or had no sense of labour. Even our swords, our bucklers, and breast-plates, are worn out. Does not Cæsar gather from our wounds that we are mortal men, and subject to the same calamities and diseases as other mortals are? Such was their discourse as they marched from their quarters to Brundisium; and as their march was slow, they did not arrive at the time appointed. However, Cæsar did not wait for them, but set sail with only five legions and six hundred horse, in the beginning of January. When the legions found he had imbarqued without them, they changed their sentiments, and, looking upon themselves as traitors to their general, blamed their officers for marching so slowly. While they were waiting at Brundisium for ships to transport them over into Epirus, Cæsar arrived safe with his five legions in Chaonia, the northern part of Epirus near the Ceraunian mountains. There he landed his troops, and sent the ships back to Brundisium to bring over the legions that were left behind. The war he was now entering upon was the most difficult he had yet undertaken. Pompey had for a whole year been assembling troops from all the eastern countries. When he left Italy he had only five legions; but, since his arrival at Dyrrachium, he had been reinforced with one from Sicily, another from Crete, and two from Syria. Three thousand archers, six cohorts of slingers, and seven thousand horse had been sent him by princes in alliance with Rome. All the free cities of Asia had reinforced his army with their best troops; nay, if we give credit to an historical poet, succours were brought him from the Indus and the Ganges to the east, and from Arabia and Æthiopia to the south; at least it is certain, that Greece, Asia Minor, Syria, Palestine, Egypt, and all the nations from the Mediterranean to the Euphrates took up arms in his favour. He had almost all the Roman knights, that is, the flower of the young nobility, in his squadrons, and his legions consisted mostly of veterans inured to dangers and the toils of war. Pompey himself was a general of great experience and address, and had under him some of the best commanders of the republic, who had formerly conducted armies themselves. As for his navy, he had above five hundred ships of war, besides a far greater number of small vessels, which were continually cruising on the coasts, and intercepting such ships as carried arms or provisions to the enemy: He had likewise with him above two hundred senators, who formed a more numerous senate than that at Rome. Cornelius Lentulus and Claudius Marcellus, the last year's consuls, presided in it, but under the direction of Pompey their protector, who ordered them to assemble at Theſſalonica, where he built a stately hall for that purpose. There, in one of their assemblies, at the motion of Cato, it was decreed, that no Roman citizen should be put to death but in battle, and that no city subject to the republic should be sacked. At the same time the conscript fathers assembled at Theſſalonica decreed, that they alone represented the Roman senate, and that those, who resided at Rome, were encouragers of tyranny and friends to the tyrant. And indeed, as the flower of the nobility was with Pompey, and the most virtuous men in the republic had taken refuge in his camp, he was generally looked upon as the only hope and support of the public liberty. Hence many persons of eminent probity, who had hitherto stood neuter, flocked to him from all parts. Among these were young Brutus, who afterwards conspired against Cæsar, Tidius Sextius, and Labienus. Brutus, whose father had been put to death in Galatia by Pompey's orders, had never spoke to him, or so much as saluted him since that time. But, as he now looked upon him as the defender of the public liberty, he joined him, sacrificing therein his private resentment to the interest of the public. Pompey received him with great joy, and was willing to confer upon him some command; but he declined the offer, desiring Pompey to bestow such marks of distinction on others, who better deserved them, both in consideration of their age and employments. Tidius Sextius, though extremely old and lame, yet left Rome, and went as far as Macedonia to join Pompey there. Labienus likewise forsook his old benefactor, under whom he had served during the whole course of the Gaulish war, and went over to his rival, though Cæsar had appointed him commander in chief of all the forces on the other side of the Alps (M). In short, Pompey's party grew into such reputation, that his cause was generally called the good cause, while Cæsar's adherents were looked upon as enemies to their country and abettors of tyranny.

BUT to return to Cæsar, as soon as he landed, he marched to Oricum the nearest city to him in Epirus, and made himself master of it without opposition, L. Torquatus, who was governor of the place for Pompey, having abandoned it at his approach. From thence he advanced to Apollonia, which stood on the confines of Macedon. This important place likewise surrendered, as soon as Cæsar appeared before it, Staberius, Pompey's governor, not being in a condition to stand a siege. By these two conquests, Cæsar opened himself a way to Dyrrachium, a city on the confines of Macedon, where Pompey had fixed his magazines of arms and provisions. In the mean time, news was brought to Cæsar, that his fleet, which he had sent back to Brundisium, to transport the rest of his troops, had been attacked by a squadron of Pompey's fleet under the command of Bibulus, who had taken thirty of them, and inhumanly burnt them with the seamen on board. This gave Cæsar great uneasiness, the more because he was at the same time informed, that Bibulus, with a hundred and ten ships of war, had taken possession of all the ports and harbours between Salonium and Oricum; so that the legions at Brundisium could not venture to cross the sea, without manifest danger of falling into the enemy's hands. Hereupon Cæsar, being greatly embarrassed, made new proposals of an accommodation, sending Vibullius Rufus, an intimate friend of Pompey's whom he had twice taken prisoner, viz. at Corfinium and in Spain, to propose to him the following terms; viz. that they should both disband their armies in three days, renew their former friendship with solemn oaths, and return together to Italy. With these proposals Rufus, who was in pain for Dyrrachium, hastened to Pompey's camp, travelling night and day, without allowing himself any rest till he reached it. Upon his arrival he found, that Pompey had not yet received advice of Cæsar's arrival; but he no sooner informed him of the taking of Oricum and Apollonia, than he immediately decamped, and by long marches reached

(M) It seemed very strange, says Dion, that Labienus should abandon Cæsar, who had loaded him with honours, and distinguished him above all others. But he gives this reason for it. Labienus, says he, elated with his immense wealth, and proud of his preferments, forgot himself to such a degree, as to assume a character very unbecoming a person in his circumstances. He was even for putting himself upon an equal foot with Cæsar, who thereupon grew cool towards him, and treated him with some reserve, which Labienus resented, and went over to Pompey.

a reached Dyrrachium before Cæsar, and incamped under the walls of the city. In the mean time, Cæsar was likewise advancing towards Dyrrachium, in hopes of surprising that important place; but, upon the unexpected news of Pompey's arrival, he halted on the other side of the river Apfus, and intrenched himself there, having but a small number of troops with him, if compared with Pompey's formidable army. However, as Pompey durst not cross the river in Cæsar's sight, the two armies continued some time quiet in their respective posts. As to the proposals of an amicable accommodation, Pompey, suspecting Cæsar's sincerity, answered, that he would not hearken to any terms, lest it should be said, that he owed his life and return to Italy to Cæsar's favour. Nevertheless, Cæsar, either to gain time, his troops not being yet arrived, b or to cast all the blame of a civil war on his rival, sent Vatinius to treat with Pompey in his name. Labienus was deputed to receive his proposals. But while they were conferring together, a party of Pompey's men coming up to them, discharged a shower of darts at Vatinius and those who attended him. Some of the centurions of his guard were wounded, and Vatinius himself narrowly escaped with his life ^z.

As Cæsar had not a sufficient force with him to engage the enemy, he wrote letter after letter to Marc Antony, who commanded the legions he had left in Italy, pressing him to hasten their imbarquation. But Antony, either because he wanted transports, or was afraid of the enemy's numerous squadrons, which almost covered the sea, still continued at Brundisium, which filled Cæsar with many uneasy reflections. Sometimes he accused Antony of cowardice, and sometimes suspected him of treachery, as c if he designed to revolt from him and make a third party in the republic. At length his impatience and uneasiness put him upon a bold attempt, which nothing could excuse, but the extraordinary confidence he always had in his good fortune (N). He disguised himself in the habit of a slave, and with all imaginable secrecy went on board a fisherman's bark, which lay in the river Anius, or, as Strabo calls it, Aous, with a design to go over to Brundisium, though the enemy's fleet was cruising on the coasts both of Greece and Italy. The vessel weighed anchor in the beginning of the night, and fell down the river without any difficulty. But it d happened unluckily, that a strong wind from the sea sprung up all on a sudden, so that the rowers, after having struggled a long time in vain with the waves and winds, which continually drove them back into the river, began to despair of getting out to sea. Then Cæsar, who had hitherto never opened his mouth, starting up, discovered himself to the master of the vessel, who was greatly surprised to see him, and taking him by the hand, Go on boldly, my friend, said he, and fear nothing; thou carriest Cæsar and his fortune along with thee. The mariners, encouraged by Cæsar's presence, used extraordinary efforts, and got out to sea; but the storm was so violent, that Cæsar himself, despairing of being able to get to Italy, suffered the pilot to return to the coast, where his soldiers met him, and expressed, with a great deal of tenderness and respect, their concern to see him so uneasy for want of more troops, as if he could not gain a victory with them alone ^z.

e Cæsar was no sooner landed, than he dispatched Posthumus, one of his lieutenants, with most pressing orders to Marc Antony, Gabinus, and Calenus, to bring the troops to him at all adventures. Gabinus, unwilling to expose all the hopes of his general to the hazards of the sea, thought it safer to march a great way about by Illyricum, and therefore engaged all the legionaries he could to follow him by land. But the Illyrians, who had, unknown to him, declared for Pompey, fell unexpectedly upon him, and killed him and his men, not one escaping. Marc Antony and Calenus, who went by sea, were in the greatest danger from one of Pompey's admirals; but had the good luck to bring their troops safe to shore at Nymphæum, in the neighbourhood of Apollonia. As soon as it was known that Antony was landed, Pompey marched to f prevent his joining Cæsar. On the other hand, Cæsar instantly decamped, and hastening to the relief of his lieutenant, joined him before Pompey came up. Then Pompey, not caring to engage them when united, retired to an advantageous post in the neighbourhood

(N) Most historians blame this as a rash action; and he himself in his commentaries makes no mention of this, or of another as dangerous an attempt, which is related by Suetonius. While he was making war in Gaul, upon advice that the Gauls had surrounded his army in his absence, he dressed himself like a native of the country, and in that disguise passed through the enemy's centinels and troops to his own camp.

neighbourhood of Dyrrachium, known by the name of Asparagium, and there incamped. Cæsar, having thus at length got all his troops together, resolved to finish the war by one general action, and determine the fate of the world, either by his own death, or by that of his rival. To this end he offered Pompey battle, and kept his army a great while drawn up in sight of the enemy. But Pompey declining an engagement, he decamped and turned towards Dyrrachium, as if he designed to surprise it, hoping by this means to draw Pompey into the plain. But Pompey, looking upon the taking of Dyrrachium as a chimerical project, followed Cæsar at some distance, and letting him draw near to the city, incamped himself on a hill called Petra, which commanded the sea, whence he could be supplied with provisions from Greece and Asia, while Cæsar was forced to bring corn by land from Epirus, at a vast expence and through many dangers. This inconvenience put Cæsar upon a new design, which was to surround an army far more numerous than his own, and by shutting them up within a narrow tract of ground, distress them as much for want of forage, as his troops were distressed for want of corn. Pursuant to this design, he drew a line of circumvallation from the sea quite round Pompey's camp, and kept him so closely blocked up, that though his men were plentifully supplied with provisions by sea, yet the horses of his army began soon to die in great numbers for want of forage. Cæsar's men, though in the utmost distress for want of corn, yet bore all with incredible cheerfulness, protesting, that they would rather live upon the bark of trees, than suffer Pompey to escape, now they had him in their power (O). At length Pompey, alarmed at the distempers which began to reign in his army, made several attempts to break through the barriers that inclosed him, but was always repulsed with loss. One day Pompey himself attacked one of the enemy's castles; on which occasion M. Cassius Scæva, a soldier of fortune, at that time centurion, distinguished himself in the defence of the castle in a very eminent manner. He withstood the efforts of the enemy almost alone, made a great slaughter of them, and though he was wounded on the head, had lost an eye, and was run quite through the body, yet he maintained the fight, till Sylla, one of Cæsar's lieutenants, brought two legions from the camp to his relief, and then Pompey was forced to retire. This castle was defended by one cohort only of the sixth legion, which held out against the utmost efforts of Pompey at the head of four complete legions. Every soldier of the cohort was wounded, Pompey's men having discharged at them, during the attack, above thirty thousand arrows, of which the brave Cassius received two hundred and thirty on his shield. Cæsar therefore made him a present of two hundred thousand sesterces, raised him to the post of primipilus, or first centurion of the legion, and allotted the whole cohort double pay and double allowance of provisions ever after ^b.

AND now Pompey, being reduced to the utmost extremity for want of forage, and in great danger of losing all his forces, which for some time had had no other provender but leaves of trees, resolved at all events to force the enemy's lines and escape. With the assistance therefore, and by the advice of two deserters (P), he imbarqued his archers, slingers, and light-armed infantry, and, marching himself by land at the head of sixty cohorts, went to attack that part of Cæsar's lines which was next to the sea, and not yet quite finished. He set out from his camp in the dead of the night, and arriving at the post he designed to force by break of day, he began the attack by sea and land at the same time. The ninth legion, which defended that part of the lines, made for some time a vigorous resistance; but being attacked in the rear

(O) Cæsar tells us, that in this extremity such of the army as had been in Sardinia, found out the way of making bread of a certain root called Clæra, which they steeped in milk; and that when the enemy insulted them on account of the starving condition which they were in, they threw several of these loaves among them, to put them out of all hopes of subduing them by famine. So long as the earth produces such roots, said they, we will not let Pompey escape.

(P) These were two brothers Roscillus and Ægus, Allobroges, and men of great distinction in their own country. They commanded the auxiliaries, whom they had brought to the assistance of Cæsar, but defrauded them of their pay, and used them with great rigour, which obliged them to carry their complaints to Cæsar, who thereupon privately reprimanded them. The two chiefs, offended at this disgrace, took what money and horses they could with them, and deserted to Pompey. As they had narrowly observed all Cæsar's circumvallation, and knew the weak parts of it, they directed Pompey in this enterprize, and proved very serviceable to him (29).

a rear by Pompey's men, who came by sea and landed between Cæsar's two lines, they fled with such precipitation, that the succours Marcellinus sent them from a neighbouring post could not stop them. The ensign, who carried the Roman eagle at the head of the routed legion, was mortally wounded; but nevertheless, before he died, had presence of mind enough to consign the eagle to the cavalry of his party, desiring them to deliver it to Cæsar. Pompey's men pursued the fugitives, and made such a slaughter of them, that all the centurions of the first cohort were cut off except one. And now Pompey's army broke in upon the posts Cæsar had fortified, like a torrent, and were advancing to attack Marcellinus, who guarded a neighbouring fort; but Marc Antony coming very seasonably to his relief with twelve cohorts, they thought it adviseable to retire. Soon after Cæsar himself arrived with a strong reinforcement, and posted himself on the shore in order to prevent such-like attempts for the future. From this post he observed an old camp, which he had made within the place where Pompey was inclosed, but afterwards abandoned. Upon his quitting it Pompey had taken possession of it, and left a legion to guard it. This post Cæsar resolved to reduce, hoping to repair the loss he had sustained on this unfortunate day, by taking the legion which Pompey had posted there. Accordingly, he advanced secretly at the head of thirty-three cohorts in two lines, and arriving at the old camp, before Pompey could have notice of his march, attacked it with great vigor, forced the first intrenchment, notwithstanding the brave resistance of Titus Pulcio, and penetrated to the second, whither the legion had retired. But here his fortune changed on a sudden. His right wing, in looking for an entrance into the camp, marched along the outside of a trench, which Cæsar had formerly carried on from the left angle of his camp about four hundred paces to a neighbouring river. This trench they mistook for the rampart of the camp, and being led away, by that mistake, from their left wing, they were soon after prevented from rejoining it by the arrival of Pompey, who came up at the head of a legion and a large body of horse. Then the legion, which Cæsar had attacked, taking courage, made a brisk sally, drove his men back to the first intrenchment, which they had seized, and there put them in great disorder, while they were attempting to pass the ditch. Pompey, in the mean time falling upon them with his cavalry in flank, completed their defeat; and then flying to the enemy's right wing, which had passed the trench mentioned above, and was shut up between that and the ramparts of the old camp, made a most dreadful slaughter of them. The trench was filled with dead bodies, many falling into it in that disorder, and others passing over them and pressing them to death. In this distress Cæsar did all he could to stop the flight of his legionaries, but to no purpose; the standard-bearers themselves threw down the Roman eagles, when Cæsar endeavoured to stop them, and left them in the hands of the enemy, who on this occasion took thirty-two standards; a disgrace which Cæsar had never suffered before. He was himself in no small danger of falling by the hand of one of his own men, whom he took hold of when flying, bidding him stand and face about; but the man, apprehensive of the danger he was in, drew his sword and would have killed him, had not one of his guards prevented the blow by cutting off his arm. Cæsar lost on this occasion nine hundred and sixty of his foot, four hundred of his horse, five tribunes, and thirty-two centurions. Had Pompey attacked Cæsar's camp, during this panic, he might have easily made himself master of it, and put an end to the war at one blow. But, being afraid of some ambuscade, he pursued the enemy to the gates of their camp, and then marched back without making any further attempts; which made Cæsar say, that he had been lost without redress, had Pompey known how to make use of his victory. This loss and disgrace greatly mortified Cæsar, but did not discourage him. After he had by his lenity and eloquent speeches, suited to his present circumstances, recovered the spirits of his troops, he decamped and retired in good order to Apollonia, where he paid his troops, and left his sick and wounded. From thence he marched into Macedon, where Scipio Metellus, Pompey's father-in-law, was incamped. He hoped either to draw his rival into some plain, or to overpower Scipio, if not assisted. He met with great difficulties on his march, the countries through which he passed refusing to supply his army with provisions; to such a degree was his reputation sunk since his last defeat. On his entering Thessaly he was met by Domitius, one of his lieutenants, whom he had sent with three legions to reduce Epirus. Having now got all his forces together, he marched directly to Gomphi, the first town of Thessaly, which had been formerly in his interest, but now declared against him.

Whereupon he attacked it with so much vigour, that, though the garison was very a numerous and the walls of an uncommon height, he made himself master of it in a few hours. From thence he marched to Metropolis, another considerable town of Theffaly, which immediately surrendered; as did all the other cities of the country, except Larissa, of which Scipio had made himself master.

ON the other hand, Pompey, being continually importuned by the senators and officers of his army, left his camp at Dyrrachium, and followed Cæsar, firmly resolved not to give him battle, but rather to distress him by keeping close at his heels, straitening his quarters, and cutting off his convoys. As he had frequent opportunities of coming to an engagement, but always declined it, his friends and subalterns began to put ill constructions on his dilatoriness, to his face. Some reproached him with spinning out the war, in order to continue his authority over the Roman senate and the foreign kings under his command. Domitius Abenobarbus was continually calling him, in derision, Agamemnon, and king of kings; insinuating thereby, that he had no mind to lay down his sovereign authority, but was pleased to see so many kings and great commanders paying their attendance at his tent. Favonius, who affected Cato's free way of speaking, complained in a scoffing manner, that by reason of Pompey's ambition they should eat no figs that year at Tusculum. These reflections, together with the complaints of his soldiers, made him at length resolve to venture a general action. With this design he marched into a large plain near the cities of Pharsalia and Thebes, which latter was also called Philippi, from Philip, king of Macedon and the father of Perfes, who, having reduced the Thebans, placed a colony of Macedonians in their city. This plain was watered by the Enipeus, and surrounded on all sides by high mountains; and Pompey, who was still averse from venturing an engagement, pitched his camp on the declivity of a steep mountain, in a place altogether inaccessible. There he was joined by Scipio, his father-in-law; at the head of the legions which he had brought with him from Syria and Cilicia. But, notwithstanding this reinforcement, he was still irresolute, and unwilling to put all to the issue of a single action, being still convinced of the wisdom of his maxim, that it was better to destroy the enemy by fatigues and want, than to engage an army of brave veterans, who were, in a manner, reduced to despair. As he put off from day to day, under various pretences, descending into the plain, where Cæsar was incamped, his officers forced him to call a council of war, when all to a man were for venturing a general action the very next day. Thus was Pompey obliged to sacrifice his own judgment to the blind ardor of the multitude; and the necessary measures were taken for a general engagement. Plutarch and Cæsar tell us, that Pompey's officers were so confident of victory, that Domitius Spintber and Scipio quarrelled as if they had already conquered, which of them should succeed Cæsar in the office of pontifex maxims. Others sent to Rome to hire such houses as were suitable to the ranks of consuls and prætors, as being sure of entering upon those offices as soon as the battle was over. Some put in for the forfeited estates of those who followed Cæsar. Spintber reserved for his share Cæsar's gardens and house at Baia, and the house of Hortensius. The consuls were settled for several years; but a warm dispute arose about the choice of prætors. The relations of Hirtius, whom Pompey had sent against the Parthians, insisted, that regard should be had for him, though absent. In short, their thoughts ran not so much on conquering, as in what manner they should share and enjoy the fruits of their conquest, as if they were to engage, says Plutarch, Tigranes the Armenian, or some petty king of Nabathæa, and not that Cæsar, who had stormed a thousand towns, subdued above three hundred different nations, gained innumerable victories, taken a million of men prisoners, and slain as many upon the spot in pitched battles. This presumption was founded on the number of their forces; for Pompey's army consisted of forty-five thousand foot, seven thousand horse well mounted and armed, and a great number of dart-men and slingers; whereas Cæsar had at most twenty-two thousand foot and a thousand horse.

WHEN the day came, on which the fate of the world was to be decided, Pompey, having assembled his troops, made them the following speech, which is recorded by several writers. “As I have been induced by your ardor to venture a battle, contrary to my own judgment, let me see you behave in it with bravery. As you surpass the enemy in numbers, strive to do so in courage and resolution. Look back with pleasure

- a “ pleasure on the glorious battle of Dyrrachium; maintain the glory you there “ acquired, and suffer not the best cause to sink under the desperate attempts of one, “ whose main aim is to deprive you of your liberty, and change the republic into
 “ a monarchy. Remember, that Pompey leads you, that the authority of the senate “ supports you, and the gods protect you”. Having thus spoke, he caused the gates of the camp to be opened, and marched out at the head of his army. Cæsar was so far from expecting to engage that day, that he had already given the signal for decamp-ing, with a design to march towards Scotusa, his army being reduced to great straits for want of forage and provisions. But while his soldiers were busy in taking down their tents and sending away their cattle, servants, and baggage before them, word
 b was brought him by his scouts, that they had seen arms carried to and fro in the enemy’s camp, and that they had heard a noise and bustle as of men preparing for battle. Not long after other scouts came in with further intelligence, that the enemy were marching out of their intrenchments, and that the first ranks were already drawn up in the plain. Cæsar, transported with joy at this news, told his men, that the so much wished-for day was come at last, when they should fight with men, not with hunger and famine. Then he ordered the red standard, the usual signal of battle among the Romans, to be set up before his tent; which was no sooner observed by the soldiers, than they left their tents, and with loud shouts of joy repaired to their arms. The officers drew up their respective corps, every man falling into his proper rank, without c any trouble or noise. When he had drawn up his men, he ordered three legions to level the ramparts, and fill up the ditches of his camp, telling them with great confidence, that they should lodge that night in Pompey’s camp. This he said not from a dependence on the vain assurances of the augurs and the presages of victory, which were brought him from all parts (Q); but on his own address and the experienced valour of his veterans. After he had levelled his trenches, he harangued his troops according to custom, but with such an air of confidence and satisfaction, as was sufficient to have inspired cowards with courage. “ Fellow soldiers, said he, the worst part of “ our labours is now past. To-day we are not to fight with hunger and want, but “ with men; nay, with those very men who left Italy, because they could not stand
 d “ before us, and who would deprive us of the honours that are due to us for a long “ course of victories. If therefore you have any grateful sense of my benevolence and “ bounty, let it now exert itself; and remember your promises at Dyrrachium. You “ there vowed, that you would conquer or die; and it is no difficult matter for vete“ rans to conquer raw soldiers, especially when they fight under a general, who, I “ know, is driven to a battle contrary to his own judgment. This I say of the Ita- “ lians only; as for the Asiatics, give yourselves no concern about them; their own “ fears will disperse them. Exert therefore all your valour against the Roman legions “ and Italian cohorts. I have levelled your trenches, that you may have no resource
 “ but in victory, and that the enemy may see, we are determined to lodge in their camp
 “ by our destroying our own.” This said, he marched into the plain, and observing the e disposition of the enemy, as he drew near them, regulated his own by it. Pompey was on the left wing, with the two legions which Cæsar had returned to him at the beginning of the war. Scipio, Pompey’s father-in-law, was in the centre, with the legions he had brought from Syria, and the reinforcements sent by several kings and states of Asia. The Cilician legion and some cohorts, which had served in Spain, were in the right under the command of Afranius (S). As Pompey’s right wing was

(Q) He had three days before purified his army by a sacrifice, according to custom, when the augur, upon the death of the first victim, told him, that within three days he should come to a decisive action. Cæsar asked him, whether he saw any thing in the intrails, which promised an happy event? That, answered the augur, you can best tell yourself; for the gods promise a great alteration from the present posture of affairs; if therefore you think yourself happy now, expect worse fortune; if unhappy, hope for better. The night before the battle, as he went the rounds about midnight, he saw a light in the heaven very bright and flaming, which seemed to pass over his camp and fall into Pompey’s; and when Cæsar’s men came to relieve the guard in the morning, they perceived a panic among the enemy (30).

(R) Cæsar and Appian agree, that Pompey posted himself in his left wing; but Plutarch places him in the right.

(S) Here again Plutarch differs from Cæsar, and gives Lucius Domitius Ahenobarbus the command of the right wing, without so much as mentioning Afranius. It is somewhat surprising, that the account which Cæsar himself has left us of this memorable battle, should meet with contradiction. Surely his evidence must be of the greatest authority.

covered by the Enipeus, he strengthened the left with his slingers, archers, and the seven thousand Roman horse, on whom chiefly his party founded their hopes of victory. The whole army was drawn up in three lines with very little spaces between them. In conformity to this disposition, Cæsar's army was drawn up in the following order: The tenth legion, which had on all occasions signalized themselves above all the rest, was placed in the right wing, and the ninth in the left; but as the latter had been considerably weakened in the action at Dyrrachium, the eighth legion was posted so near it, as to be able to support and reinforce it upon occasion. The rest of Cæsar's forces filled up the space between the two wings. Marc Antony commanded the left wing, Sylla the right, and Cneius Domitius Calvinus the main body. As for Cæsar, he posted himself on the right over-against Pompey, that he might have him always in sight. His army was likewise drawn up in three lines, but with larger spaces between the corps. Pompey, as we have hinted above, placed his whole body of horse in his left wing, in order to distress and cut off the tenth legion, at the head of which Cæsar always fought in person. Hereupon Cæsar, who had only a thousand horse to oppose the enemy's seven thousand, supplied that defect with a body of choice infantry, which he picked out of the legionaries of the third line, and formed into six cohorts. These he placed behind the tenth legion, commanding them to advance to the front as soon as the enemy's cavalry should charge, and together with the legionaries sustain the first onset of the cavalry. He likewise commanded them not to discharge their javelins at a distance, but first to close with the enemy, and then aim only at the faces of the horsemen, who were for the most part young patricians, and therefore, as he rightly imagined, would be more solicitous about preserving their beauty than gaining a victory. Thus was the whole plain covered from Pharfalia to the Enipeus with two armies, dressed and armed after the same manner, and bearing the same ensigns, the Roman eagles. Pompey observing how well the enemy kept their ranks, expecting quietly the signal of battle; and on the contrary how impatient and unsteady his own men were, running up and down in great disorder for want of experience, began to be afraid, lest his ranks should be broke upon the first onset; and therefore commanded the foot in the front to keep their ground, and quietly wait for the enemy (T). The two armies, though within reach of each other, kept for some time a mournful silence, which might possibly proceed from the melancholy reflections of both parties. For what could be more affecting, than to consider, that the son had taken arms against the father, brother against brother, citizen against citizen, and friend against friend? At length the trumpets sounded the charge, and Cæsar's army advanced in good order to begin the attack, being encouraged by the example of one Caius Crastinus, a centurion, who, at the head of a hundred and twenty men, threw himself upon the enemy's first line with incredible fury. This he did to acquit himself of a promise he had solemnly made to Cæsar, who, meeting him as he was going out of his tent in the morning, asked him after some discourse, What his opinion was touching the event of the battle? To which he, stretching out his hand, replied aloud, Thine is the victory, Cæsar; thou shalt conquer gloriously, and I myself this day will be the subject of thy praise, either dead or alive. In pursuance of this promise he broke out of his rank, as soon as the trumpets sounded, and at the head of his company ran in

(T) Cæsar in his third book of the civil war blames this conduct. We shall give the reader a translation of the whole passage from his own words; for every thing spoken by such a man as Cæsar ought to be kept intire: "There was just as much space between the two armies, says he, as was sufficient for both to meet and charge. But Pompey had ordered his men to receive the enemy's onset without stirring, and keep their posts, till Cæsar's army by charging first should be disordered. This he is said to have done by the advice of Triarius, to the end, that the first force and impetuosity of those troops might abate and be weakened, and their ranks thinned; and that then those, who had remained firm in their posts, might attack them with better success, when they were thus broken and dispersed. Besides, he was in hopes that their javelins would do less execution, if they received them in their posts, than if they advanced to meet them, and that Cæsar's soldiers, running the whole void or space, instead of meeting them in the middle of it, would come up out of breath and wearied. But, in my opinion, this was founded upon no manner of reason, because there is a natural vehemence and alacrity implanted in every man, which is kindled in the mind by an eagerness and impatience to begin the onset, which should not be checked, but rather encouraged, by the general. Our ancestors therefore wisely ordained, that trumpets should sound on every side, and all the soldiers raise a shout, conceiving that those were the most proper means to animate and encourage their own troops, and daunt the enemy (31)." Thus far Cæsar. However, it is certain, that generals of great fame and experience have sometimes done as Pompey did.

- a in upon the enemy, and made a great slaughter of them. But while he was still pressing forward, forcing his way through the first line, one of Pompey's men ran him in at the mouth with such violence, that the point of the sword came out at the hind-part of his neck. Upon his death Pompey's soldiers took courage, and with great bravery stood the enemy's onset. While the foot was thus sharply engaged in the centre, Pompey's horse in the left wing marched up confidently, and, having first widened their ranks with a design to surround Cæsar's right wing, charged his cavalry, and forced them to give ground (U). Hereupon Cæsar ordered his horse to retreat a little, and give way to the six cohorts, which he had posted in the rear as a body of reserve. These, upon a signal given coming up, charged the enemy's horse with that resolution
- b and good order, which is peculiar to men who have spent all their lives in camps. They remembered their instructions, not striking at the legs or thighs of the enemy, but aiming only at their faces. This unexpected and new manner of fighting had the desired effect. For the young patricians, whom Cæsar contemptuously calls the pretty young dancers, not being able to bear the thoughts of having their faces deformed with scars, turned their backs, and, covering their faces with their hands, fled in the utmost confusion, leaving the foot at the mercy of the enemy. Cæsar's men did not pursue the fugitives, but charging the foot of that wing now naked and unguarded, surrounded them, and cut most of them in pieces. Pompey was so transported with rage in seeing the flower of his forces thus put to flight, or cut in pieces, that he left
- c his army, and retired slowly towards his camp, looking more like a man distracted Pompey retires to his camp, and his army is defeated. and beside himself, than one who by his exploits had acquired the surname of The Great (W). When he had reached the camp, he retired to his tent, without speaking a word to any, and continued there, like one whom the gods had deprived of his senses, till his whole army was defeated. Cæsar no sooner saw himself master of the field, than he marched to attack the enemy's intrenchments, that Pompey might not have time to recollect himself. When Pompey was informed that his rival was advancing to attack his intrenchments, he then first seemed to have recovered his senses, and cried out, What! into my camp to? He said no more; but immediately laying aside the marks of his dignity, and putting on such a garment as might best favour his
- d flight, he stole out at the decuman gate, and took the road to Larissa, which city had hitherto shewn great attachment to him. In the mean time, Cæsar began the attack Cæsar makes himself master of Pompey's camp. on the enemy's camp, which was vigorously defended by the cohorts Pompey had left to guard it; but they were at length forced to yield (X). Cæsar was not a little surprised, when, after having forced the intrenchments, he found the enemy's tents and pavilions richly adorned with carpets and hangings, their couches strewn with flowers, their tables ready spread, and side-boards set out with abundance of plate, bowls, and glasses, and some of them even filled with wine. So great was the confidence of Pompey's party, that they made preparations before-hand for pleasures to be enjoyed after the victory, which they thought certain. In Pompey's tent Cæsar
- e found the box in which he kept his letters; but, with a moderation and magnanimity worthy

(U) Cæsar himself owns, that his cavalry gave way and were in danger of being cut in pieces, when the six cohorts advanced to support them. Plutarch therefore must be mistaken, when he says, that these cohorts attacked Pompey's cavalry before they had time to charge that of Cæsar. The memoirs he followed in his account of this battle seem not to have been the most exact.

(W) Plutarch applies to Pompey, as he is retiring before Cæsar, a passage in the eleventh Iliad, where Homer speaks in a lofty manner of the flight of Ajax before Hector.

But partial Jove espousing Hector's part,
Shot heav'n-bred horror through the Grecian's
heart;
Confus'd, unnerv'd in Hector's presence grown;
Amaz'd he stood, with terrors not his own.
O'er his broad back his moony shield he threw,
And glaring round with tardy steps withdrew.

(X) Cæsar tells us, that the cohorts appointed to defend the camp made a vigorous resistance; but being at length overpowered, fled to a neighbouring mountain, where he resolved to invest them. But before he had finished his lines, want of water obliged them to abandon that post, and retire towards Larissa. Cæsar pursued the fugitives at the head of the fourth legion, and after six miles march came up with them. But they, not caring to engage a victorious legion led on by Cæsar, fled for refuge to a high hill, the foot of which was watered by a little river. Though Cæsar's men were quite spent, and ready to faint with the excessive heat and the fatigue of the whole day, yet by his obliging manner he prevailed upon them to cut off the convenience of the water from the enemy by a trench. This obliged the unfortunate fugitives to come to a capitulation, throw down their arms, and implore the clemency of the conqueror. This they all did, except some senators, who, as it was now night, escaped in the dark. Cæsar received those who surrendered with all the clemency and kindness imaginable, forbidding his soldiers to offer them the least insult, or even to plunder their baggage.

worthy of himself, he burnt them all without reading one, saying; that he had rather be ignorant of crimes, than obliged to punish them ^b.

THE next day, when the dead were numbered, it appeared that Cæsar had scarce lost two hundred men, among whom were about thirty centurions, whom Cæsar caused to be buried with great solemnity. He did particular honours to the body of Craſtinus, who had begun the battle, and ordered his ashes to be deposited in a tomb, which he erected to his memory. On Pompey's side the number of the dead amounted to fifteen thousand according to some, and to twenty-five thousand according to others (Y). Asinius Pollio, as quoted by Plutarch, tells us, that Cæsar when he saw the field of battle covered with many dead bodies, cried out with a deep sigh; This they would have; they brought me, by their obstinacy, to the sad necessity of conquering them to secure myself. Among the dead were found the bodies of ten senators and forty knights. One of the senators was Domitius Abenobarbus, who fled from the camp when Cæsar attacked it; but being exhausted with fatigue, a body of horse came up with him, and left him dead on the plain of Pharsalia. Cæsar took twenty-four thousand prisoners, eight eagles, and a hundred and eighty ensigns. All the Roman citizens were immediately by his orders set at liberty; and it must be owned, that no conqueror ever took more pleasure than Cæsar in acts of clemency. Some writers ascribe his moderation to policy; but it is manifest from his whole conduct before, as well as after, the battle of Pharsalia, that he was endowed with a great fund of good-nature and humanity. He had always shewn a particular affection for young Marcus Brutus, whom he believed to be his son (Z); and therefore, as he had sided with Pompey and fought under his banners, he was under the utmost concern in not seeing him appear after the battle; nor was his pleasure less when he saw him safe, surrendering himself to him, and imploring his clemency. He received him with inexpressible joy and marks of the most tender and sincere friendship, not suspecting then, that he would one day become an accomplice of his death.

Cæsar resolves to pursue
Pompey.

Cæsar, though victorious, could not think the work complete so long as his rival lived. His fleets were still masters of the sea. Lælius, who commanded one of them had lately besieged Vatinius, Cæsar's lieutenant, in Brundisium, and Caius Cassius had burnt above forty of his galleys in the straits of Messana. Besides, the remains of his troops might unite again, and, by the help of new levies and auxiliaries from foreign kings, make as formidable an army as the former; since Egypt, Africa, Numidia, Pontus, Cilicia, Cappadocia, and Galatia, seemed to have espoused his cause with great zeal. Cato, whom Pompey had left at Dyrrachium with fifteen cohorts and three hundred galleys, might follow him, and renew the war in some other country. So that Pompey's party, though weakened, was not intirely destroyed. Cæsar therefore, in order to complete the work, either by the death or captivity of his competitor, resolved to set all other things aside, and pursue Pompey into what part soever of the world he should retire. Pursuant to this resolution, after he had stayed two days at Pharsalia, to return thanks to the gods for the victory he had gained, and to refresh his soldiers, he set out on the third with his cavalry, advancing every day as far as he possibly could, while one legion followed him by more easy marches ^c.

ventures.

As for Pompey, he took the rout, as we have hinted above, to Larissa. When he had got a little way from the camp, he dismounted, and finding the enemy did not pursue him, walked on leisurely with his small retinue, wholly taken up with such thoughts as were natural to a person of his condition and circumstances. He had been for the space of thirty-four years together accustomed to conquest and victory, and was then at last in his old age beginning to know the calamities of war in slaughter and flight. He considered, with the greatest concern imaginable, that he had lost in one hour all the glory and power, which he had been gaining for so many years in innumerable battles; and that he, who a little before was guarded by a mighty army and

(Y) Appian quotes some writers, who made Cæsar's loss amount to twelve hundred legionaries. Asinius Pollio, who was present in this action and fought in Cæsar's army, reduces the number of the slain on Pompey's side to six thousand men. But he is contradicted by all the ancients.

(Z) Cæsar was passionately in love with Servilia the mother of Brutus, who gave herself up intirely to him; whence Cæsar, as Plutarch observes, had reason to believe that Brutus was his son.

- a and attended by kings, was now flying in so mean a condition, and with so small a retinue, that his very enemies could not know him. Thus he came to Larissa, but would not enter the city, notwithstanding the pressing invitations of the inhabitants, lest their kindness to him should provoke Cæsar and bring them into trouble; nay, he exhorted them to submit to the conqueror, and have timely recourse to his clemency. From Larissa he pursued his rout with L. Lentulus, the last year's consul, P. Lentulus, and the senator Favonius, and in the evening reached the vale of Tempe in Thessaly, greatly fatigued and destitute of all necessaries of life. There, as he was very thirsty, he kneeled down, and drank out of a river, which watered that fruitful plain. Then rising up, he crossed the valley, and, coming to the sea-side, betook himself to a poor fisherman's cottage, where he passed the remainder of the night. How dreadful this night must have been, not so much on account of the inconveniencies of the place, as of his own tormenting reflections, we leave the reader to judge. The next morning by break of day, he went into a small boat on the river Peneus, and, taking his freemen along with him, dismissed his slaves, advising them to go boldly to Cæsar, and not be afraid. As he was going in the boat along the shore, he happened to spy a great ship of burden, riding at anchor and just ready to set sail. The master of the ship, by name Peticius, a Roman citizen (A), knowing Pompey, took him into his ship, together with the two Lentuli, Favonius, and such of his attendants as he thought fit. Soon after they had got aboard, they discovered Deiotarus, tetrarch of Galatia, who had served under Pompey and made his escape after the battle, flying full speed towards the shore. As the request of Pompey, Peticius stayed and took him in likewise. Cicero tells us, that this prince had joined Pompey before the battle, depending on the flight of birds, which, he thought, promised his arms good success. As the illustrious Roman had dismissed his attendants, Favonius performed the meanest offices about him, not scrupling to wait upon him at table and help to undress him. The ship pursued her course, touched at Amphipolis, on the confines of Thrace and Macedon, where Pompey took some money of his friends for his necessary expences, and in a few days made one of the ports of the island of Lesbos, with a design to take in Cornelia, Pompey's wife, and his son Sextus, whom in the beginning of the war he had sent to Mitylene, the capital of the island. He no sooner arrived in the port, than he sent a messenger into the city, not caring to come himself ashore, with news very different from what Cornelia expected. For she, having heard no news from her husband since his success near Dyrrhacium, believed that the war was near ended, and that there was nothing more remaining for Pompey, than to pursue Cæsar and disperse the few troops he had still with him. The messenger, finding her still in this persuasion, informed her of the misfortune of her husband with his tears, before he could deliver her any message; and the unfortunate Cornelia no sooner heard of his defeat and forlorn condition, then she fell down in a swoon, and continued a long time senseless. When she came to herself, she started up and hastened to the sea-side, where the sight of Pompey renewed her grief. She fainted away a second time in his arms, and, as soon as she recovered her speech, she vented her passion in the following words; It is the effect of my cruel destiny, not of yours, that I see you thus dejected and reduced to one poor vessel, who, before your marriage with the unfortunate Cornelia, were attended by a fleet of five hundred sail. Why therefore should you come to see me, or why rather should you not have left her to a severer fate, who has been the cause of all your misfortunes? How happy a woman had I been, if I had breathed out my last, before I received the fatal news from Parthia of the death of Crassus? Or how prudent, if I had followed his destiny as I designed? But I was reserved for a greater mischief, for the ruin of Pompey the Great. Pompey is said to have answered her thus:
- f Dear Cornelia, you have been hitherto accustomed only to the smiles of fortune, which perhaps has deceived you in this, that she has been constant to me beyond her custom; but it behoves

The meeting of Pompey and his wife Cornelia.

(A) Plutarch tells us, that Peticius had dreamt the night before, that he saw Pompey in a despicable condition, and that, while he was telling his dream to the passengers, one of the mariners acquainted him, that he saw a little boat putting off from the shore, and that the persons in it held out their hands, as if they desired to be taken into his vessel. Hereupon Peticius standing up, observed a man in the same dress, in which Pompey had appeared to him in his dream; and not doubting but it was he, he expressed with tears his concern for him; and ordering the mariners to let down the ship's boat, he called him by his name, as he drew near, and took him in with all his attendants, ready to convey him to what part of the world he pleased (32).

boves us, who are mortals, to bear with these afflictions, and try our fortune once again: ^a neither ought we to despond; for it is as possible for us to retrieve our former happiness, as it was to fall from it into our present calamity. All the Mitylenians, who ran to the port to pay their homage to their old protector, were witnesses of this interview, and, being touched with compassion, invited Pompey into their city. But he returning them thanks for their kind invitation, answered, that he would by no means enter their gates, lest he should draw upon them the resentment of the conqueror, to whom he advised them to submit, since he was a man of great goodness and clemency. Then turning to Cratippus the philosopher, who then lived at Mitylene and came among the rest to pay his respects to his old friend, he began to repine and argue with him, touching the dispensations of providence. But Cratippus modestly declined the dis- ^b pute for fear of heightening his sorrow, and only encouraged him to bear with constancy his present misfortunes. Plutarch observes here, that the philosopher might have easily answered his objections, by shewing, it was necessary, on account of the disorders which reigned in the republic, that the government should be lodged in the hands of a single person, and by asking him, what grounds men had to believe that he, if conqueror, would have used his good fortune better than Cæsar. But the dispensations of providence, adds Plutarch, are in the hands of the Supreme Being, and there we must leave them ^f.

Pompey, having taken his wife and friends aboard, sailed from Mitylene, steering his course towards Cilicia. The first place he touched at was Attalia, a city of Pam- ^c phylia, where he found sixty senators of his party, seven or eight ships of his fleet, and some bands of soldiers. Here he was informed, that Cato had rallied a considerable body of troops, and was passed with them over into Africa. From Pamphylia he sailed with his small fleet for the island of Cyprus, where he received advice, that the Rhodians had refused to admit into their ports one of the Lentuli and his attendants, and that Antioch, the capital of Syria, had, at the instigation of the Roman citizens who traded there, declared for Cæsar. Hereupon being at a loss whither he should steer his course next, he summoned a council of the few faithful friends who followed him, to consider with them what place would yield him the safest refuge and retreat, in the present situation of his affairs. Some advised him to pass over into Africa, and there ^d join Juba king of Mauritania, who had espoused his cause and exerted himself in it with great zeal. Pompey himself was for retiring into Parthia, as the only country that was fit to protect him in his present distress, and supply him with a sufficient force to make head against his competitor. But this was looked upon by all his friends as the project of a man overwhelm'd with grief and reduced to despair: they repre- sented to him, that the Parthians were the most inveterate enemies of the Roman name; that they had hitherto stood neuter, and declared. that they would not espouse either party; that they were overjoyed to see the republic weakening herself by her own forces, and lastly, that it was dangerous to expose the young and beautiful Cornelia to the brutalities of a dissolute court. This last motive, which was of more weight ^e with him than all the rest, induced him to drop the design of seeking protection among the enemies of Rome, though he was much perplexed where to find a safe retreat among her friends and allies. Among those who attended the illustrious Roman in his flight was Theophanes, a native of Mitylene, who, as he was famous for the extent of his knowledge, had a great influence over Pompey; and this he made use of on the present occasion, persuading him to retire to Egypt, which was but a voyage of three days sailing, where he had reason to expect from young Ptolemy, his pupil, all possible assistance, since he had lately restored his father to his kingdom, which favour the young prince had gratefully acknowledged, by sending him a fleet to be employed against Cæsar. As soon as the advice of Theophanes prevailed, Pompey and ^f Cornelia with their attendants weighed anchor, and, leaving Cyprus, steered towards Egypt, some in galleys, others in ships of burden ^g.

He designs to retire into Parthia.

Theophanes persuades him to fly into Egypt.

Cæsar pursues him.

IN the mean time, Cæsar, wholly intent on pursuing his rival, arrived at the Hellespont, which he ventured to cross with a small number of galleys, but was met in his passage by Pompey's fleet under the command of Caius Cassius. Cæsar did not avoid him, though the fleet he commanded consisted, according to Appian, of seventy ships; but boldly making towards him, summoned him to surrender. Cassius was so struck with the boldness of Cæsar, and surpris'd at his intrepidity and good fortune, that of his forces were dispersed all over the city in their quarters, he would have been ^a overpowered, and tore in pieces by the populace, had he not from a balcony spoke to them, and assured them, that the difference between Ptolemy and his sister should be soon made up to the satisfaction of both. Accordingly the next day having assembled the people, he brought out Ptolemy and Cleopatra to them, and then causing their father's will publicly to be read, wherein it was ordered that his eldest son and eldest daughter should, according to the custom of the country, be joined in marriage and reign together, under the guardianship of the Roman people, he decreed, in virtue of that guardianship, which, he said, was vested in him, that Ptolemy, as being the eldest son, and Cleopatra, as being the eldest daughter of the deceased king, should, according to the tenor of the said will, reign jointly; and that Ptolemy, the ^b younger son of Auletes, and his other daughter, named Arfinoe, should reign in Cyprus. This last he added by way of gift to appease the people; for Cyprus had been some time before subdued by the Romans, and was then governed, like the other Roman provinces, by a prætor sent annually from Rome. Photinus was the only person in the assembly, who did not applaud this decree. As that minister had been the chief cause of the breach between Cleopatra and her brother, and also of her expulsion out of the kingdom, he was well apprised, that both his life and authority would be brought into danger by her return, and therefore exerted his utmost endeavours to prevent the execution of the decree. In order to this, he not only sowed new discontents among the people, but prevailed upon Achillas to bring his army, consisting of ^c twenty thousand men, from Pelusium to Alexandria, in order to drive Cæsar out of the city. This gave rise to the Alexandrian war, so famous in history, of which we have given a very particular account in our history of Egypt°. King Ptolemy perishing, in this war, Alexandria and all Egypt submitted to the conqueror, who thereupon settled Cleopatra and the surviving Ptolemy, her younger brother, on the throne, as king and queen; which was putting the whole power into her hands, Ptolemy being then only eleven years old; but as he had engaged in so dangerous a war only for the sake of that lewd woman, he made it turn the most he could to her advantage. In this war perished not only the king, but likewise Achillas and Photinus, with all the accomplices of Pompey's murder, except Theodotus, who, abandoning Egypt for fear of ^d Cæsar, wandered up and down, despised and hated by all men, till M. Brutus, after Cæsar's death, finding him in Asia, which was his province, caused him to be put to death, after he had made him suffer the most exquisite torments he could invent. The ashes of Pompey were some time after conveyed to Rome, and delivered to his wife Cornelia, who buried them at his country-house in the neighbourhood of Alba®.

^e WHEN the news of Pompey's death reached Rome, the senate and people strove who should heap most honours on the conqueror, now become absolute master of their liberties, lives, and fortunes. He was by the unanimous consent of all the orders of the republic, proclaimed consul for five years, named dictator, contrary to the ancient custom, not for six months only, but for a whole year, declared tribune of the people, and head of that college for his life; empowered to make peace showing any manner of civility. Since therefore they all continued silent, Pompey took a little book in his hand, wherein he had wrote a Greek oration, which he intended to speak to Ptolemy, and began to read it. When the boat drew near the shore, Cornelia, who never lost sight of her husband, and was very impatient to see the event, observed several persons of distinction running to the sea-side to meet him. Upon this the disconsolate Cornelia took courage, imagining they were coming to wait upon Pompey and conduct him to the king; but in that instant, as Philip his freed-man lent him his hand to help him out of the boat, Septimius, coming behind him, ran him through with his sword: at the same time Achillas and Salvius falling upon him with their drawn swords, the unfortunate Roman, having no means of defending himself or making his escape, took up his gown with both hands, and covering his face neither spoke or did any thing unworthy of himself; but giving a groan, patiently received, without stirring, all their thrusts. Cornelia, who had kept her eyes fixed on her husband the whole time, seeing the swords of the assassins glitter about him, gave such a shriek as was heard on the shore; but the mariners on board her galley, seeing the Egyptian fleet under sail, immediately weighed anchor, and being favoured by a brisk gale, saved the virtuous Cornelia and her son Sextus, from captivity and the cruel outrages they had reason to fear from such barbarous and inhuman assassins. Cornelia and her son were conveyed safe to Cyprus; but some of the other vessels were taken by the Egyptians, and all those who were on board most cruelly murdered¹.

THE head of Pompey was cut off, in order to be embalmed for a present to Cæsar; but the body was thrown naked upon the shore, and there exposed to public view. Philip the freed-man stayed by it, watching it till the multitude had satisfied their curiosity; and then washing it with sea-water, he wrapt it up in a garment of his own, and finding some rotten planks of a little fisher-boat, he gathered them together for a funeral pile. While he was laying them together, an old Roman, who had served from his youth under Pompey, came and helped him to perform the funeral rites (B). Such was the end of a hero, who in his youth had acquired the surname of Great, and had triumphed over three parts of the world; but having unfortunately imbarqued in a civil war, more out of a desire of becoming sole master of the republic, than a zeal for her preservation when on the brink of ruin, he perished in it through his own ill conduct (C). The next Day Lucius Lentulus, the last year's consul, who had left the island of Cyprus, and was sailing along the coast, observing a funeral pile, and Philip, whom he did not know, standing by it, from some secret apprehension of Pompey's misfortune, came ashore, and being told by Philip, that his apprehensions were too true, he said sighing, Alas! is this the fate of Pompey the Great! and continuing immoveable, expressed his grief with a flood of tears. While he was thus bewailing the death of Pompey, he himself was seized by the king's guards and thrown into a dark prison, where he was soon after put to death.^m

IN the mean time, Cæsar, pursuing Pompey the same way he fled, steered his course towards Egypt, and arrived at Alexandria just as the news was brought thither of his death. Soon after he landed and entered the city, when the head of his rival was presented to him, some say by Theodotus, others by Achillas, wrapt up in a veil, together with his seal, on which was engraved a lion holding a sword in his paw; but

(B) The poet Lucan tells us, that Pompey's body was thrown into the sea, and that Servius Codrus, who had been formerly Pompey's quaestor and had followed him from Cyprus, brought it ashore, and buried it. His words are:

Quæstor ab Idalio Cynereæ littore Cypri;
Infaustus Magni fuerat comes: ille per umbras
Ausus ferre gradum, victum pietate timorem
Compulit, ut mediis quæsitum corpus in undis

Aurelius Victor adds, that Codrus, having burnt the body, buried the ashes, and on the tomb wrote the following words: Here lies Pompey the Great.

(C) Had he continued in his camp at Dyrrachium, and near the sea, of which he was master, he might have forced his rival to wander from province to province in search of provisions, and destroyed his army either by gradual losses, or useless conquests; but he suffered himself to be drawn into Theffaly, and engaged his rival, when he might have conquered him without striking a blow, Cæsar's army being then reduced to the utmost extremity for want of necessaries. 'Tis true indeed, that his army forced him, in a manner, to quit his first camp; but this want of authority over his troops is just matter of blame in a general, who bore the surname of the Great.

a but Cæsar, with the utmost horror, turned his eyes from so dismal an object; and, reflecting on his former friendship with the deceased, the inconstancy of fortune, and the calamities which often attend the greatest men, burst into tears, and with a thundering voice ordered the messenger immediately to be gone. He kept the seal; but ordered the head to be buried with great solemnity in the suburbs of Alexandria, where he erected a temple to Nemesis the goddess of revenge. At the same time he prevailed upon Ptolemy to set at liberty all the friends of the illustrious deceased, who had been taken as they were straggling in those parts, and by his orders thrown into prison. These all joined their benefactor, who received them with marks of the most sincere friendship, signifying in all the letters he wrote to his friends at Rome, that the greatest advantage and pleasure he reaped from his victory was, his saving every day the lives of some Roman citizens, who had taken arms against him ^a.

Causes Pompey's head to be buried.

Cæsar being detained at Alexandria by the Etesian winds (D), which continue in those parts during the dog-days, in the beginning of which he entered that port, spent his time in demanding the money which the present king's father owed him, and in hearing and deciding the controversy between young Ptolemy and his sister Cleopatra. Auletes, as we have related in the history of Egypt, had engaged Cæsar, during his first consulate, by a promise of ten thousand talents, to get him confirmed in his kingdom by the Roman senate and people, and accounted among the friends and allies of that powerful state. Part only of this sum was then paid; and Cæsar, wanting money to maintain his army, exacted the rest with rigour; which Photinus, who was Ptolemy's prime minister, by several artifices made appear to the people to be greater than it was: for he stripped the temples of all their silver and gold vessels, and ordered the king's table to be served in wooden and earthen dishes, giving out, in order to stir up the mutinous populace of Alexandria against Cæsar, that he had seized all the silver and gold belonging to the temples of the gods and to the king. He also measured out to Cæsar's soldiers, with a design to pick a quarrel with him before he was joined by the rest of his troops, musty and unwholesome corn, telling him, when he complained, that he must take it and be contented, since his army was maintained at the cost of another. This contemptuous treatment made Cæsar, tho' he had then only three thousand two hundred foot and eight hundred horse with him, exact with more rigour the sum owing him; but Photinus, instead of paying it, pressed him every day to be gone, advising him to look after his other affairs, which were of greater consequence than such a paltry debt. Cæsar answered, That he was not come into Egypt to ask counsel, but to exact the money which the late king owed him, and to compose the differences between the present king and his sister Cleopatra, who were then at war. Accordingly soon after he issued out a peremptory order, injoining each of them to disband their armies, and bring the cause to his tribunal for a final decision. This was looked upon by the Egyptians as highly injurious to the sovereign majesty of their king, who, being an independent prince, acknowledged no superior, and therefore was not to be judged by any man. To this Cæsar answered, That he did not take upon him to judge as a superior, but as an arbitrator appointed by the will of the late king, who had put his children under the tuition of the Roman people. This quieting all for the present, the cause was brought before Cæsar, and advocates were appointed on both sides to plead at his tribunal; but, in the mean time, Cæsar, being greatly taken with the charms and graceful behaviour of Cleopatra, from an impartial judge became her advocate, and betrayed a great inclination to favour her. This provoked Ptolemy, who thereupon stirred up the whole city of Alexandria against Cæsar. The Roman soldiers, who were near the king, seized him, while he was encouraging the enraged multitude to take up arms in defence of their sovereign, and secured him in the house where their general lodged; but nevertheless, as the rest of the year. Thus the north winds, which, during the dog-days, constantly blow upon the coasts of Egypt, and hinder all ships from sailing out of Alexandria for that season, are called Etesia, in Cæsar's commentaries. In other authors the west and east winds are called Etesia, when they continue blowing for certain seasons of the year (33).

(D) By Etesian winds are meant such as blow at stated times of the year, from what part soever of the compass they come. They are so called from the Greek word ετος a year, being yearly or anniversary winds, such as our seamen call monsoons and trade-winds, which, in some parts of the world, continue constantly blowing for certain stated seasons

^a that he readily obeyed the summons, and joined Cæsar with his numerous fleet ^b. Cicero seems to insinuate ^c, that Cassius did not join Cæsar, till after the war of Alexandria, when the conqueror was sailing from Egypt to Pontus, to make war upon Pharnaces who had declared for Pompey. Cæsar, on his arrival in Asia, to gratify Theopompus, who had made a collection of fables, enfranchised the Cnidians his country-men, and remitted one third of the taxes to all the Asiatics. He likewise received under his protection the Ionians, Æolians, and other nations of Asia Minor, who came to submit to him and implore his protection. As he could have no certain account of the rout Pompey had taken, he resolved to make what haste he could to Egypt, ^b fearing his rival should get possession of that rich and wealthy kingdom, rally his forces there, and, with the assistance of young Ptolemy, a prince highly obliged to him, renew the war. With this design he sailed for Rhodes, stayed there till he was joined by two legions from the continent, and then set sail for Egypt, without communicating his resolution to any but M. Brutus, in whom he reposed an intire confidence ^k.

BUT Pompey arrived in Egypt before Cæsar; and being informed, that Ptolemy was at war with his sister and incamped in the neighbourhood of Pelusium, he steered his course that way, and sent a messenger before to acquaint the king with his arrival, and implore his protection. The king himself, who was very young, returned no answer to the messenger; but Photinus, Achillas, and Theodotus, who were the young prince's chief counsellors and had the greatest influence over him, consulted among themselves about the reception of Pompey. Photinus was the chief minister of state, Achillas the general of the armies, and Theodotus a mercenary teacher of rhetoric, but one who was in great esteem with the king, as being his preceptor. While these three were consulting, Pompey, riding at anchor at a great distance from the shore, was forced to wait the result of their deliberations; that Pompey, as Plutarch observes, who thought it beneath him to owe his safety to Cæsar, a Roman and his father-in-law, stooped so low as to lie at the discretion of three unworthy favourites. Photinus and Achillas were for receiving Pompey, thinking it would be a reproach to the Egyptian nation to abandon one in his distress, who had been guardian, friend, and zealous benefactor to their king; but Theodotus undertook to prove, that it was equally dangerous in that juncture of affairs to admit and refuse him admittance. If we receive him, said he, we shall make Cæsar our enemy, and Pompey our master: if we dismiss him, we shall render ourselves obnoxious to Pompey for that inhospitable expulsion, and to Cæsar for letting him escape. He concluded, that the safest expedient was to send for him and put him to death; for by that means they would ingratiate themselves with the one, and have no reason to fear the other; adding with a smile, A dead man cannot bite. This cruel advice was approved of, and the execution of it committed to Achillas, who, taking with him L. Septimius and Salvius, the former once a tribune and the latter a centurion in the Roman armies, and three or four officers more, went on board a small vessel, and made up towards Pompey's galley, while the whole Egyptian army stood in battle array on the shore. The chief men, who attended Pompey, alarmed at the meanness of this reception, advised him to weigh anchor without delay and launch into the main; but the hero encouraged them, and in the mean time the Egyptian boat drawing near, Septimius, standing up first, saluted Pompey in Latin, giving him the title of imperator. Achillas complimented him in Greek, and invited him on board his vessel, telling him, that the sea was so shallow near the shore, that his galley could not avoid striking upon some shelve. Pompey, observing several of the king's galleys well manned, and the shore covered with soldiers, began to suspect some treachery; but nevertheless, without betraying the least distrust, he took his leave of Cornelia, who already bewailed his death, and commanding two centurions, with Philip one of his freed-men and a slave called Scenes, to go on board the Egyptian boat before him, he himself followed, repeating to his wife and son as he went into the boat, the following iambics of Sophocles: He that once falls into a tyrant's pow'r, Becomes a slave tho' he was free before. As those who were in the boat kept a profound silence, without paying the least civility or speaking a kind word to him all the way, in order to begin a conversation with Septimius, Pompey, looking earnestly upon him, addressed him thus. Metinks I should know you friend; have we not been formerly fellow-soldiers? But Septimius answered with a nod only, without shewing

a peace and war with whom he pleased, to levy what forces he thought fit, &c. so that all the dignities and power of the republic now centered in Cæsar alone, who, without any violence or proscriptions, was raised to a higher pitch of power and authority, than Sylla had acquired, by the death and banishment of innumerable citizens. As the new dictator could not then go in person to Rome, to take possession of the many dignities conferred upon him, he appointed Marc Antony his general of the horse, and sent him with a detachment of troops to the capital, committing to him the government of Italy, during his absence. As for the dictator himself, after he had put an end to the war of Alexandria, and settled his favourite Cleopatra on the throne of Egypt, he was forced to quit that kingdom, and march into the north of Asia against Pharnaces, king of the Cimmerian Bosphorus, son of Mithridates the Great, who finding the Romans engaged in a civil war, had laid hold of that opportunity to attempt the recovery of his father's dominions in Asia. In the very beginning of the troubles, he raised a powerful army, and, appointing Asander governor of Bosphorus in his absence, passed the Euxine sea, and made himself master of Colchis, Armenia Minor, and several places in Cappadocia, Pontus, and Bithynia. After the battle of Pharsalia, Cæsar had sent Domitius Calvinus with part of his army against him, committing to his care the government of all the provinces of Asia Minor; but Pharnaces, having overcome Domitius in a pitched battle, made himself master of all the remaining parts of Pontus and Cappadocia. Puffed up with this success, he treated the Roman merchants and publicans, who resided at Amisus the capital of Pontus, with great cruelty; and having seized all Bithynia, was preparing to pass from thence into the province of Asia properly so called. This extraordinary progress at length roused Cæsar, who was spending his time in wanton dalliances with Cleopatra, and put him again upon action. Having left part of his forces in Egypt to protect Cleopatra, he hastened with the rest into Syria; and, having appointed Sextus Cæsar, his relation, governor of that province, he pursued his march northward against Pharnaces. As he passed through Galatia, Dejotarus, who had sided with Pompey and attended him in his flight, appeared before the dictator, in the habit of a suppliant and stripped of his royal robes, begging, he would extend to him the effects of the clemency, which had gained him greater glory than all his victories. The dictator was not much affected either with his submission or praises; but nevertheless, as he was naturally inclined to mercy, he freely pardoned him, and restored to him the ensigns of royalty; but at the same time ordered him to send forthwith to his assistance the legion, which he had trained up in the Roman discipline, and all his cavalry, to be employed against Pharnaces. With this reinforcement he entered the kingdom of Pontus, which Pharnaces had reconquered, and, without giving any respite either to himself or his troops, or hearkening to the proposals of peace, which the king made, with no other view but to gain time, he advanced against him, attacked him, and gained a complete victory, an account of which he wrote to his friend Aminitius or Anitius in the following words Veni, vidi, vici, I came, I saw, I conquered; which, being all dissyllables and having the same cadence, happily expresses the dispatch of it. This victory, which was gained near the place where Triarius had been formerly defeated by Mithridates, repaired the honour of the Roman arms. After this defeat, Pharnaces fled with a thousand horse, the only remains of his vanquished army, to Sinope, where he caused the horses to be killed, and putting the men on board his ships in that port, he sailed with them back to Bosphorus; but he was no sooner landed, than Asander, whom he had left his lieutenant in that kingdom, and who, in his absence, had set up for himself, seized him, and, having put him to death, reigned in his stead. Hereupon Cæsar gave Mithridates the Pergamenian that kingdom, as a reward for the eminent services he had done him in Egypt, as we have related in the history of that kingdom. But Cæsar, in declaring him king of Bosphorus, gave him only an empty title; for, Asander being in possession of it, he was to recover it by force of arms, in which attempt he lost his life, instead of gaining the crown, being overcome and slain in battle by Asander, who held the kingdom without any further opposition, the Romans not being at leisure, on account of the intestine broils that still continued among them, to give him any disturbance^a.

AND now Cæsar, having settled affairs in Asia in the best manner he could, and left Cælius Vinicianus in Pontus, to keep that kingdom in awe, set out for Rome, attended

attended only with one legion. He passed through Asia, and from thence crossed a over into Greece, obliging every-where the publicans to bring to him the money, which, according to their engagements with the republic, they were to remit to the quæstors at Rome. His sudden arrival in Italy filled some with joy, others with fear, and kept the minds both of the senate and people in suspense. They were well acquainted with the humanity of his temper; but, as he had been greatly provoked by the blind and inconsiderate zeal of some rigid republicans, they were afraid he might rather follow the examples of Sylla and his uncle Marius, than the dictates of his own good-nature. Cicero was one of the first who felt the effects of his clemency. That great orator had declared for Pompey, and, after his defeat, returned to Italy, where he had lived at some distance from the capital, not caring to appear there, till he had obtained his pardon of Cæsar. He therefore no sooner heard, that the dictator was landed at Tarentum and was marching from thence to Brundisium, than he went to meet him, with an air of confidence mixed with fear and respect. Cæsar, who knew him while he was yet at some distance, in order to save him the confusion of making submissions, not suitable to the rank he had held in the republic, dismounted, ran to meet him, and, having tenderly embraced him, walked a great while with him alone, without shewing the least dissatisfaction, or taking any notice of his past behaviour. Cicero was greatly taken with this kind reception; but nevertheless thought it adviseable to keep at a distance from the capital, whither he repaired very seldom, and then only to make his court to the dictator. In his retirement he employed his time in the study of philosophy, and composed most of those books, which will be the admiration of all ages. Quintus Cicero, the orator's brother, who had formerly served under the dictator in Gaul as one of his lieutenants, and had received innumerable favours at his hands, had, in the very beginning of the war, abandoned him to follow Pompey; but, notwithstanding his ingratitude, Cæsar pardoned him, at the earnest intreaties of Aulus Hirtius, Caius Trebonius, and the famous Titus Pomponius Atticus, the orator's inseparable friend, even in his greatest misfortunes. Many others, who had borne arms against him, were not only pardoned, but received with great kindness, and even admitted to his confidence. This obliging behaviour, so different from that of Sylla and Marius, gained him the affections of the people, and drew d over great numbers of senators to his party, who had looked upon him before as a tyrant and usurper. He entered Rome without the least pomp or shew, being attended only by a small number of legionaries; and finding great disturbances in the city, occasioned by a misunderstanding between Marc Antony, his general of the horse, and P. Cornelius Dolabella, one of the tribunes of the people, who was no less attached to Cæsar's interest than Antony himself, he restored Rome to its former tranquillity, and easily prevailed upon the people to reject the law, which Dolabella had promised, containing an abolition of all debts. This law had occasioned the misunderstanding between Antony and Dolabella, the former opposing it to the utmost of his power, and the latter stirring up the poor and meaner sort of citizens to get it passed by e force. Matters were carried so far, that Antony was ordered by the senate to bring his troops into the city; and then a battle was fought in the very forum, between Antony and his legionaries on one side, and Dolabella at the head of the insolvent debtors on the other; but the latter paid dear for their boldness, eight hundred of them being killed upon the spot; whereas the general of the horse lost only a very small number of his men in the fray. Cæsar's presence put an end to all disturbances. As he seemed to disapprove the law, it was immediately rejected. Tho' he affected to govern according to the ancient laws of the republic, and pretended to leave both the senate and people in the full possession of their former privileges, yet no one dared to oppose or contradict him. Thus no change, as to outward appearance, was visible in Rome, and at the same time all orders of men were subordinate to the sovereign will of the dictator. During his short stay in the capital, he entertained the people with magnificent shews, and remitted them the rents of the houses which they hired of the public. Afterwards he confiscated the estates of those who still continued in arms against him, and caused them to be sold publicly by auction. The lands, houses, and moveables of Pompey, whose children still disturbed the public tranquillity, were, together with the effects of many others, exposed in the forum to public sale; but no-body bidding for those of Pompey, out of respect to the memory of so great a man, Marc Antony purchased them at a very low price, and immediately took possession of his house, where he spent his time, as is plain from Cicero's second Philippic, in a continued

a tinued scene of debauchery. When Cæsar's officers demanded the small sum he had agreed to pay for Pompey's house and moveables, he was highly offended, and treated them with great contempt, saying, He did not expect Cæsar would exact so paltry a debt of one who had done him so great services. This provoked Cæsar, and occasioned some coldness between him and his general of the horse. As to Cæsar's other friends, none of them had occasion to complain of him, or repent their having embraced his party. As pontifex maximus, he appointed some of them augurs, others pontifices, others decemvirs, to whose care the Sibylline books were committed, and for their sake increased the number of prætors to ten, filling that college with his friends and partizans. As the number of senators was greatly diminished by the death of some and flight of others, he raised to the senatorial dignity the chief officers of his army, and such of the knights as had followed his standards. Tho' a few days only were wanting to the end of the consular year, with which his dictatorship expired, he assembled the tribes in the campus Martius, and proposed to them two of his lieutenants; Q. Fufius Calenus and P. Vatinius, to be chosen consuls for the current year. This he did with no other view, but to honour with the consular dignity those two officers, who had served, with great fidelity, under him in all his wars. The shortness of their consulate made Cicero say by way of raillery, That the year, in which Vatinius and Fufius were consuls, had neither spring, summer, nor autumn. The next year Cæsar caused himself to be created consul; but did not part with the dictatorship. As consul, he took for his colleague M. Æmilius Lepidus, who was just then returned from Hither Spain, which he had governed with great prudence and moderation. This was a great disappointment to Marc Antony, who aspired at the consular dignity; but his late behaviour and scandalous debaucheries had alienated the dictator's mind from him; the more, because he was hated by the people, on account of his haughty and imperious behaviour, while he discharged the office of general of the horse.

AND now Cæsar, having settled affairs in Italy, and taken the most proper measures to prevent any new disturbances in the capital, was wholly intent on carrying the war into Africa, where Pompey's party was still very powerful, being headed by the famous Cato and many officers of great distinction. When Pompey followed Cæsar into Thessaly, he left in his camp at Dyrrachium, as we have observed above, fifteen cohorts, under the command of Cato. When news of Pompey's overthrow was first brought to Dyrrachium, Cato resolved with himself, if Pompey were killed, to lead the fifteen cohorts into Italy, there disband them, and retire from the tyranny of Cæsar, as far as he could, and live in exile; but, if Pompey were safe, to keep the troops together for him. With this design he left Dyrrachium, which was too near Thessaly, where Pompey had been defeated, and crossed over to the island of Corcyra, where the fleet lay. There he found Cicero, to whom, as he was a scrupulous observer of the laws, he offered the command of the troops he had with him, since Cicero had a right to the first post, as having been consul; whereas he had only been prætor. But Cicero, who already repented his having declared for Pompey, and was then returning to Italy, under various pretences declined the offer, which so provoked Cneius, Pompey's son, that he reproached him with treachery and cowardice, and drawing his sword, in the transport of his passion would have killed him on the spot, had not Cato, starting up, laid hold of his arm, and held him, till the frightened orator was out of reach. The same night Cato conveyed him privately out of the camp, and by that means saved his life. Cicero immediately went on board a small vessel, and set sail for Brundisium, whence he wrote to Oppius and Balbus (E), two of Cæsar's most zealous

(E) Caius Oppius was one of Cæsar's chief favourites. Charisius Aulus, Gellius, and Pliny tell us, that he was a man of great learning, and the author of several works much esteemed by the ancients, among the rest, of the lives of Scipio Africanus and of Pompey the Great. Plutarch reproaches him with lessening the exploits and glory of Pompey, and magnifying those of Cæsar. In Suctonius's time he was deemed the true author of the history of the Alexandrian, African, and Spanish wars, which passed then, and have been transmitted to us, under the name of

Hirtius. The same writer ascribes to Oppius several other works, none of which have reached our times. As for Balbus, he was a native of Gades, or, according to others, of Carteia. He served first in the armies of Quintus Metellus and of Pompey against Sertorius. Several years after he became acquainted with Cæsar, while he governed Spain in quality of prætor, and was, at his recommendation, honoured with the rights and privileges of a Roman citizen. These were afterwards called in question; but Balbus found a zealous advocate in the person of Cicero, and zealous partizans, conjuring them to use their good offices in his behalf, and excuse him with the conqueror, for having inconsiderately followed Pompey's party. While Cicero was sailing towards Italy, many illustrious Romans, who had escaped from the battle of Pharsalia, arrived in the island of Corcyra, not knowing what rout Pompey had taken; so that Cato saw himself all on a sudden at the head of a considerable army, and surrounded by many officers of distinction. That zealous republican did not doubt, but Pompey was fled either towards Egypt, where young Ptolemy, his pupil, reigned, or to the province of Africa, which P. Accius Varus had seized before the battle of Pharsalia; after having killed Curio, whom Cæsar had sent against him, and cut his army in pieces. He therefore resolved to hasten after him, and, having taken all his men on board, set sail, steering his course towards Africa. Before he embarked, he gave those, who were not willing to follow him, free liberty to depart and return to Italy. On his arrival in Africa, he found there Sextus, Pompey's younger son, who gave him an account of his father's tragical death in Egypt. This news occasioned a general consternation among the troops; but nevertheless they all declared with one voice, that they were ready to shed the last drop of their blood in defence of their common liberties, and that, after Pompey, they would follow no other leader but Cato. Out of compassion therefore to so many brave men, who had given such proofs of a sincere love for their country, and whom he was ashamed to abandon, in a strange country amidst so many difficulties, he took upon him the command, and, without delay, marched towards the city of Cyrene, which received him, tho' the inhabitants had a few days before shut their gates against Labiens. Here he was informed, that Scipio, Pompey's father-in-law, had landed before him in Africa, and taken refuge in the dominions of Juba king of Mauritania, where he had found Accius, or, as Plutarch calls him, Appius Varus, at the head of a considerable army. Hereupon Cato resolved to go and join them; and accordingly, having loaded a great many beasts of burden with water and other necessary provisions, he set out on his march, which was attended with inexpressible difficulties. His troops travelled for several days together through inhospitable deserts, covered with burning sands, and infested by lions, tigers, serpents of a monstrous size, &c. (F); so that they were obliged to be constantly on their guard night and day. Thus they marched seven days together, Cato himself being always the foremost, to encourage his men, who were quite exhausted, by his example. Plutarch tells, that since the battle of Pharsalia, he had never mounted on horseback, nor rid in a chariot; and that, to shew his concern, he had, ever since that fatal day, used to sit at table, saying, That he never lay down but to sleep (G). The soldiers, animated by the example of their leader, cheerfully surmounted all difficulties, and arrived at length, to the number of ten thousand men, at Utica. There a warm dispute arose among the chief officers about the command of the army. Varus, who immediately joined Cato, together with Scipio and other senators of distinction, claimed the command as governor of Africa; which province had been allotted him by Pompey himself. On the other hand, the whole army demanded Cato for their leader; and even Varus and Scipio were willing to comply with their desire: But Cato himself opposed his own promotion, saying, That he would not transgress those laws, which he had taken arms to defend,

and was solemnly acknowledged by the senate and people for a citizen of Rome. It was customary for foreigners honoured with this distinction, to assume the name of the person they chose for their patron; and agreeable to this custom Balbus took the name of Cornelius, having chosen Lentulus, who was of the Cornelian family, for his patron. Before the war broke out between Cæsar and Pompey, one Theophanes, a great favourite of the latter, adopted Balbus, and appointed him his heir. Sidonius Apollinaris commends some memoirs written by Balbus after the manner of a journal: Quis Balbi ephemeridem, says he, fando adæquaverit (34)?

(F) Plutarch tells us, that Cato took with him on his march some of those who were called Pfilli, and made it their business to cure the biting of serpents, by sucking out the poison. This is no extraordinary matter; for we read in Homer, that, in ancient times, wounds were cured by sucking. But these Pfilli pretended, as we read in Plutarch, to a power of enchanting the serpents, and disarming them of their fury, by stupifying them and laying them asleep. We find in holy scripture instances of persons, who pretended to that power, which they vaunted as miraculous. Upon this is founded, what we read in Jeremiah; For, behold, I will send serpents, cockatrices among you, which will not be charmed (35). But these wretched enchanters often paid dear for their presumption.

(G) This was a token of mourning, which we know not what to make of now-a-days. On the contrary, we should think a lying posture at our meals very inconvenient; but this single example of Cato incontestably proves, that it was preferred in those days, and that sitting at table was looked upon as a very incommodious posture.

a defend; and that he, who was only proprætor, ought not to command in the presence of Scipio, who was proconsul. He added, that every one would look upon it as a good omen, to see a Scipio at the head of a Roman army in Africa, and that the very name would inspire the soldiers with courage. Cato's words decided the dispute; all readily yielded to Scipio, who, being declared commander in chief of all the forces of the republic in Africa, appointed Labienus, who had distinguished himself in several wars under Cæsar, his first lieutenant. Juba, king of Mauritania, no sooner heard of Cato's arrival, than he came to Utica, to confer with him and the other officers. That prince had always shewn a great attachment to Pompey and his party; but, as he now thought they could not well do without him, he assumed an air of grandeur and pride, which gave great offence to Cato. The first time he had an interview with Cato and Scipio, he ordered his own seat to be placed in the middle; which Cato observing, he took up his own chair, and placed himself on the other side of Scipio, to whom he thus gave the most honourable place. Such was the pride and haughtiness of those republicans, even at the time their republic was ready to sink, if not supported by foreign states and princes. Under Scipio were several officers of great distinction and experience in war, namely, Labienus, Afranius, Petreius, the two sons of Pompey, Cneius and Sextus, Faustus Sylla, who had married their sister, besides a great number of senators and knights, all resolved to prefer death to the loss of their liberty, and either save the republic, or fall with it. King Juba promised to assist them to the utmost of his power, and join them with all his forces, as soon as the season of the year would allow him to take the field^c.

Cæsar, now master of all Asia, Greece, Egypt, and Italy, resolved to carry the war forthwith into Africa, and there crush the remains of Pompey's party; but while he was making the necessary preparations for that expedition, news was brought him, that the tenth legion, which he had always favoured in a particular manner, had openly revolted, and killed Galba and Cosconius, two officers of the senatorial order, who had endeavoured to appease them. Cæsar, surprised at this unexpected attempt of his favourite legion, immediately dispatched Crispus Sallustius, the famous historian, to quell the sedition with his eloquence, and bring back the mutinous legion to their duty. Sallust had great obligations to Cæsar, who had caused him to be appointed one of the ten prætors in the late election, after having restored him to his place in the senate, which he had forfeited by his infamous debaucheries. He therefore flew to Capua, where the mutineers were then encamped: but found it a more difficult task to appease a seditious soldiery, than to harange a disarmed multitude. He was forced to save himself by flight from their fury, and hasten back to Rome, to acquaint Cæsar, that the rebellious legion, without hearkening to any terms, were in full march towards the capital. The dictator, amazed at their boldness, placed guards at the gates of the city, on the ramparts, and in all open places; and then, as they drew near, sent some trusty officers to ask them what they wanted. Their ring-leaders answered, that they wanted to speak with Cæsar himself. Let them come into the city then, replied Cæsar, and appear in the field of Mars, without any other arms but their swords. Upon this, being admitted within the walls, they marched in good order to the appointed place, and there waited for Cæsar, who, without hearkening to the advice of his friends, went immediately to hear their complaints. The presence of a general, famous for so many victories, inspired them with such awe and respect, that even the boldest among them could not utter a single word. Then Cæsar, mounting his tribunal, encouraged them to speak and lay their complaints before him. Hereupon they took courage, and begged him to discharge them, alledged their age, their wounds, and their long service. As Cæsar was entering on a new war, they expected he would have courted them, and with large presents inticed them to follow him. They were therefore thunder-struck, when he answered, without shewing the least surprise or concern, Your demand is just; I do discharge you, and you may be gone. Cæsar, perceiving the consternation and surprise these words occasioned among them, after having kept silence for some time, added, I do not, however, design to rob you of your rewards; these I will give you, when I shall have triumphed over the rest of my enemies. At these words they crowded round his tribunal, begging, that, since he intended to reward them, he would suffer them to deserve the promised rewards with further services. But Cæsar, without seeming to take notice of their demand, demand, Go, fellow-citizens, said he, return to your houses and families. The word fellow-citizens, instead of fellow-soldiers, was like a clap of thunder in their ears. They all cried out, that they were soldiers, that they had not accepted of their discharge, and that they would follow him into Africa. But Cæsar, pretending to despise both their offers and submissions, turned his back upon them, and came down from his tribunal. Then the legionaries, throwing themselves at his feet, conjured him rather to inflict such punishments upon them as their insolence deserved, than to disband them in so shameful a manner. He continued long inflexible; but at length, pretending to be overcome by the importunity of his friends, he ascended the tribunal once more, and, addressing himself to them, told them, That the revolt surprised him so much the more, as it came from a legion, which he had always distinguished above the rest; that nevertheless he could not prevail upon himself to punish those, whom he had once so tenderly loved; that, on his return from Africa, he would give them the rewards he had promised, and lands too for their subsistence; but that he would not by any means suffer them to attend him in the expedition he was now undertaking, in order to convince them that he could conquer without them. This speech made so deep an impression on their minds, that, with tears in their eyes, they begged he would rather decimate them than debar them from sharing with him the glory of his victories. We will follow you as volunteers, they all cried out with one voice, if you refuse to admit us in the number of your legions. These words, which were manifestly spoken from a true sense of their crime, and a sincere repentance, touched Cæsar; he could no longer dissemble, but styling them again fellow-soldiers, he not only freely forgave them, but declared, that they should share with him both the glory and advantages of all his victories. Having thus by his intrepidity, resolution, and address, regained the affections and confidence of the rebellious legion, he pursued with great ardour the necessary preparations of the new war in Africa, ordering his legions in the mean time to assemble at Rhegium, the place of the general rendezvous.

He passes over into Sicily.

Thither he repaired soon after himself, and finding there but one legion of new levies and six hundred horse, with them he crossed over into Sicily, leaving orders for the other legions to follow him with all possible expedition. On his arrival in Sicily, he incamped on the shore, declaring, that he was determined to set sail, as soon as the wind proved favourable, without waiting for the five legions and a body of two thousand horse, who were in full march to join him. Accordingly on the sixth of the calends of January, that is, on the thirteenth of September, according to the computation which then obtained, the wind blowing fair, he embarked the troops he had with him, and in the evening weighed anchor, leaving orders with Alienus prætor of Sicily, to convey over to him the other legions, as soon as they came up. In four days he arrived off Adrumetum on the coast of Africa; and having landed his troops at a small distance from that city, by the advice of Plancus, one of his lieutenants he sent to summon Considius, who commanded in the place, to deliver it up to him; but Considius, trusting in his numerous garison, which consisted of two legions and three thousand Mauritanian horse, killed with his own hand the messenger, and then marched out at the head of all his troops to attack Cæsar in the camp he had formed in great haste, and consequently but very indifferently fortified. Cæsar thought it adviseable to abandon his camp, and retire in good order, marching along the coast towards Ruspina, at a small distance from Adrumetum. Considius pursued him, and greatly harassed his troops on their march. On this occasion it was, that thirty Gaulish horse, who marched in the rear, put to flight two thousand Mauritanian horse, and drove them back to the very gates of Adrumetum. Cæsar with much ado reached Ruspina, being continually harassed by the enemy's parties; but not finding sufficient provisions in that neighbourhood to subsist his army, he turned towards Leptis, situate on the coast between the two Syrtes. As Leptis was a free city, the inhabitants opened their gates to him, and supplied his army in the best manner they could. He had not been long here, before part of the troops he expected from Sicily arrived on board some galleys and a small number of transports. These informed him, that the rest of the fleet were steering their course towards Utica; which gave Cæsar great uneasiness, that city being in the hands of the enemy. He therefore immediately dispatched Rabirius Posthumius, with orders to sail along the coast, and direct to Leptis such of his vessels as he should meet on his course. In the mean time,

- a as the enemy were masters of the country, and Cæsar in a manner besieged in Leptis, ^{Is greatly distressed for want of provisions.} his army was reduced to great straits for want of provisions; forage especially was become so scarce, that he was forced to feed his horses with a sea-weed, which he mixed with grass, to take off its saltiness. He sent out indeed several parties to bring in provisions; but they had always the misfortune to fall in with the enemy, who narrowly watched their motions, and return with great loss. One day a party of horse, whom he sent out to forage, meeting an African, who played with great art on the flute, dismounted to hear him, leaving the care of their horses to their servants; but, in the mean time, the enemy falling upon them unexpectedly, cut most of them in pieces, and pursued the rest to their camp; which they would have entered with ^{Several of his parties defeated.} the fugitives, had not Cæsar and Asinius Pollio, at the head of a few cohorts, put a stop to their flight, by placing themselves in the gate of the camp, and by that means obliging the horse to face the enemy. In another encounter, which happened a few days after, the best part of Cæsar's foot was put to flight by a strong detachment from Scipio's army. On this occasion Cæsar, seeing one of the standard-bearers flying with the rest, taking hold of him by the collar, forced him to face about, saying, Look that way; the enemy is there. However, he could not prevail upon his frightened troops to stand their ground; but was forced himself to give way, and retire with them in no small disorder to his camp. As he was daily more and more straitened for want of provisions, and durst not venture out of his camp with the few forces he had with him, he resolved to go himself in quest of his fleet; and accordingly embarking in the dead of the night, he set sail, attended only with a small number of officers. The next day, when the soldiery missed him, they gave all up for lost, and it was with the utmost difficulty that the lieutenants, tribunes, and centurions kept them from abandoning their camp and deserting to Scipio, who, with ten legions and twenty elephants, was advancing against them. But their fears were soon calmed; for Cæsar, the next day meeting by good fortune the rest of his fleet, returned with them to Leptis, and decamped as soon as they were landed, with a design to advance farther into the country. He had scarce marched three miles, when his scouts brought ^{Meets Labienus.} him word, that the enemy appeared; and soon after he discovered a very numerous army, which covered the whole plain, advancing in good order towards him. Cæsar immediately ordered his men to halt, and having drawn them up in one line, to prevent their being surrounded, waited in order of battle to receive the enemy's first onset. This numerous body of Roman and Mauritanian forces was commanded by Labienus, who attacked Cæsar with such fury, that he had need of all his courage and experience, to prevent his troops from flying back to their camp, and leaving the enemy master of the field. He was surrounded on all sides, and would have been cut in pieces with all his men, had not a soldier of the tenth legion, by killing Labienus's ^{His army in danger of being cut in pieces.} horse, occasioned some confusion among the enemy's battalions. Those who were next to the general, seeing him fall and believing him dead, gave ground, and began to retire. Cæsar, observing the consternation they were in, advanced at the head of a choice body of legionaries, and attacking with great intrepidity and resolution the enemy's first line, put them to flight, before Labienus, who was stunned with his fall, recovered himself; but as Labienus's second line still kept their ground, Cæsar thought ^{Retires in good order to his camp.} it adviseable not to attack them, but march back in good order to his camp, before the first line could rally, which they were attempting to do, being commanded by officers of great experience and conduct. As Cæsar was retreating, M. Petreius and Cneius Piso, two zealous partizans of Pompey, appeared unexpectedly at the head of eleven hundred Numidian horse and a numerous body of light-armed infantry, and fell upon his rear. We are told, that Petreius on this occasion, remembering the favours he had formerly received at Cæsar's hands, spared his benefactor, under the pretence that he ought not to rob his general of the glory of completing the victory. Be that as it will, Cæsar got safe to his camp at Leptis, and from thence marched the same night to Ruspina. In the mean time, Scipio joined his lieutenant Labienus with eight legions and four thousand horse; and then Cæsar, intrenching himself under the walls of Ruspina, dispatched messenger after messenger to Italy and Sicily, acquainting his friends with the danger he was in, and intreating them to send him speedy succours, without which he should be obliged to abandon Africa, and return with shame and disgrace to Italy. Alienus, prætor of Sicily, upon the first notice of his danger, sent him powerful succours; which were no sooner arrived, than he resolved ^{Receives reinforcements from Sicily.} to march out of his camp and offer Scipio battle, who, with an army twice as numerous

rous as his, was incamped at a small distance, to prevent his drawing any forage or provisions from the neighbouring country. Cato, who commanded in Utica, being informed of the enemy's motions, wrote a letter to Scipio, advising him, as he had before done Pompey, by no means to hazard a battle, with a commander experienced in war and encouraged with success; but to use delay, which, he said, would cool the heats and passions of men, which are the chief support and strength of usurpers; but Scipio, flushed with his late success, not only rejected his advice, but wrote a letter to him, wherein he reproached him with cowardice, since he was not content himself to lie secure within walls and trenches, but must hinder others from making use of their courage, and laying hold of the opportunities of conquering which offered. Then Cato openly declared, that he was sorry he had yielded the command to Scipio, who, said he, will not use his power wisely in war, and if he should, contrary to all appearance, succeed, will, without all doubt, use his success as unjustly at home; nay, he even told his friends, That, if Scipio should conquer, he did not doubt, but he would prove as cruel and arbitrary a tyrant as Cæsar himself.

BUT, to return to Cæsar: being informed that the enemy laid great stress on an oracle, importing, that the family of the Scipios should be always victorious in Africa, and having in his army a mean and contemptible man of that family, known by the name of Scipio Salutio, he gave him the title of general; either in raillery, as Plutarch observes, to ridicule Scipio, who commanded the enemy's army, or seriously, to bring over the omen to his side. After this, he quitted his camp at Ruspina, and marched straight to Utica, with a design to draw the enemy to a general engagement, by threatening to lay siege to that city, which was the great magazine of all their provisions and ammunition. He incamped before the place, without being in the least disturbed by the enemy, who were unwilling to engage before the arrival of Juba king of Mauritania, whom they daily expected with eighteen thousand foot, eight hundred horse, and thirty elephants. At length the king arrived with the expected succours, and, together with Scipio and Labienus, formed three different camps, which in a manner blocked up that of Cæsar, who was again greatly distressed for want of provisions, the enemy having laid waste all the neighbouring country. While he was thus besieged, news was brought him, that the ninth and tenth legions were at length arrived from Sicily, and in full march to join him. Hereupon Cæsar, leaving in his camp a sufficient number of troops to defend his works, marched out with the rest to meet them, and brought them safe to his camp before Utica. As he now thought himself strong enough to cope with the enemy, he drew out his forces in order of battle for several days together; but the enemy not accepting the challenge, he resolved to decamp, and, leaving Utica, which was in a condition to sustain a long siege, to attack Thapsus, a place of great importance, but not so well provided and fortified. Juba, Scipio, and Labienus followed him, and incamped separately about fifteen hundred paces from the enemy. Cæsar was no sooner informed that they were intrenching themselves, than he marched out of his camp, and making his way with incredible expedition, through thick woods and a country almost impassable, fell upon Scipio's men, before they had completed their works, put them to flight, and then attacking first Labienus's camp, and afterwards Juba's, made himself master of them, and killed fifty thousand of the enemy in the three camps, with the loss only of fifty of his own men. After this battle, Thapsus, Adrumetum, and Zama immediately submitted; and the heads of the party, giving all up for lost, either laid violent hands on themselves, or were taken and put to death by the enemy. Scipio endeavoured to save himself by sea; but his vessel being taken, he chose rather to die, than owe his life to the conqueror. Juba and Petreius sought death in a single combat, in which Juba being killed, Petreius ordered one of his slaves to dispatch him. Afranius and Sylla, with a small body of troops, took their rout along the coast of Africa, with a design to join the two sons of Pompey, whom Cato had sent into Spain; but were met, defeated, and taken by Sitius, one of Cæsar's lieutenants, who would have saved them; but his soldiers in a mutiny cut them in pieces. Of all the heads of Pompey's party, Labienus alone found means to make his escape, and convey himself safe into Spain. And now the enemy's forces being dispersed, and their leaders either fled or killed, all Africa submitted, except the city of Utica, where Cato commanded, and had formed a kind of senate, composed of three hundred Romans, who had repaired to him from different parts.

- a part. The news of the victory gained by Cæsar at Thapsus threw the whole city into the utmost consternation. Some of the citizens betook themselves to their arms; others thought of nothing but how to save themselves from falling into the hands of the conqueror. But Cato endeavoured to calm their fears, representing to them, that perhaps things were not so bad in truth, but more than half increased by fame, as is usual in war. Thus he quelled the tumult for some time; and having called together his senate or council, consisting of three hundred Roman citizens he first commended their courage and fidelity, and then intreated them by no means to separate, since, while they kept together, Cæsar would have less reason to despise them, if they fought against him, and be more ready to pardon them, if they submitted to him. Consult among your selves, said he; if you think fit to submit, I will impute your resolution to necessity; but if you resolve to stand up in defence of your rights and liberties, I will be your companion, and, if you think fit, your leader. We are to fight against one, whose affairs are not in so good a condition as is generally believed. Spain has already declared for the sons of Pompey; Rome, unaccustomed to slavery and oppression, will be ready to shake off the yoke upon every turn of affairs; Italy will never submit to a sovereign, who acknowledges no other law but his own caprice; Utica is well furnished with all sorts of provisions and military engines, and in a condition to stem the course of this mighty conqueror's victories. Let us therefore defend to the last what ought to be more dear to us than our lives and fortunes. Notwithstanding the uncertainty of war, we shall lead a most happy life, if we succeed, or die a most glorious death, if we miscarry. Cato's words inspired even the most cowardly with courage. They forgot the present danger, and declared with one voice, that they would stand a siege, protesting they would rather die with Cato, than save themselves by abandoning a person of such exalted virtue. When they came to deliberate about the proper measures for the defence of the place, some were for setting the slaves at liberty; but this Cato opposed, saying, That no slave ought to be set at liberty without the consent of his master. We ought not, said he, even in our present circumstances, to make free with the property of others; but let every one dispose as he pleases of what is his own. Some of the senators immediately set their slaves at liberty, and furnished them with arms; but the greater part of them, forgetting their former resolution, shewed great backwardness in parting with their slaves, from whose labour they drew great advantages. Why should we risque all, said they among themselves, to preserve Utica? Have we forgot what enemy we have to deal with? Is it not that Cæsar, to whom all the power of Rome has submitted? and which of us is a Pompey, a Scipio, or a Cato? Now that all men give way to Cæsar's fortune, shall we alone engage for the liberty of Rome, and in Utica declare war against one, who has driven Pompey the Great and Cato himself out of Italy? No, let us know ourselves, submit to the conqueror, and send deputies to implore his mercy. Cato, tho' he perceived the change, took no notice of it; but wrote to Juba, who, with a small body of men, was retired to a neighbouring mountain, and to Scipio, who lay at anchor under a promontory near Utica, advising them not to come near the place, since he suspected the fidelity both of the inhabitants and of the senators who formed his council. Not long after, a considerable body of horse, who had escaped from the battle, appearing at some distance from Utica, sent a messenger to acquaint Cato with the different sentiments that prevailed among them, and to ask his advice; for some were for joining him; others, not caring to lock themselves up in the city, were for going to Juba. Cato hastened out to confer with their leaders, whom he intreated not to abandon so many worthy senators, but to seek the mutual safety of one another, and to come into the city, which was impregnable and well furnished with corn and other provisions for many years. The senators likewise, who attended Cato, with tears in their eyes besought them to stay. Hereupon the officers went to consult the soldiers; but, in the mean time, news was brought to Cato, that the greater part of his senators were raising a tumult in the city, and stirring up the inhabitants to exclude Cato and send deputies to Cæsar. This news being immediately divulged among the horse, they desired their officers to return to Cato with this answer, That they should not be afraid of Cæsar, while they followed Cato, whom they were ready to join, provided he would either drive out of the city, or cut in pieces, all the Uticans, who would not fail to betray them and plot their ruin, as soon as Cæsar appeared. This condition seemed too cruel to the virtuous Cato, who therefore chose rather to deprive himself of so powerful and necessary a supply, than consent to it. Upon his return to the city, the senators of his council openly declared, that they were neither able nor willing to withstand Cæsar; nay, they even threatened to seize those senators, who were for standing a siege, and to deliver them up to Cæsar. Hereupon Cato with much-ado prevailed upon the horse to stay, at least one night, in the city, in order to facilitate the escape of those worthy senators, who were thus threatened by the rest. While they were preparing to set out, news was brought, that Cæsar was drawing near with his whole army; and then Cato, ordering all the gates to be shut, except one towards the sea, attended his friends to the port, and putting them on board some vessels he had prepared for that purpose, he returned to the city, and dismissed the body of horse, advising several of his friends to join them, and abandon a city, which would soon fall into the enemy's hands. Plutarch observes, that tho' he was very pressing with his other friends to save themselves by flight, yet he gave no such advice to his son, not thinking fit to persuade him to abandon his father. As Cæsar drew near, the senators, who remained in Utica, appointed Lucius Cæsar, a relation of the conqueror, who had followed Pompey's party, to intercede for them and make their submissions to the dictator. Cato approved of their choice, and even composed the speech, with which he was to address Cæsar. Lucius, in taking his leave of Cato, told him, That he should not scruple to kiss the hands and fall at the knees of Cæsar in his behalf; but Cato would by no means give him leave so much as to mention his name. I will not, said he, be indebted to a tyrant, for those very things which are marks of tyranny: to save men is an instance of his tyranny, as if he were lord of their lives. However, as Lucius was departing, he recommended to him his son and the rest of his friends, and, tenderly embracing him, bid him farewell. While the rest were preparing to attend Lucius in the habit of suppliants, Cato was greatly surprised at the constancy of a young Roman, named Statilius, who, tho' in the flower of his age and a noted enemy to Cæsar, declared, That he would rather die, than be indebted to an usurper for his life. Cato, having attempted in vain to persuade him to yield to fortune and join the other suppliants, recommended him to Apollonides and Demetrius, two celebrated philosophers, saying, It belongs to you to bring down this young man's spirit, and to make him know what is good for him (H). Towards the evening, he ordered the gates of the city to be opened, exhorting both the Romans and inhabitants to go out, and meeting the conqueror, throw themselves upon his mercy. As for himself, he went, according to his custom, to bathe before supper; and while he was in the bath, remembering Statilius, he cried out aloud to the philosopher Apollonides, who always attended him, Well, Apollonides, have you brought down the high spirit of Statilius? Is he gone without bidding us farewell? No, answered the philosopher, I have discoursed much with him, but to little purpose; he is still unalterable, and determined to follow your example. This, answered Cato with a smile, will soon be tried. He then called his son, and advised him, among other things, never to intermeddle in affairs of state; telling him, That to act therein as became him was now impossible, and to do otherwise dishonourable.

AFTER he had bathed, he went to supper, at which he sat, as he had always used to do ever since the battle of Pharsalia, contrary to the Roman custom. Several of his particular friends, and some of the principle citizens of Utica, supped with him. Among the former were Apollonides the stoic philosopher and Demetrius the peripatetic. After supper, many philosophical questions were discussed, and, among the rest, those fundamental principles, which were called the paradoxes of the stoics; and this in particular, that the good man only is free, and that all wicked men are slaves. The moment this was proposed, the peripatetic took up the argument against it (I); but Cato, raising his voice, maintained the incontestable truth of that maxim with more than ordinary warmth; and, in the heat of the dispute, let some words drop, which plainly shewed, that he designed to put an end to his life, and by that means set himself at liberty. Hereupon, when he had done speaking, the whole company kept silence and seemed much dejected; but Cato, to divert them from any suspicion of his design, turned the discourse, and began again to talk of the present affairs, shewing

(H) By these words Cato implied, that the disposition of mind, in which Statilius fancied himself to be, was rather the effect of vain-glory, than true constancy; and that what became Cato, who had always made a profession of severe virtue and was Cæsar's equal, did not become such a young man as Statilius. Epictetus observes, that it is only for an extraordinary person to imitate an extraordinary virtue. It is not fitting for a person of common size to attempt so high a flight.

(I) The peripatetics maintained, that neither virtue nor vice had any relation to freedom or servitude, taking these words in a sense too constrained and literal.

a shewing great concern for his friends who were at sea, and for those who were travelling by land, since they were to pass through a dry desert, which afforded nothing for their support.

WHEN the company broke up, he walked with his friends, as he used to do after supper, gave the necessary orders to the officers of the guard, and then withdrew, having first embraced his son and every one of his friends, with more than usual tenderness. As this renewed their suspicion of his design, his son, entering his room unknown to him, stole away his sword, which he used to have always by him. Cato Reads Plato's phædo. now alone, lay down, and taking up Plato's dialogue on the immortality of the soul, began to read it with great attention. After he had read some time, in a transport of joy, which the hope of a happy immortality raised in his breast, he looked up for his sword, and missing it, called one of his slaves; and, without shewing the least eagerness or concern, only asked him, Who had taken away his sword? As the slave made no answer, he continued reading; and a little while after, not seeming importunate or hasty for it, but as if he would only know what was become of it, he ordered it to be brought to him. He then took up the book again, and having finished the whole dialogue without any tidings of his sword, he called all his servants one by one, and in an angry tone demanded it of them, crying out, That he was betrayed and delivered into his enemy's hands, naked and disarmed. One of his slaves attempted to appease him; but he had scarce begun to speak, when Cato gave him such a blow on the mouth, that he hurt his own hand. At this noise his son and the rest of his friends came running into his room, and, falling at his feet, endeavoured, with tears and intreaties, to divert him from any design he might have on his own life; but Cato, raising himself up, Why does no body persuade me by reason, said he, or teach me what is better, if I have designed any thing that is ill? Must I be thus disarmed, and hindered from making use of my own reason? Then turning to his son, And you, young man, said he, why do you not tie your father's hands behind his back, that when Cæsar comes, I may not be able to hurt him? for against myself I stand in no want of a sword; to end my days I need but hold my breath a little while, or strike my head against the wall. Having thus spoke, he dismissed his son and the rest of his friends, except the two philosophers Demetrius and Apollonides, to whom he addressed himself more calmly thus: Can you bring any reason to prove, that it is not base and unworthy of Cato to beg his life of his enemy? I have not yet determined any thing on this subject; but I would have it in my power to perform what I shall think fit to resolve on. As the philosophers made no reply, which indeed they could not without contradicting their own principles, Cato told them, That he would not fail to ask their advice, when he should have occasion to make use of what their philosophy taught; but, in the mean time, said he, go tell my son, that he should not compel his father to what he cannot persuade him. Upon this they both withdrew, and sent him his sword by a young slave. Cato took it with great pleasure, and, having drawn it and examined the point, said in putting it up, Now I am master of myself. He then took the book again, and having read it twice over (K), he lay down, and fell into a sound sleep. About midnight he called

(K) And yet this dialogue seems too long to be read twice over in so short a space; but that which seems most incomprehensible is, that Cato, before he laid violent hands on himself, should read over that dialogue, which proves in the strongest terms, that what he was going to do was not lawful. A philosopher, says Plato in that dialogue, will never lay violent hands on himself, that not being lawful even for those to whom death is more desirous than life. They are not allowed to procure that remedy to themselves, tho' it be ever so necessary; for God has placed us in this life as in a post, which we are never to quit without his permission. The gods take care of us, and we must consider ourselves as their peculiar property. If one of your slaves should dispatch himself without your command, you would think he had done you an injury, and would punish him, if it lay in your power. How could Cato persist in his resolution against such strong arguments? He might possibly justify himself from what is added by Socrates; We must wait with patience till it pleases God to send us an express order to remove out of this life. He looked perhaps on the condition he was then in as such an order; and thus has Cicero commented upon it in the first book of his Tusculan questions: Cato autem sic abiit e vita, ut causam moriendi natum se esse gauderet. Vetat enim dominans ille in nobis deus injussu hinc nos suodemigrare; cum vero causam justam deus ipse dederit, ut tunc Socrati, nunc Catoni, sæpe multis, næ ille, medius fidius, vir sapiens lætus ex his tenebris in lucem illam excesserit; nec tamen ille vincula carceris ruperit, leges enim vetant; sed tanquam a magistratu, aut ab aliqua potestate legitima, sic a deo evocatus atque emissus exierit. But this trifling distinction destroys the very end and design of the dialogue. If it was left to every one to explain, as he thought fit, the state he is in, and interpret it as an express order from God to quit his station, the prohibition of self-murder would be unnecessary, since a reason would never be wanting upon occasion to justify it; therefore this action in Cato is not by any means warrantable. However, it must be allowed, that it was less criminal in him, than it can be in those, who destroy themselves for some private reasons, when called up two of his freed-men, Cleanthes, his physician, and Butas, whom he chiefly employed in public affairs. The latter he sent to the port, to see whether his friends had set sail, and ordered the former to apply some remedy to his hand that was hurt by the blow he gave his slave. At this they were all overjoyed, hoping he had laid aside all thoughts of putting an end to his life. Butas soon came back, and brought him word, that all his friends were imbarqued, except Crassus, who had staid on account of some business, but was just ready to depart. He added, that the wind was high, and the sea very rough. At this he sighed, shewing a great deal of compassion for those who were at sea, and sent again Butas to see, whether any of them were driven back and wanted his assistance. In the mean time, he again fell asleep, and did not wake till day began to appear; when Butas returning, acquainted him, that the storm was allayed, and that no noise was heard in the port. Then Cato, laying himself down again, as if he intended to sleep, desired Butas to withdraw and shut the door after him. He was no sooner gone, than the zealous republican, as if he had waited till those of his party were out of danger, taking his sword, ran it into his body; but not being able to use his hand so well which had been hurt, he did not die immediately of the wound, but fell upon his bed, and threw down a table on which he had drawn some figures of geometry. The noise of this alarmed his son and his friends, who, breaking into the room, found him weltering in his blood, with his bowels in great part out of his body. Such a dreadful sight and his ghastly looks, his eyes being yet open, struck them all with so great terror, that they stood some time motionless, without being able, in that surprize and confusion, to lend him the least assistance. At length Butas accosting him, put in his bowels, which were not hurt, and sewed up the wound; but Cato, after some time, coming to himself, thrust away the physician, rent open his wound again, and, tearing his bowels, expired immediately, in the forty-eighth, or, as others will have it, in the fifty-fifth year of his age. He was one of the most virtuous citizens Rome ever produced, had all the virtues, and none of the faults, of Cato the censor, one of his illustrious ancestors, and would, with his invincible constancy and resolution, have supported the sinking republic, had not the gods themselves, as Plutarch observes, decreed her destruction. His death was no sooner known, than the inhabitants of Utica flocked to his house, calling him their benefactor, their deliverer, the only free, the only invincible, Roman. Tho' at that very instant word was brought them, that Cæsar was drawing near, yet neither fear of the present danger, nor the commotions and discord which reigned among them, nor even the eagerness each of them had of making their court to the conqueror, could divert them from burying his body with the utmost pomp, and paying all the funeral honours that were due to a person of his merit and rank. How strong must the impressions have been, which the virtue of Cato left in their minds, since they thus openly honoured his memory at the approach of his enemy, who was victorious, and upon whose mercy they were that moment to throw themselves! When Cæsar, who was now at the very gates of Utica with all his forces, heard of Cato's death, he is said to have uttered these words; Cato, I envy thee thy death, since thou hast envied me the glory of saving thy life (L). Upon Cato's death, the city of Utica was by Lucius Cæsar delivered up to the conqueror, who pardoned some, but caused others to be privately put to death. Among the latter was Lucius Cæsar himself, when overwhelmed with grief, pinched with poverty, overcome with fear, or some other passion; for there is a wide difference, in our opinion, between the pusillanimity of such and the despair of a brave man, who kills himself, not for any private reason, but, if the expression may be allowed, for some reason of state; for tho' the action carries in it a brutal fury and the blind impulse of an ungovernable passion; yet, as Plutarch has well observed on another subject, where he compares Romulus and Theseus, he is more excuseable, who is transported by a stronger cause, as by a more severe stroke. And what stroke can be more severe than the ruin of our country?

(L) Plutarch seems to question whether Cæsar would have pardoned Cato or no. The discourse, says that writer, which Cæsar wrote against Cato, is no great sign of his kindness, or that he was inclined to shew him any favour. Is it probable, adds

he, that Cæsar would have been tender of his life, when he was so bitter against his memory? But, with Plutarch's leave, we are of opinion, that Cæsar would have spared him, as he did Cicero, Brutus, Marcellus, his most inveterate enemy, and many others, not indeed out of any friendship he had for him, but out of vanity, and perhaps policy. As for the book mentioned by Plutarch, Cæsar wrote it not out of hatred to Cato, but in his own vindication. Cicero had written an encomium on Cato, and called it by his name. A discourse composed by so great a master, upon such an excellent subject, was immediately in every body's hands. This touched Cæsar to the quick; for he looked upon a panegyric on his enemy, who chose rather to kill himself than fall into his hands, as no better than a satire against himself. He therefore published an answer to it, containing a collection of charges and accusations against that great man, which he styled Anticato.

a himself, who had treated with great cruelty such of Cæsar's adherents, as he had got into his power during the war; among the former were Cato's son, his daughter, Statilius, and most of his friends. His son was afterwards slain in the battle of Philippi, with more glory than he had lived; for we are told, that he led a debauched life, and that being lodged, while he stayed in Cappadocia, in the house of Marphadates, one of the royal family, he maintained a criminal conversation with his wife, by name Psyche, which in Greek signifies soul. This gave the Romans occasion to say by way of raillery, That Cato and Marphadates were good friends; for they had but one soul; that Cato was noble and generous, and had a royal soul, &c. Cato's daughter was married to Brutus, one of the conspirators, and ended her life as became one of her birth and family, as we shall relate in a more proper place. As for Statilius, b who affected to imitate Cato, he was prevented by the philosophers from putting an end to his life; but he afterwards followed Brutus, to whom he proved very faithful and serviceable, and at length died, with many other illustrious Romans, in the battle of Philippi ^w.

Cæsar, now master of Utica, and of the whole Roman province in Africa, marched into Numidia and Mauritania, and reduced both those kingdoms to Roman provinces, appointing Crispus Sallustius to govern them in quality of proconsul, with private instructions to pillage and plunder the inhabitants, and by that means put it out of their power ever to shake of the yoke. The fruitful plains of Numidia he divided among c the soldiers of P. Silius, who had reduced great part of that country. Silius, being driven out of Rome, we know not on what account, had taken refuge in Mauritania, and there assembled a considerable number of Roman exiles, with whom he entered into the service of Bogud, a petty king of Mauritania, then at war with Juba. Bogud appointed him commander in chief of all his forces; which trust he discharged with great fidelity, invading Juba's dominions, and making himself master even of Cirta his capital. This diversion was of great use to Cæsar; for it obliged Juba to leave great part of his forces at home, under the command of Sabura, one of his best generals, to defend his own kingdom; but, during his absence, Silius, having defeated and killed Sabura, made himself master of the whole country, and then marched with his vic- d torious army to join Cæsar, whom he scarce knew. On his march he met a body of Romans, who had saved themselves from the battle of Thapsus, under the command of Afranius and Faustus Sylla, defeated them, and took their leaders prisoners, together with Sylla's wife the daughter of Pompey, whom he delivered up to Cæsar, who not only pardoned her, but sent her into Spain to her brothers. Soon after Silius's fleet surprised in the port of Hippo the squadron which was conveying into Italy Scipio and other Romans, who had left Utica, and took most of them prisoners. Scipio laid violent hands on himself; but the rest were brought to Silius, who consigned them to Cæsar. These services the dictator rewarded with a fruitful country bordering on Numidia, which he bestowed on Silius, appointing him sovereign of that district, after having driven out a Numidian prince named Manasses, who had declared for Juba, and served in his army against Cæsar ^e.

AND now Cæsar, having brought all Africa under subjection and settled the affairs of that province, repaired to Utica, where his fleet waited for him. There he gave orders for the rebuilding of Carthage, as he did soon after his return to Italy for the rebuilding of Corinth; so that these two famous cities were destroyed in the same year, and in the same year raised out of their ruins, in which they had lain about a hundred years. Two years after they were both re-peopled with Roman colonies; and from these new inhabitants of Corinth were descended those Corinthians, to whom St. Paul wrote his two epistles. As the dictator had now no enemy to contend with in Africa, he left that country, loaded with glory and spoils, and set sail for Italy on the ides of June, that is, on the fourteenth of the Julian April; and arriving three days after at Caralos, now Cagliari, sailed from thence, on the third of the calends of July, for Ostia, which he did not reach, the weather proving very stormy, till the twenty-sixth of the Julian May, that is, twenty-eight days after. As he drew near Rome, the whole city went out to meet him, and conducted him to the capitol, where he returned thanks to Jupiter for the success of his arms. The senate and people strove who should be most forward in heaping honours upon him. Supplications were appointed, and sacrifices ordered to be offered daily in the temples for forty days together.

together in thanksgiving to the gods for the victories he had gained in Africa. His usual guard was by a decree of the senate trebled, and the number of the lictors, who attended him as dictator, doubled. His dictatorship was prolonged for ten years, and the dignity of censor, which had been hitherto divided between two magistrates, conferred on him alone, under the title of prefect, or reformer, of manners, that of censor seeming too vulgar. His person was declared sacred and inviolable; and, to raise him above the level of his fellow-citizens, it was decreed, that he should sit, during his life, next to the consuls; that he should give his opinion the first in all public deliberations; that he should sit at all public shews in a curule chair, and that, even after his death, the chair should be placed as usual at the shews, to render his memory immortal; nay, they went so far as to place his statue in the capitol next to that of Jupiter, with this inscription on the pedestal, To Cæsar a demi-god. Cæsar had too much penetration not to know, that this profusion of honours was the effect of fear, and not of any sincere kindness or affection for him; and therefore, in accepting such marks of distinction, he declared, That he would make no other use of the authority, with which they were pleased to trust him, than to prevent any further disturbances in the republic, and to render, as far as in him lay, all the members of it happy. I shall not, said he, renew the massacres of Sylla and Marius, which I cannot reflect on without horror. I wish I had been able to save the republic without shedding a drop of blood, and without depriving Rome of one single citizen; but, since that was not in my power, now that my enemies are subdued, I will make no further use of the sword; but endeavour to gain by good offices those who still continue obstinate. You shall all find in me not a Marius or a Sylla, but an indulgent father and zealous protector. As for my troops, I shall keep them together, not so much for my own defence, as for that of the republic. They shall not, however, be any charge to you; the spoils I have brought with me from Africa, will be sufficient to maintain them, and likewise to defray for some time the expences of the government. This speech and the pardon he granted a few days after to M. Caullius Marcellus, one of his most inveterate enemies, calmed the fears both of the senate and people. Marcellus had been consul five years before, and, during his consulate, employed all his interest and authority against Cæsar. He had fought under Pompey's banners at Pharsalia; but, retiring after that fatal action from public affairs, he had chosen the city of Mitylene in the island of Lesbos for the place of his residence, and there led a quiet life, being intirely taken up with the study of philosophy. Cicero, who had always professed a strict friendship for Marcellus, prevailed upon the conscript fathers to intercede for him all in a body. Accordingly, the first time Cæsar appeared in the senate, Lucius Piso having addressed him with an affecting speech in favour of the illustrious exile, all the conscript fathers seconded him, and, quitting their places, surrounded the dictator's tribunal, imploring his clemency in behalf of one of the most worthy members of their body. Cæsar heard them with great attention, and, as soon as they had done speaking, I willingly pardon Marcellus, said he, out of regard to your intercession, conscript fathers, and to his own merit. Let him return and take his place in the senate. I shall not for the future look upon him as an enemy, but rank him among my friends, to convince the world of the deference I pay to this venerable body. The conscript fathers returned him thanks, and Cicero in particular, in that famous speech, which is still admired by all the learned. But Cæsar's clemency did not avail the unfortunate exile. Upon the first notice of what had passed at Rome, he left Mitylene, and came to Athens, with a design to pass from thence over into Italy; but when he was ready to imbarque, he was stabbed by one Magius Chilon, a no less zealous follower of Pompey than himself. What prompted him to this murder is not well known; some suspected Cæsar of being privy to it; but that suspicion seemed quite groundless to Cicero, since Magius with the same dagger put an end to his own life, and died on the spot with Marcellus (M).

(M) Cicero writes on this subject to Atticus thus: We can by no means suspect Cæsar of having any hand in the death of Marcellus, since Magius stabbed himself with the same dagger, which he had plunged into Marcellus's breast. I am at a loss to know what could prompt him to so black an attempt. Marcellus had been bail for him a little time before at Sunium. Perhaps, as Magius was not in a condition to satisfy his creditors, he had recourse to Marcellus, who refused to supply him with the necessary sums in a rough and uncivil manner, which was natural to him; and hence their quarrel (35).

- ^a THE dictator having, by his clemency and the extraordinary civility he shewed to all without distinction, delivered the senators from their fears, in the next place summoned the people, and, appearing in the assembly more like a common citizen, than a victorious general, returned them thanks, in a most obliging manner, for their inviolable attachment to his person. He then entertained them with a very particular account of his victories, telling them, That he had, by his last victory, subdued a country so rich, and of such extent, that it would yearly supply the city with two hundred thousand Bushels of corn, and three millions of measures of oil. In consideration of the many conquests he had made, four triumphs were decreed him both by the senate and people. Accordingly he triumphed four times the same month, ^{His triumphs.}
- ^b viz. over the Gauls, over Egypt, over Pharnaces, and over Juba. In the first triumph were carried before his chariot the names of three hundred nations and eight hundred cities, which he had reduced by the death of a million of enemies. Among the prisoners appeared Vercingetorix, who had stirred up all Gaul against Cæsar, and attempted to relieve Alesia at the head of three hundred thousand men. His soldiers followed him, crowned with laurel, and the whole city attended him with loud acclamations; but, in the midst of the public rejoicings, the axletree of the triumphal chariot breaking near the temple of Fortune, the victor narrowly escaped being crushed by the wheels. The superstitious Romans drew from thence presages no-ways favourable to the conqueror; but the only inconvenience, that unforeseen accident occasioned then, was, the retarding of the triumph till it was night; and then Cæsar, to prevent all disturbances in the dark, embellished his triumphal procession with a new ornament, causing forty elephants to be ranged, twenty on each side of his chariot, with a prodigious number of flambeaux on their backs, disposed in the shape of so many pyramids, which in a manner turned night into day, and conducted, without the least confusion, the numerous crowd to the capitol. There Cæsar, to set the people an example of religion, mounted the steps of the temple on his knees. After he had offered the usual sacrifice to Jupiter, he viewed the statue, which the senate and people had erected to himself near that of the god; and being offended at the inscription, To Cæsar a demi-god, ordered the fulsome title of demi-god to be immediately cancelled.
- ^d The second triumph was over Egypt, when the pictures of Ptolemy, Photinus, and Achillas were carried before the triumphal chariot, with representations of the cities of Pelusium and Alexandria, of the palace of the Egyptian kings, of the tower of Pharos, &c. Before the chariot walked many prisoners of distinction; among the rest Arfinoe, the sister of Cleopatra, loaded with chains; but, after she shew, she was set at liberty, and only banished from Egypt, that she might not create new disturbances in that kingdom to the prejudice of Cleopatra (N). The third triumph shewed the defeat of Pharnaces king of Pontus. In the midst of the spoils, which the conqueror had brought from Pontus, Bithynia, and Galatia, the famous words Veni, vidi, vici, were carried on a table in large Characters, to shew rather the dispatch, than the difficulty or importance, of that victory. The subject of the fourth triumph was the conquest
- ^e of Africa and Numidia, with the defeat of Juba and his allies. In this triumph Juba, ^{Juba, the son of king Juba, led in triumph.} the son of king Juba, who was then very young, walked among the other captives before the triumphal chariot; but when the shew was over, Cæsar set him at liberty, and gave him an education suitable to his rank, appointing masters to teach him the Greek and Latin tongues, and such sciences as the young noblemen of Rome studied in those days. By this means he became one of the most learned men of the age he lived in; inasmuch, that the emperor Augustus, in consideration of his great knowledge and abilities, afterwards bestowed on him the kingdom of Getulia in Africa, and gave him in marriage Cleopatra Selene, the daughter of queen Cleopatra by Marc Antony (O).
- ^f The Romans were not so well pleased with this triumph as with the other three, Cæsar having caused the statues of Scipio, Petreius, and Cato to be carried before him among those of the foreign kings and princes whom he had subdued. They could not behold Cato tearing his bowels, as the statue represented him, without expressing their concern

cern with loud sighs and tears for the death of so great a man. The vessels of gold^a and silver, which in these triumphs were carried before the conqueror, amounted to the value of sixty-five thousand talents, that is, above twelve millions of our money, besides eighteen hundred and twenty-two crowns of gold, weighing fifteen thousand and thirty-three pounds, which were presents made him, according to the custom of those times, by princes and cities after his victories. Out of these sums he paid his soldiers their arrears, and besides a hundred and fifty pounds of our money to every private man, as much more to each centurion, and thrice that sum to each tribune and commander of the cavalry. As to the Roman people, whose favour he courted, he gave to each particular person ten bushels of corn, ten measures of oil, and added a hundred denarii by way of interest, to the three hundred he had promised them before^b he set out for Africa. After this he entertained the people at twenty-two thousand tables with six thousand murenas, and an incredible profusion of other dainties and rich wines, which most of them had never tasted before; and that nothing might be wanting to the pomp and magnificence of these feasts, he entertained the city with a combat of two thousand gladiators, with representations of sea and land fights, in which were sometimes three, sometimes four thousand combatants on a side, and with all sorts of plays, farces, and mimic performances (P). These entertainments lasted several days, and drew such multitudes of people to Rome, that the greatest part of them were forced to lie in the open air, and many were stifled in the croud, among the rest two senators^c.

Cæsar, having by his largesses, entertainments, and shews, secured the affections of the soldiery and people, made it his whole business to reform the government, and establish good order in the city. In order to this he published many wholesome laws. In the first place, as many of the inhabitants had lost their lives in the civil war, and many had abandoned their native country; he appointed great privileges and exemptions for such as had numerous families, recalled all those who had settled in foreign countries, and invited to Rome from all parts of the world such persons as were in any repute for their learning and knowledge, granting them for their encouragement all the rights and privileges of Roman citizens. At the same time he published a law, forbidding all citizens, above twenty years of age and under forty, to^d absent themselves from the capital more than three years, under any pretence whatsoever (Q). By other laws he restrained the profuse way of living, which at that time prevailed

(P) The two famous mimics, or, as they were then called, pantomimes, Laberius and Publius, acted on this occasion. Laberius was by birth a Roman knight, but nevertheless acted on the stage mimic pieces of his own composing. Cæsar rewarded him for acting in the plays, with which he presented the people, giving him, when they were over, five hundred sesterces, and a golden ring, which was restoring him to the equestrian dignity he had forfeited by performing on the stage. Macrobius has given us part of a prologue of this author (37), which may serve for a taste of his wit and style. Horace indeed taxes his compositions with want of elegance (38). But Scaliger thinks the censure very unjust, and the verses cited by Macrobius more elegant than those in which Horace finds fault with them (39). When Laberius, was going, after he had received the golden ring of Cæsar, to resume his place among the knights, Cicero told him, as he passed by the orchestra, where the senators sat, that he would with all his heart make room for him there, but that he was already squeezed up himself; this he said in allusion to the many senators Cæsar had lately created. No wonder, replied Laberius, that you, who commonly make use of two seats at once, fancy yourself squeezed up, when you sit like other people. This was a severe wipe on the inconsistency and double-dealing of the orator (40).

Publius was a Syrian by birth, but received his education at Rome in the condition of a slave. Having by several specimens of wit obtained his freedom, he undertook the writing of mimic pieces, and acted them with uncommon applause in the towns of Italy. At last being brought to Rome to bear a part in Cæsar's plays, he challenged all the dramatic writers and actors, and carried the prize from every one of them, even from Laberius himself (41). A collection of sentences taken out of his works is still extant, which Joseph Scaliger highly commends, and even thought it worth his while to translate them into Greek.

(Q) Plutarch tells us, that Cæsar took a census of the people, who from three hundred and twenty thousand were now reduced to a hundred and fifty thousand; so great a waste, says he, had the civil war made in Rome alone; not to mention what the other parts of Italy and the provinces had suffered. But there are no fewer than three notorious mistakes in this passage, as the learned Rualdus observes. The first is, where it is said, that Cæsar took a census of the people; Suetonius does not mention it, and Augustus himself in his Marmora Ancyriana says, that in his sixth consulate he numbered the people, which had not been done for forty-two years before. The second is, that before the civil wars broke out between Cæsar and Pompey, the number of the peopleⁱⁿ

a prevailed in Rome and all over Italy; he confined the use of litters, of embroidered robes and jewels to persons only of the first rank, or of overgrown estates; he limited the expence of feasts by many sumptuary laws, which he caused to be put in execution with the utmost rigour, his officers often breaking into the houses of the rich citizens, and snatching from off their tables such meats as had been served up contrary to his prohibition. All the markets swarmed with informers, so that nothing could be brought thither, or sold, without his knowledge; and he never failed to punish with heavy fines such as he found guilty of the least breach of the laws he had enacted for the restraining of luxury. As for the management of the public money, he reserved that intirely to himself, but committed the administration of justice to the senators and knights, chusing from among them such persons as were noted for their integrity and probity. As his long command in Gaul had given him an opportunity of usurping an absolute power, to prevent others from treading in his footsteps, he ordained by a law, that no prætor should be continued in his government above a year, and no consular above two. All the magistrates in Rome, as well as in the provinces, were appointed by him, the people, whom he suffered to assemble in the comitium, to maintain at least some appearance of a republican state, not daring to chuse any but such as he proposed, or recommended; by which means all the places and governments were filled with his creatures. The tribunes, the prætors, the quæstors, and even the consuls, were all persons who had served under him, and were inviolably attached to his interest. The government of the countries subject to the republic was committed to such only as the dictator thought he could confide in. Thus Sicily was allotted to A. Allienus, Cisalpine Gaul to M. Junius Brutus, Transalpine Gaul to another Junius Brutus, surnamed Albinus, Achaia to Servius Sulpicius, Numidia to Crispus Sallustius, Illyricum to P. Vatinius, Syria to Q. Cornificius, and Spain to Q. Cassius Longinus; so that the absolute authority of Cæsar seemed to be equally established in the capital and in the most distant provinces. In Syria indeed his power was disputed by one Cæcilius Bassus, who created great disorders in that province. He was a Roman knight, and had fought on Pompey's side in the battle of Pharsalia. After that overthrow he fled to Tyre, and there, pretending to be a merchant, underhand engaged in his party many who had been favourers of Pompey, and even some of the Roman soldiers who were sent thither to garison the city. Whereupon being at length taken notice of by Sextus Cæsar, whom the dictator had appointed governor of that province, as he hastened northward against Pharnaces, he was summoned to appear before him, and give an account of his proceedings. Sextus, without betraying the least fear, told the governor, that he was raising volunteers, and making other preparations with no other design but to assist Mithridates of Pergamus in the reduction of the kingdom of Pergamus, which had been given him by Cæsar. Sextus believing him, he was dismissed, and no more taken notice of, till having got together a considerable number of conspirators, he seized on the city of Tyre, giving out, that Cæsar was killed in Africa, and that thereupon he was appointed by the senate president of Syria. By this imposture he increased his forces so as to be able to take the field, and engage Cæsar; but he was intirely defeated, and forced to take shelter in Tyre. There he continued inactive, till the many wounds he had received in the battle were cured; and then by his emissaries stirred up the troops under the command of

in Rome amounted to no more than three hundred and twenty thousand; for long before that it was much greater, and had continued upon the increase. The last is, where it is asserted, that in less than three years those three hundred and twenty thousand citizens were reduced by that war to a hundred and fifty thousand; the falsity of which assertion is evident from this, that a little while after Cæsar made a draught of eighty thousand to be sent to foreign colonies. Is it probable, that he would have left no more than seventy thousand souls in Rome? But what is still stronger, eighteen years after, Augustus took an account of the people, and found the number amount to four millions and sixty-three thousand, censere civium Romanorum capita quadragies centum millia, & sexaginta tria millia, says Suetonius. Such an increase in so short a time must be prodigious, if not impossible. Rualdus has not only discovered these mistakes, but the source of them; he makes it appear, that Plutarch, for want of a thorough understanding of the Latin tongue, has been misled by the following passage in Suetonius, who says of Cæsar, recensum populi ne more, nec loco solito, sed vicatim per dominos insularum egit, atque ex viginti trecentisque millibus accipientium frumentum e publico ad centum quinquaginta retraxit (42). Suetonius speaks there of the review taken by Cæsar of the needy citizens, who shared in the public corn, whom he found to amount to three hundred and twenty thousand, and reduced to a hundred and twenty thousand. Plutarch mistook recensum for censum the muster taken by the censors, and this error led him into the other mistakes.

of Cæsar, who was given to all manner of lewdness, to rebel against their leader and murder him. Upon his death, the troops he commanded joined Bassus, excepting a small body that retired into Cilicia. Bassus seeing himself again at the head of a considerable army, marched straight to Apamea, and seizing that city, fortified it, and made it the place of his residence, there taking on him the government of the whole province. But Antistius Verus putting himself at the head of those who had retreated into Cilicia, and drawing to him several others of the Cæsarean party in that country, marched back with them into Syria. There he was joined by the sons of Antipater with auxiliaries from Judæa, and by several of the neighbouring princes, who were glad of an opportunity to shew their attachment to the dictator, and by that means gain his favour. Thus Antistius was enabled to make head against Bassus, and even to drive him quite out of the field. He retreated to Apamea, where he was closely besieged by Antistius; but, as he was a brave soldier and experienced commander; his adversary, having spent the whole summer before the place without being able to gain any advantage over him, was forced towards the end of the campaign to raise the siege and forbear all hostilities, till he received new supplies both of men and provisions².

Cæsar, being informed of what passed in Syria, immediately dispatched Statius Murcus, whom Josephus through mistake names Marcus, to succeed Sextus in the government of Syria, appointing him three legions to put an end to that unexpected war. These, with the troops which Antistius commanded, formed a very considerable army; so that Bassus was again obliged to shut himself up in Apamea, the siege of which place was renewed by the united forces of Murcus and Antistius. During the siege, both sides solicited the assistance of the neighbouring princes and states. Alcaudonius, an Arabian king, being on this occasion sent to both by Bassus and Murcus, came with all his forces, and placing himself between Apamea and the camp of the Cæsareans, that covered the siege, offered his assistance, by way of auction, to that side which should give most for it; and Bassus having bid highest, he immediately joined him. At the same time Pacorus came to his assistance at the head of a numerous body of Parthians; which two reinforcements added such strength to the besieged, that the Cæsareans were again forced to raise the siege, and leave Bassus master of the field³. Hereupon the dictator sent orders to Q. Martius Crispus, governor of Bithynia, to march with the three legions he had under his command, to the assistance of Murcus; and at his approach Bassus retired to Apamea, where he was closely besieged the third time, but held out till the death of Cæsar, when he was relieved by Cassius, who seized on the province of Syria, as we shall relate in the sequel of this history.

WHILE the dictator's lieutenants were thus employed in the east, the dictator himself, to shew that nothing escaped his care, undertook at Rome the reformation of the Roman kalendar, which it belonged to him to rectify as pontifex maximus, an office he had bore long before he was either consul or dictator. This reformation was at this time much wanted; for by reason of the faults of the former kalendar the festivals of the Romans and their solemn days were removed by degrees, and put out of due time; till at last they came to fall in with seasons quite opposite to those of their primitive institution. The year which the Romans made use of till this time consisted of twelve lunar months; but twelve lunar months falling eleven days short of a solar year, it was the office of the pontifex maximus with the college of the pontifices to add such intercalations as should make all even. This they usually did by casting in an intercalary month every two years, which alternatively consisted of twenty-two and twenty-three days. This short month is called by Plutarch in one place Mercedinus^b, and in another Mercedonius^c. The place it was allotted in the Roman kalendar was between the 23d and 24th of February. But the care of this intercalation being left to the pontifices, they put in or left out the intercalary month according as they had a mind to prolong or shorten the time of the annual magistrates then in office; by which means great disorders crept into the political as well as the astronomical year; to prevent which Cæsar undertook that reformation, of which the world has had the benefit ever since, and happily completed it (R).

- a YET so commendable and useful a work gave offence to some, who envied his grandeur, and were weary of his power. They took occasion from thence to say, that, after he had triumphed over the earth, he had a mind to govern likewise in heaven. It is no strange thing to hear ignorant people talk at that rate; but that Cicero, who had long before translated Aratus, and consequently ought to have been better acquainted than any with the disorders of the former calculation, could be guilty of such a weakness, is surprising. Yet the orator made the reformation of the kalendar the subject of several severe jests. As one chanced to say in his company, that the next morning the Lyra would rise, Yes, replied Cicero, by Cæsar's order, insinuating thereby, that the dictator pretended to subject even the celestial bodies to his power.
- b But Cæsar, who knew better than Cicero, what advantages would accrue to posterity from so useful an undertaking, and what glory to himself, thought it beneath him to take any notice of such low jests.

c WHILE Cæsar was thus employed at Rome in works of peace, the two sons of Pompey, having assembled beyond the Pyrenees such of their father's party as had escaped from the battles of Pharsalia and Thapsus, made themselves masters of great part of Spain. The Spaniards, who had formerly served under their father, flocked to them from all parts; insomuch, that they soon saw themselves at the head of a very numerous army, composed partly of Romans, and partly of the natives of the country. They had likewise experienced officers, and among the rest Labiennus, who had learnt the art of war under Cæsar himself, and had on many occasions given signal proofs both of his courage and the wisdom of his conduct. Cæsar had indeed after the conquest of Africa dispatched first Caius Didius into Spain, to oppose the progress of the two young generals in that country, and after him Q. Fabius Maximus and Q. Pædus, two of his lieutenants, with such a body of troops, as he thought sufficient to keep the Spaniards in awe. But the republican party, being favoured by the natives, had gained the ascendant over them, made themselves masters of several cities, and obliged the Cæsareans to shut themselves up in their strong-holds. The dictator's presence was therefore necessary; and accordingly he resolved to go in person, and put a stop to their further progress. But, before he left Rome, he assembled the comitia,

and introduced the use of the solar year, consisting of the time in which the sun goes through the Zodiac, and comes about again to the same point, whence his course began. 2dly, Having, according to the best observations of those times, concluded this revolution to be made in three hundred and sixty-five days and six hours; of these he made his solar year to consist. 3dly, These three hundred and sixty-five days he distributed into twelve artificial; instead of lunar, months before in use, some of them consisting of thirty-one days, some of thirty, and one, that is, February, of twenty eight. 4thly, The six hours over and above in four years making a day, he made every fifth year to consist of three hundred and sixty-six days, and this is what we call the Leap Year. 5thly, This day he added between the 23d and 24th day of February, in the same place in the Roman kalendar, where formerly the intercalary month Mercidinus had been inserted. As this addition was made by putting the latter of those days, which was called Sextus Kalendas, twice in the kalendar, the year was thence called by the Latins Annus Bissextilis, the Bissextile Year. But we, instead of putting the 24th day of February twice in the bissextile or leap year, number on the days, so as to make the month consist of twenty-nine. 6thly, Cæsar began this year on the kalends or first day of January, because on that day the annual magistrates of Rome entered on their offices. 7thly, The first of January he then fixed to the winter solstice; but it has now over-run that time several days, by reason that the Julian solar year is eleven minutes longer than the natural solar year. 8thly, To bring this reformation into practice, besides the month Mercidinus, which was inserted in February, as usual, Cæsar added to this present year two months more, which he put in between the months of November and December; so that this year thereby consisted of four hundred and forty-five days, viz. three hundred and fifty-five days for the common Roman year, twenty-three for the month Mercidinus, and sixty-seven for the other months added between November and December; so that this year, which was the longest the Romans had ever had, putting their affairs out of their usual order, was called by them the year of confusion. In the settling of this point Cæsar made use of the assistance of Sosigenes, an astronomer of Alexandria, for the astronomical calculations, and of Flavius a scribe, for the forming and digesting of them into a kalendar, according to the Roman manner, that is, in distributing the days of each month into their kalends, ides, and nones, and fixing the festivals, and other solemn times, to the days on which they were to be observed. But the pontifices, who had been the authors of the old confusion, not well understanding the new computation, instead of interposing the leap day after every fourth year in the beginning of the fifth, put it in after the third in the beginning of the fourth, which disorder was continued for thirty-six years following; by which means twelve years having been made leap years instead of nine, the error was at length perceived. Hereupon Augustus, who succeeded Julius Cæsar, to bring matters into the right course again, ordered, that for the twelve years next ensuing no leap year should be made: whereby the three supernumerary days, which had been erroneously cast in, being again dropped, this way of computing has been observed ever since without any alteration, except that made by Gregory XIII. which we have mentioned above.

comitia, and having caused himself to be chosen consul the fourth time, as dictator he appointed M. Æmilius Lepidus, whom the tribes had given him for his colleague, his general of the horse. All the inferior offices were filled with his friends and creatures, no one daring to oppose the election of such as he thought fit to recommend to the assembled tribes; for though he pretended to allow them the liberty of choosing whom they pleased, yet to each tribe in particular he wrote in the following terms: Cæsar recommends such a person to such a tribe, and begs they would oblige him so far as to chuse him. This recommendation from Cæsar was in reality an order, which no one had courage enough to dispute or oppose; so that all the power and authority of the republic being lodged in the hands of such persons as were intirely addicted to him, he had no reason to apprehend the least disturbance in the capital during his absence. Having thus settled matters, Cæsar took his leave of Cleopatra, whom he had invited to Rome, and kept in his own house during her abode in that city, and setting out for Spain about the beginning of this year, which was the first Julian year, he arrived in twenty-four days in the province of Bætica. There he assembled what troops were quartered in that and the neighbouring provinces, and, putting himself at their head, marched without loss of time towards Corduba, hoping to surprize Sextus, the younger of the two Pompeys, who was then quartered in that city. But he, having timely notice of Cæsar's arrival and design, immediately dispatched an express to his brother Cneius, who was then besieging the city of Ulla, acquainting him with the danger that threatened him, and intreating him to break up the siege, and hasten with all his forces to his assistance. Cneius had reduced the place to the last extremity, and was then preparing for a general assault; but the unexpected arrival of the dictator, and the danger his brother was in, made him drop the enterprise and fly to Corduba. Cæsar, having upon his arrival attempted in vain to draw him to a battle, decamped in the night, and went to invest the city of Ategua, about sixteen miles from Corduba, which the republican party had made their place of arms. Thither Cneius followed him, and incamped on some hills at a small distance from Cæsar's intrenchments, with a design to cut off his communication with the neighbouring country, and by that means oblige him to raise the siege. But the dictator, notwithstanding the many and almost unsurmountable difficulties he had to struggle with, pursued his point with a constancy and resolution peculiar to himself. The besieged defended themselves with incredible bravery; but being at length reduced to the utmost extremity, the garison, which consisted mostly of Romans, resolved to cut the throats of all the inhabitants, set fire to the city, and attempt by a general sally to force the enemy's lines, and retire to Cneius's camp which was in sight of the city. The cruel massacre was put in execution; but the garison, after having attempted in vain to make their way through Cæsar's camp, were driven back into the town with great slaughter. At length L. Minutius Flaccus, who commanded in the city and had distinguished himself, during the siege, in a most eminent manner, surrendered the place upon honourable terms, and put Cæsar in possession of the few magazines which the flames had spared. From Ategua Cæsar marched to Bursavolis, which he surprized, and put great numbers of the inhabitants to the sword, for having cruelly massacred such of their countrymen as had advised them to surrender. After the reduction of these two places, Cæsar marched to find out the enemy, and force them to a general engagement. They were encamped in the neighbourhood of Ucubis, now Lucubi, according to Mariana, in the kingdom of Grenade. Cæsar posted himself at a small distance from the enemy's camp, which gave occasion to daily skirmishes, in one of which Cæsar's cavalry was put to the rout, and defeated with great slaughter. Pompey was so elated with this advantage, that he resolved to put the whole to the issue of a general action. He even wrote to his friends, that Cæsar had with him only raw and unexperienced soldiers, that he apprehended he would never venture an engagement so long as he could avoid it, but that he would find means to force him to it. In order to this, he marched towards the city of Hispalis, now Seville, and from thence advanced into the plains of Munda (S), and incamped there. Cæsar was no sooner informed of the enemy's motions, than he decamped, and after two days easy march appeared with his army in the same plain where Pompey was incamped. As the enemy were very impatient

(S) The city of Munda is placed by the antient geographers in the province of Bætica, about twenty miles from Malaga in an agreeable and fruitful plain watered by a small river, or rather a rivulet. It was in former times a place of great note, but is at present, as Mariana informs us, a sorry village known by its antient name.

- a impatient to come to an engagement, the very next morning they drew up their army by break of day; but had the precaution to post themselves advantageously on a rising ground, whereof one side was defended by the city of Munda, and the other by a small river, which watered the plain, and by a marsh; so that the enemy could not attack them but in front. Cæsar likewise drew up his troops with great art, and, having advanced a little way from his camp, ordered his troops to halt, expecting the enemy would abandon their advantageous post and come to meet him. But, as they did not stir, Cæsar made as if he intended to fortify himself in that post, which induced the young general, who looked upon this as a sign of fear, to advance into the plain, and attack the enemy before they could secure themselves with any works.
- b Pompey's army was by far the most numerous; for it consisted of thirteen legions, six hundred horse, and an incredible number of auxiliaries, among whom were all the forces of Bocchus king of Mauritania, commanded by his two sons, both youths of great valour and bravery. Cæsar had eighty cohorts, three legions, viz. the third, the fifth, and the tenth, and a body of eight thousand horse. As the enemy drew near, Cæsar betrayed a great deal of uneasiness and concern, as if he were doubtful of the success, knowing he was to engage men no ways inferior in valour and experience to his own, and commanded by officers, who had on many occasions given signal proofs of their bravery and conduct. Cneius, the elder of the two brothers, was generally looked upon as an able commander, and Labienus esteemed scarce inferior to Cæsar himself. However, the dictator, desirous to put an end to the civil war, either by his own death or that of his rivals, gave the signal for the battle, and fell upon the enemy with his usual vigour and resolution. At the first onset, which was dreadful, the auxiliaries on both sides betook themselves to flight, leaving the Romans to decide their quarrel by themselves. Then the legionaries engaged with a fury hardly to be expressed; Cæsar's men being encouraged by the hopes of putting an end to all their labours by this battle, and those of Pompey exerting themselves out of necessity and despair, since most of them expected no quarter, as having been formerly pardoned when defeated under Afranius and Petreibus. Never was victory more obstinately disputed. Cæsar's men, who had been always used to conquer, found themselves so vigorously charged by the enemy's legionaries, that they began to give ground; and though they did not turn their backs, yet it was manifest that shame alone kept them in their posts. All authors agree, that Cæsar had never been in so great danger; and he himself, when he came back to his camp, told his friends, that he had often fought for victory, but this was the first time he had ever fought for life. Thinking himself abandoned by fortune, which had hitherto favoured him, he had some thoughts of stabbing himself with his own sword, and by a voluntary death preventing the disgrace of a defeat. But returning soon to himself, and concluding it would be more to his reputation to fall by the enemy's hand at the head of his troops, than, in a fit of despair, by his own, he dismounted from his horse, and snatching a buckler from one of his legionaries, he threw himself, like a man in despair, into the midst of the enemy; crying out to his men, Are you not ashamed to deliver your general into the hands of boys? At these words the soldiers of the tenth legion, animated by the example of their general, fell upon the enemy with fresh vigour, and made a dreadful havock of them. But, in spite of their utmost efforts, Pompey's men still kept their ground, and, though greatly fatigued, returned the charge with equal vigour. Then the Cæsareans began to despair of victory, and the dictator, running through the ranks of his disheartened legionaries, had much ado to keep them together. The battle had already lasted from the rising to the setting of the sun, without any considerable advantage on either side. At length a mere accident decided the dispute in favour of the dictator.
- f Bogud, a petty king of Mauritania, of whom we have spoke above, had joined Cæsar soon after his arrival in Spain with some squadrons of Numidian horse; but in the very beginning of the battle, being terrified at the shouting of the soldiers intermingled with groans and the clashing of their arms, he had abandoned his post, and retired with the auxiliaries under his command to a rising ground at a small distance from the enemy's camp. There he continued the whole day an idle spectator of the battle that was fought in the plain. But towards the evening, partly out of shame, and partly out of compassion on his friend Cæsar, he resolved to fall upon Pompey's camp, and accordingly flew thither with all the forces he had with him. Labienus, apprised of his design hastened after him, to the defence of the camp; which Cæsar observing, g cried to his legionaries, Courage, fellow-soldiers, the victory at length is ours; Labienus flies.

flies. This artifice had the desired effect : Cæsar's men, believing that Labienus was truly fled, made a last effort, and charged the wing he commanded so briskly, that after a most obstinate dispute they put them to flight. Though the enemy's left wing was thus intirely defeated, the right, where the elder Pompey commanded, still kept their ground for some time. Pompey, dismounting from his horse, fought on foot like a private man in the first line, till, most of his legionaries being killed, he was forced to save himself by flight from falling into the enemy's hands. Part of his troops fled back to their camp, and part took shelter in the city of Munda. The camp was immediately attacked and taken sword in hand ; and as for the city, Cæsar without loss of time drew a line of circumvallation round it. Such was the ever-memorable battle of Munda, which gave the finishing stroke to the Roman republic, and raised Cæsar to the highest pitch of power and glory, no one daring from this time dispute his authority. This victory was gained on the sixteenth of the kalends of April, that is, according to our way of counting, on the seventeenth day of March, when the Dionysian festival, or the Liberalia, were celebrated at Rome (T), the very day, as Plutarch observes, in which Pompey the Great four years before had set out for the war. In this action Pompey lost thirty thousand men, among whom were the famous Labienus, Attius Varus, and three thousand Roman knights. Seventeen officers of distinction were taken, and all the enemy's eagles and ensigns together with Pompey's fasces, which he had assumed as governor of Spain. On Cæsar's side only a thousand men were killed and five hundred wounded ^d.

THE battle being over, Cæsar in the first place completed his lines about Munda, using, instead of earth, the dead bodies of the enemy, which covered the whole plain, and raising them up in heaps, so as to equal the height of the walls. This sight filled Cæsar with horror, who thereupon committed the carrying on of the siege to Fabius Maximus, one of his lieutenants, and, having caused the bodies of Attius Varus and Labienus to be honourably interred, abandoned the plain of Munda, and marched towards Corduba, expecting to find there the heads of the contrary party, who had disappeared after the battle. But he was disappointed ; for the elder Pompey fled with a hundred and fifty horse from the field of battle towards his navy, which lay at Carteia, a city about a hundred and seventy miles distant from Corduba. The inhabitants opened their gates to him ; but were no sooner informed of the success of the battle at Munda, than they sent deputies to Cæsar, acquainting him, that they had secured Pompey. But, as a good number of the inhabitants still remained in Pompey's interest, the place was divided into two factions, which carried their animosities so far as to engage each other in the streets, and fill the city with blood and slaughter. In one of these tumultuary actions Pompey himself received several wounds ; but having nevertheless, after a warm dispute, made himself master of one of the gates, he escaped to his fleet, and, hoisting sail, put to sea with thirty galleys. But Didius, who commanded Cæsar's fleet at Gades, upon notice of his weighing anchor, immediately put to sea after him, having first taken on board a considerable body of horse as well as foot, in case there should be occasion to pursue the enemy by land. After four days sail he came up with their galleys, and surprising them, while both the soldiers and mariners were employed ashore in procuring necessary provisions, which they had not had time to take in at Carteia, he burnt several of them, took the rest, and by that means cut off the enemy's retreat by sea. Pompey, seeing himself thus unexpectedly deprived of his fleet, endeavoured to save himself by flight cross the mountains. (T) Plutarch tells us, that this battle was won on the Dionysian festival, τῇ τῶν Διονυσίων ἑορτῇ, says that writer ; which passages, as madam Dacier rightly observes, most interpreters have grossly mistaken. The old Latin version, says she, has it thus : hanc victoriam obtinuit saturnalibus, this victory was gained on the festival of Saturn. The Dionysia and Saturnalia were two very different festivals. Others, who have translated it into the modern languages, have rendered it by the feast of the Bacchanals. How could Cæsar gain a victory on the day of a festival, which had been abolished a hundred and forty-one years before, and suppressed throughout all Italy by an order of the senate, on account of its abominations, as we are informed by Livy (43) ? Plutarch by the Dionysia means that feast which is called by the Romans Liberalia, and stands in their kalendar against the 17th of March. Liberalia, says Festus, Liberi Festa, quæ apud Græcos dicuntur Dionysia. As Liber and Dionysius are two names of Bacchus, this is what has misled those interpreters, and made them believe, though very absurdly, that the feast, called Liberalia, was the same with the Bacchanalia. Thus far the learned madam Dacier.

a as he had been dangerously wounded at Carteia in his shoulder and left leg, and besides had now the misfortune, as all things seemed to conspire against him, to put his ankle out of joint, which obliged him to be carried in a litter, the enemy's horse, who had been put on board for that particular service, soon came up with him. Upon their approach, the unfortunate Roman discovering a castle on a steep hill at a small distance, retired thither with the few troops that attended him. The Cæsareans, under the command of Cesennius Lento, immediately attacked the place, hoping to carry it by assault, but were repulsed by a shower of darts, and pursued in their retreat with great slaughter. Hereupon Didius began to besiege the castle in a regular manner, and to draw a line of circumvallation round it; which so terrified Pompey's men, that they resolved to quit the place and abandon their leader, who was not in a condition to follow them, to the mercy of the enemy. Accordingly they made a sally, but were for the most part cut off in their retreat, Pompey retired with the rest, but not being able to keep pace with them by reason of his wounds, he concealed himself in a cave, where he was betrayed by some of his own soldiers, and delivered up to the Cæsareans, who immediately put him to death. Thus perished the elder Pompey, after having exerted his utmost efforts to revenge the death of his father, and save his country from impending ruin. He had never before commanded in chief; but nevertheless, in this first essay as we may call it, performed such wonders, as forced Cæsar to own, that he had never encountered a more formidable enemy. As for the younger brother, some writers tell us that he was not present at the battle of Munda, but remained in Corduba to defend that important place in case of any misfortune; others say, that he retired to Corduba after the action. However that be, he was no sooner acquainted with the melancholy news of the defeat of his brother, than he divided what money he had among the cavalry who attended him, and giving out, that he was going to meet Cæsar and treat with him about an accommodation, he left the city, fled in disguise to Celtiberia; and, joining the banditti of that country, concealed himself so well, that Cæsar could never discover him.

BUT, to return to Cæsar: The battle being over and the lines about Munda completed; he marched to Corduba, which was defended by a body of troops that had escaped the slaughter, under the command of one Scapula, a zealous republican. Upon Cæsar's approach, Scapula armed all the slaves and vagabonds, who were very numerous in that great city, and, leaving the thirteenth legion in the place, marched out at the head of that undisciplined multitude, and possessed himself of a bridge. As Cæsar's army drew near, the rabble insulted them, asking them, whether they designed to fly, as if they had been the army defeated. But Cæsar, not thinking it advisable to force the post, despised their bravadoes, and taking a long compass, passed the river without opposition, and appeared before Corduba. Hereupon Scapula, giving all up for lost, retired into the city, and calling together his friends, gave them a sumptuous entertainment; which being ended, he put on his best apparel, distributed what money he had among his attendants; and then ascending a funeral pile, which he had prepared, he ordered one of his catamites to dispatch him, while another put fire to the pile, which soon reduced the body to ashes. Upon Scapula's death the city was divided into two factions; some were for surrendering, others for standing a siege; but the former prevailing, deputies were sent to Cæsar, who got possession of one of the gates. Hereupon the thirteenth legion, which had been always greatly attached to Pompey, began to set fire to the houses, chusing rather to perish with the city, than fall into the hands of the conqueror. This occasioned a bloody battle between them and the Cæsareans; in which most of the legionaries, with about twelve thousand of the inhabitants were killed upon the spot. Cæsar, having thus made himself master of Corduba, at that time the capital of Bætica, marched from thence to Hispalis, now Seville. On his march he was met by Cesennius, who gave him an account of the tragical end of the elder Pompey, and at the same time presented to him the young Roman's head, which, some writers say, he exposed to public view, while the other tell us, that he caused it to be honourably interred. As he drew near Hispalis, he was met by deputies from the city, who acquainted him with the divisions that reigned in the place, and intreated him to send with them a detachment and an experienced commander, to keep the adverse party in awe. Cæsar readily complied with their request, and granted them Caninius Rebilus with some manipuli, manipuli, who entered the town without opposition. But, in the mean time, Pompey's friends privately dispatched one Philo, a zealous assertor of their party, into Lusitania, where he was well known, to beg assistance of Cæcilius Niger, who still supported Pompey's interest there at the head of a considerable number of the natives. Philo soon returned with a numerous body of Lusitanians, and, being let into the city in the night, fell unexpectedly on the Cæsareans, and cut them all off to a man. Hereupon Cæsar immediately invested the town; but, in drawing the lines of circumvallation, left several open places for the Lusitanians to make their escape, lest despair should prompt them to set fire to the houses and demolish the walls. At the same time he placed squadrons of horse on all the roads that led from the city, ordering them to conceal themselves till the Lusitanians appeared, and then, falling upon them, give them no quarter. They held out a long time with great obstinacy and resolution; but at length made a sally, and got safe beyond Cæsar's lines through the passages that had been left open for that purpose. But while they thought themselves out of danger, they were all on a sudden attacked by the Cæsarean cavalry, and put to the sword, not one of them escaping the general slaughter. Cæsar, having thus recovered Hispalis, marched towards Asta (U), the inhabitants of which city sent ambassadors to meet him, and deliver him the keys of their town. There he received the melancholy news of the death of Didius his admiral, who had distinguished himself on all occasions in a very eminent manner. After he had destroyed Pompey's fleet, as we have related above, he caused his vessels to be hauled on shore to be refitted, and, in the meantime, retired to a neighbouring castle, where he was unexpectedly attacked by a body of Lusitanians, who had escaped from the battle of Munda. The Roman admiral defended the place with great bravery; but the Lusitanians having set fire to his ships, he made a sally, and marched in good order to the sea-side, hoping to repulse the enemy and preserve his navy. While his men were busy in extinguishing the flames, a body of Lusitanians, who had concealed themselves among the bushes, starting up, attacked him in the rear, and cut off his retreat to the castle, while two other numerous bodies fell upon him, the one in flank, the other in front. Didius, thus invested on all sides, behaved with signal bravery; but was, in spite of his utmost efforts, overpowered, and with most of his men cut in pieces. Cæsar's concern for the loss of so brave an officer was in great measure allayed, by the agreeable news he received at the same time of the surrender of Munda, after a long and close siege. When the besieged saw themselves reduced to the utmost extremity, they deserted in great numbers to Cæsar, by whom they were kindly received, and incorporated among his troops. But, before they came over, it was agreed between them and their friends in the city, that upon a certain signal the latter should make a vigorous sally, while the deserters did what execution they could in the camp. This plot being very seasonably discovered the night before it was to be put in execution, the private men were by Fabius's orders decimated, and all the officers executed without distinction. Soon after, the besieged made a sally with a design to force their way through the enemy's works; but most of them having lost their lives in the attempt, Fabius at length carried the place by assault. From Munda he marched straight to Ursaon, a place equally fortified by art and nature, laid siege to it, and obliged the inhabitants to receive the yoke, after they had for some time defended the place with incredible bravery. And now Cæsar, having reduced all the places which had declared for Pompey, and exacted immense contributions from the Spaniards under pretence of punishing their rebellion, retired to Hispalis; whence, to give new marks of his esteem for Cicero, he wrote a consolatory letter to him on occasion of the death of his beloved daughter Tullia, who died at Rome in childbed, while her husband P. Cornelius Dolabella was attending Cæsar in Spain. This letter, as appears from Cicero's works, was wrote the day before the kalends of May; and a few days after Cæsar left Hispalis, and marched with the best part of his army to New Carthage; where he was met by deputies from most cities of Spain, with whom he settled the affairs of the two Spanish provinces, and then embarked for Rome, having finished in seven months an expedition, which few generals would have completed in as many years ^h.

(U) Asta, which Pliny honours with the title of Regia, was about sixteen miles distance from Gades, according to Antoninus's itinerary, and situated on the ocean. This city is mentioned by Pomponius Mela, and also by Ptolemy. Martin de Roa is of opinion, that it stood where the present city of Xeres della Frontera stands; but others pretend to discover its ruins between Xeres and Tribuxena.

a Cæsar reached Rome in the beginning of October, and entered the city in triumph, Cæsar returns to Rome. which displeased the Romans beyond any thing he had yet done. They could not brook his triumphing over the calamities of his country, and his rejoicing for an advantage, which should rather to have deplored, and for which no better apology could be made, than that he was absolutely compelled to it. What made his triumph look still more distasteful was, that he had never before acquainted the senate by any letter or express of the victories he had obtained in the course of the civil wars; but seemed rather to be ashamed of the action, than to claim any glory that might arise to him from it. Cæsar, not contented with having triumphed himself, bestowed the same honour on two of his lieutenants, Q. Fabius Maximus and Q. Pedius, but with b this difference, that the representations of the cities, rivers, &c. carried before Cæsar, were of ivory; whereas those that were made use of in the triumphs of his lieutenants were of common wood; which made a humorous Greek, by name Chrysippus, say, by way of raillery, that the statues carried before Fabius and Pedius were only the cases of those which Cæsar had displayed in his triumph¹. However, the Romans, taking the same side with fortune, began to heap new honours upon the conqueror, and those greater than any they had yet bestowed. Cicero indeed proposed in the senate the conferring of such honours on him, as were in some measure within the bounds of modesty; but others, striving who should deserve most, carried them so high, that c they made Cæsar odious even to the most indifferent and moderate sort of men. They made him dictator for life, subjected all magistrates, even the tribunes of the people, to his power, decreed, that he alone should levy troops, command armies, declare war, make peace, take charge of the public money, and that all inferior magistrates should oblige themselves by oath to observe whatever decrees he should think fit to enact. Among other titles, that of imperator was given him, not in that sense in which it had been formerly bestowed on generals after some signal victory, but as it d imported the greatest power and authority in the commonwealth. From him was derived the name of imperator or emperor, and likewise that of Cæsar to his successors; and this was the beginning of the imperial state of Rome, though it was not settled till some years after. His enemies are thought to have had some share in the extraordinary honours conferred on him, as well as his flatterers, since they took from thence an opportunity of calumniating him, and alienating from him the minds of such as were friends to the ancient form of government. On the other hand, Cæsar made it his whole study to gain the affections even of the most inveterate enemies. He not only e pardoned all those who had borne arms against him, but on several of them bestowed honours and offices; insomuch, that the senate and the people, to testify their gratitude to him for the mild use he made of his power, decreed a temple to clemency. As the people still retained an affection for Pompey, he ordered all the statues of that great man, which had been thrown down, to be set up again; upon which Cicero said, that by raising Pompey's statues he had fixed his own. To gain the confidence of the senate and the republican party, contrary to the advice of his best friends, he dismissed his f guards, saying, it was better to suffer death once, than to live always in fear of it. As he looked upon the affections of the people as his best and surest guard, he did all that lay in his power to oblige them, entertaining them frequently with public feasts and shews, and distributing corn among the poorer sort of people. To gratify his army, he sent out colonies to several places, of which the most remarkable were Carthage and Corinth (W). As for the nobility, he attached most of them to his interest by raising them to the chief offices in the state, and trusting them with the government of the many provinces that were then subject to Rome. In short, he ingratiated himself with all orders of men, by his gentle deportment and winning behaviour, so as to work in them a chearful and willing submission. Though he had been invested with the consular dignity for ten years, yet he named others to that eminent post in the republic, appointing Q. Fabius Maximus and C. Trebonius consuls for the remaining part of that year. Nay, he carried his pretended observance of the ancient customs and laws so far, that the consul Fabius Maximus happening to die suddenly on the very day before the expiration of his office, he named Caninius Rebilus to be consul for the remaining hours only, that is, till six in the evening, when the calends of January began. the Romans were all hastening to pay their compliments, as was usual, to the new consul, Let us make haste, said Cicero, by way of raillery, lest he be gone out of his office before we get to his house (X). As the dictator had many friends to gratify, he increased the prætors to sixteen, and the quæstors to forty; he created six new ædiles, and increased the number of the other curule magistrates in proportion. But as there still remained many unrewarded, who had served him with great fidelity, he allotted them places in the senate, by which means the number of the senators rose from three hundred to nine hundred. This gave great offence to the conscript fathers, the more, because among those, whom the dictator raised to that high station, were many common soldiers, sons of freed-men, foreigners lately admitted to the Roman citizenship, Gauls, Spaniards, &c. Cæsar having thus debased the senate, began to look upon them with contempt, and consider them no otherwise than his vassals and creatures. Of this he gave not long after a signal instance. The senate, having passed a decree, conferring on him some extravagant honours, went in a body to present him with it, as he was sitting on the rostra administering justice. Though the consuls, prætors, and all the curule magistrates then in Rome attended the senate, yet the dictator received them with all the pride and haughtiness of a sovereign, without so much as condescending to rise to them. We are told by Plutarch, that he offered to stand up to the senate; but that Cornelius Balbus, one of his friends, or rather flatterers, hindered him: Remember, said he, you are Cæsar, and suffer them to pay you that respect which is due to your dignity. However that be, his carriage offended, not only the conscript fathers, but the people too, the latter thinking the affront on the senate equally reflected on the whole republic. Cæsar, sensible of the false step he had taken, immediately retired home, and caused a report to be spread abroad by his emissaries, that his sitting had been caused by the distemper to which he was subject, viz. the falling sickness, which, he said, discomposed the senses of those who were affected with it, if they talked much standing. Not long after he gave a fresh occasion of resentment by affronting the tribunes. While Cæsar was one day sitting in a golden chair upon the rostra, to view the ceremony of the lupercalia, Marc Antony, who was then Cæsar's colleague in the consulship, after having run up and down the city naked, as was usual during that solemnity (Y), came into the forum, and falling down before Cæsar, presented him with a diadem, wreathed with laurel. Upon this a small shout was raised by some who had been placed near the dictator for that purpose; but when Cæsar refused it, he was applauded by the whole multitude. Antony offered the crown again, and, upon the dictator's second refusal, all, who were present, testified their satisfaction anew with loud acclamations. Then Cæsar, finding it would not take, rose up, and ordered the crown to be carried into the capitol, saying, that Jupiter alone was king of the Romans. The next morning Cæsar's statues were found with royal diadems on their heads; but Flavius and Marullus, two tribunes of the people, went presently, and not only pulled them off, but caused those to be apprehended and committed to prison, who the day before had applauded Antony, while he attempted to put the royal diadem on Cæsar's head. The people followed their tribunes with loud acclamations, comparing them to the famous Brutus, the founder of the republic. This Cæsar highly resented, displaced the two tribunes, and while he inveighed against them in a public speech, he abused and ridiculed on that occasion the people, calling them bruti and Cumæi, that is, beasts and fools (Z). A few days after

(X) There was no end of Cicero's witticisms on that occasion; We have had a very vigilant consul, said he; for he has not shut his eyes during the whole time of his consulate. Caninius was a consul of such strictness and severity, that not one among us dined, supped, or slept during his consulship. Caninius has indeed been consul, but we may well ask under what consul he has been consul, &c.

(Y) The lupercalia were, as we have observed elsewhere, at their first institution, peculiar to the shepherds, and of the same nature with the Arcadian Lycæa. The young patricians, and some of the magistrates, used to run that day up and down the city naked, striking all they met with leathern thongs by way of sport. Women of the first rank placed themselves in the way, and held out their hands to the lash, out of an opinion, that it procured an easy labour to those who were with child, and made those conceive who were barren.

(Z) The Cumæi, as madam Dacier observes, were noted for their stupidity; σώφισταί δ' εἰς ἀναιστίαν ἢ Κυνὴ Cumæ is stupid to a proverb, says Strabo (44); and he gives us these reasons for it. The first, that they were three hundred years before they thought of laying a duty on merchandize imported into their harbours and before they found that they inhabited a maritime city. The second, that having mortgaged their porticoes for a certain sum of money, and failing to pay it at the time named in the contract, their creditors would not allow them to walk under them. But when the rains began to fall, those creditors, being touched with compassion,

a after, as he was returning from Alba to Rome, some of his friends saluted him, as he entered the city, by the title of king; but he, finding the people disrelished it, seemed to resent it himself, and answered aloud, My title is Cæsar, not king. This affectation of being king gave the common people the first occasion to quarrel with him, and proved a specious pretence, for those who had been his secret enemies all along, to conspire against him. The zealous republicans, detesting his ambition, began to form private cabals, and consult among themselves about the proper measures for delivering Rome from the yoke she groaned under. The chief of the conspirators was C. Cassius, a sincere friend to his country, and at the same time an enemy to Cæsar on a private account, the dictator having a few months before bestowed the first and most honourable prætorship on Brutus, though he could not help owning, that Cassius had the best claim to it. Cassius therefore, partly out of zeal for the good of his country, and partly out of a spirit of revenge, formed first with himself the plan of the conspiracy, and then imparted it to a few, whom he knew to be secret enemies both to the tyrant and tyranny. As Brutus was highly esteemed both by the people and senate, Cassius looked upon him as the most proper person for carrying on the conspiracy. He was thought to be descended by his father's side from the famous Junius Brutus, who drove out the Tarquins (A), and by his mother's side from the Servilii, one of the most illustrious families of Rome; but what, in Plutarch's opinion, was more than all the rest, he was both nephew and son-in law to Cato of Utica. He was a most zealous republican, and fully convinced, that the common-wealth could be no longer maintained without the death of the dictator. But the honours and favours he had received at Cæsar's hands restrained him from using violent measures. He had not only been pardoned himself, and obtained the same grace for many of his friends, after the battle of Pharsalia; but was one in whom Cæsar had a particular confidence. He had at that time the most honourable prætorship, was named for the consulship four years after, and designed in all appearance by Cæsar for his successor. For being once accused as engaged in a conspiracy against him, Cæsar would not hearken to the accusation, saying, that Brutus was not so ambitious, but he could wait with patience till he was taken off by a natural death. Cassius therefore, who had already formed the design of assassinating Cæsar, being on one hand desirous of drawing into the plot a man of so great credit as Brutus; but on the other not daring to discourse the matter with him openly, laid in the night-time papers about his chair, where he used to sit as prætor and determine causes, with sentences to this import; You are asleep, Brutus; you are no longer Brutus; and under the statue of the famous Junius Brutus he wrote the following words; Would to heaven thou wert alive, or some of thy descendants resembled thee. Cassius, perceiving that these sentences made a deep impression on his mind, first employed his wife Junia, who was sister to Brutus, to revive in the breast of her brother those generous sentiments, which were peculiar to their family; and afterwards resolved at all adventures to discover to him his design, not doubting but he should be able to draw one into the plot, who, though he did not hate the tyrant, was a declared enemy to tyranny. Accordingly, as the senate was to meet a few days after in order to deliberate, as was said, about giving Cæsar the title of king, Cassius took this occasion to pay a visit to Brutus, and ask him whether he designed to be present in the senate on the calends of March, when Cæsar's friends were to propose the giving him the title of king. Brutus answered, that he designed to absent himself that day. But suppose you are called thither, replied Cassius. Then, said Brutus, I should think it my duty to speak and use my utmost endeavours against such unwarrantable proceedings, caused it to be published, that the Cumæans might, if they pleased, take shelter under their own porticoes; which gave occasion to this raillery, The Cumæans had not the sense to know that they had a right to stand under their own porticoes when it rained, till they were informed of it by the voice of the crier.

(A) Dionysius of Halicarnassus and Dion Cassius assure us, that Marcus Brutus was not descended from the famous Junius Brutus. The Junian family was, according to them, divided into two branches, the one patrician, the other plebeian. The former ended in Brutus himself, after he had sacrificed his two sons to the safety of his country. The other flourished many ages after, and furnished Rome with many heroes, among the rest with Marcus

Brutus, of whom we are speaking in this place. As he bore the same name with the first consul, and was of the same family, the common people believed him to be descended from the first Brutus. Plutarch himself, upon the authority of Posidonius the philosopher, was of the same opinion, and will have Brutus to be sprung from a third son of Junius Brutus, who was but a child, when his two brothers were executed by their father's command. Some writers, the more to debase Brutus who acted a chief part in the conspiracy, pretend, that he was come of a mean family, which had been raised to honours and offices in the republic but a few years before.

ings, nay, and to die rather than outlive the liberty of my country. Ab! replied Cassius, what generous Roman would suffer you to die for his liberty? You are not acquainted with yourself, Brutus, if you imagine, that those papers, which were thrown into your tribunal, came from any but the most illustrious and bravest men of Rome. From other prætors they demanded games, shew's gladiators, &c. but from you, whose very name is dreadful to tyrants, they expect the ruin and downfall of arbitrary power, being ready to expose themselves to the utmost dangers in expectation of your auspicious aid. These words made such a deep impression on Brutus, that, notwithstanding the many favours he had received at the dictator's hands, he entered into all Cassius's measures, and from that time took upon himself the whole management of the conspiracy. The name of Brutus soon engaged a great many illustrious citizens in the conspiracy, among whom were C. Trebonius, Servius Sulpicius Galba, the two Servilius Cascas, Publius Caius, Decimus Brutus Albinus, Tullius Cimber, and Lucius Minucius Bacilius. These had all served under Cæsar from the very beginning of the civil wars, and were looked upon by him as his most trusty friends. It was more easy to draw into the conspiracy those who had always shewn an utter aversion to Cæsar's usurpation. Among these were M. Junius Brutus, L. Cassius, brother to C. Cassius, Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, P. Turullius, C. Attilius, L. Petronius, C. Cornelius Cinna, Cassius Parmensis, L. and C. Cæcilius, Rubrius Ruga, M. Spurius, P. Sextius Naso, Pontius Aquila, Antistius Labeo, and many others, to the number of sixty, whose names have not been transmitted to us. As for Cicero, though he was known to be at the bottom a zealous republican, yet as he was naturally timorous and greatly addicted to Cæsar, who had heaped innumerable favours upon him, Brutus, did not think it adviseable to trust him with the secret. The conspirators would fain have engaged the famous Statilius, who affected to imitate Cato, and would have laid violent hands on himself after the defeat of Pompey's party in Africa, had he not been prevented by Apollonides and Demetrius, as we have related above. Brutus in order to discover his true sentiments, asked him in a private conversation, which of the two evils was the greatest? To bear tamely the yoke of a tyrant, or to run the risque of a civil war by shaking it off? To this question Statilius answered without hesitation, that he had rather patiently suffer the oppressions of an arbitrary master, than the cruelties and disorders which generally attend civil dissensions. Brutus likewise endeavoured to engage in the conspiracy Favonius, a philosopher of great reputation, and, in order to sound him, proposed the same question to him, when Favonius declared, that, in his opinion, a civil war was worse than the most unjust tyranny. Upon this, Brutus gave over all thoughts of gaining Statilius and Favonius. In the mean time, Cæsar's enemies made it their whole business to stir up the common people against him, by spreading among the multitude a thousand false reports, viz. that he designed to fix the seat of his empire in Egypt or Phrygia, and to transport thither all the riches of Italy, abandoning Rome to the mercy of his creatures and favourites. Cæsar, in hearing these groundless reports, began to suspect, that some plot was privately carrying on against him; his friends believing that Marc Antony and Dolabella were concerned in it, advised him not to trust them, but to be upon his guard and watch them narrowly. Cæsar answered, that he was not afraid of those plump jolly fellows, but rather of pale lean men, such as Cassius and Brutus. However, as he too easily gave credit to his flatterers, among whom were some of the conspirators, telling him, that, after he had put an end to the civil war, the commonwealth was more concerned than himself in his preservation, he neglected the necessary precautions for his safety, and was more intent on making the due preparations for putting in execution the vast designs he had formed, than in guarding himself against the attempts of his domestic enemies. For he had resolved to make war upon the Parthians, and, after having revenged the death of Crassus and the Romans slain with him at the battle of Carrabæ, to pass through Hyrcania, thence to march by the Caspian sea to mount Caucasus, till he came into Scythia; then to over-run all the countries between Scythia and Germany, and Germany itself, whence he designed to return through Gaul into Italy, describing the spacious circle of his intended empire, and bounding it on every side by the sea. He had already ordered sixteen legions and ten thousand horse to march towards Brundisium, and was himself to follow them in a few days. But his friends, who were desirous to see him honoured with the title of king before he left Rome, gave out, that the books of the Sibyls declared, that the Parthians could never be overcome by the Romans, unless they fought under the conduct of a king. Aurelius Cotta, one of Cæsar's creatures, who had the sacred volumes in his keeping, was to make this report

- a report out of them to the senate, and to propose, that Cæsar should only be styled dictator in Italy; but that he should be acknowledged as king, and take upon him that title, with respect to all foreign nations subject to the Roman republic. The senate was appointed to meet for this purpose on the ides of March, and that day the conspirators fixed upon as the most proper for putting their design in execution, since Cæsar would not fail coming to the senate on such an occasion, and it was safer to fall upon him there, most of the senators being privately enemies to him, than in any other place, where the populace might divert the blow. All the ancient historians are full of prodigies and apparitions, which, in their opinion, were manifest presages of Cæsar's tragical death. They tell us, that men were seen in the air all on fire, encountering each other; that a prodigious flame seemed to issue from the hand of a soldier's servant, insomuch, that those who saw it thought he must be burnt, but nevertheless he received no hurt; that as Cæsar was sacrificing, the victim was found without a heart; that Spurina, a famous augur, bid him beware of the ides of March, for that he was then threatened with some great danger. They add, that when the day was come, Cæsar, as he went to the senate, meeting the augur, said to him by way of raillery, The ides of March are come. They are come, answered calmly the augur, but they are not past. The night before the plot was put in execution, he supped with M. Lepidus; and the discourse turning upon the kind of death which seemed best, Cæsar, busy as he was in signing some letters, before any of the company had time to deliver his opinion, cried out, Of all deaths a sudden one is the best. After supper he retired to his own house, where both he and his wife Calpurnia passed the night in great care and uneasiness. He was scarce fallen asleep, when the doors and windows of the apartment where he lay flew open. Being startled at the noise and the light, which broke all on a sudden into his room, he sat up in his bed, when by the moonshine he perceived Calpurnia fast asleep, but heard her utter in her dream some inarticulate words mixed with groans. She dreamt at that time, that the pinnacle (B), which the senate had allowed to be raised on Cæsar's house, by way of ornament and grandeur, was fallen down; and also fancied, that she was weeping over Cæsar, and holding him all covered over with wounds and blood in her arms. When it was day, she begged of Cæsar that he would not stir out, but adjourn the senate to another time; and that, if he slighted her dreams, he would be pleased to consult the gods by sacrifices, and other kinds of divination. He complied with her request; sacrifices were offered early in the morning; and, according to the report of the priests, all the victims proved inauspicious. Cæsar was not a man to be easily intimidated; he had braved death on a thousand occasions, and gained many victories, among the rest that of Munda, when the auspices threatened him with utter destruction. But, however, as he had never before discovered in Calpurnia any kind of superstition, he now began to look upon her fears and apprehensions as inspirations from heaven, and forebodings, which ought not always to be neglected. As Marc Antony was then with him, being come, according to his custom, early in the morning, to attend his levee, he had some thoughts of sending him with orders to the senate not to assemble that day. But as most of his troops were already embarked, and he himself was to leave Rome in four days, he could not come to any fixed resolution, but remained in suspense, till the senate began to assemble in the appointed place, which was a great hall built by Pompey near his theatre *.

Cæsar is alarmed.

The constancy and intrepidity of Brutus.

- While Cæsar was thus deliberating with himself, whether he should suffer the senate to assemble that day, or adjourn their meeting to another, Brutus was busy in administering justice in the forum, he being prætor urbanus for the present year. We are told, that he heard those who pleaded before him, pronounced sentence, and dispatched the causes, that were brought to his tribunal, with as much care, equity, and application, as if he had no other business in hand. Though he had taken with him, when he went out of his house, a dagger, and had it then concealed under his his robe, with a firm resolution of plunging it into Cæsar's breast before he returned home; yet he did not betray on his tribunal the least concern, but acquitted himself of his office with his usual calmness and tranquillity. One, whom he had condemned in a certain sum, refused to pay it, crying out, that he appealed to Cæsar; when Brutus casting his eyes on the conspirators, Cæsar, said he, how powerful soever, shall not prevent me from seeing such sentences put in execution, as are agreeable to the laws of Rome. However, several accidents intervened, which did not a little terrify Brutus and the other conspirators, and had almost defeated their best concerted measures. While Brutus was hearing causes in the forum with his usual attention and patience, news was brought him, that his wife Porcia lay at the point of death. She was the daughter of Cato, and the only person, not concerned in the conspiracy, to whom Brutus had revealed it. He strove as much as possible, when abroad, to keep his uneasiness of mind to himself; but at home, and especially in the night-time, he was not the same man, but sometimes all on a sudden started out of his bed, and at other times was so taken up with unquiet thoughts, and so perplexed in his mind, that Porcia concluded, he had some dangerous and difficult enterprise in agitation. As she was addicted to the study of philosophy, fond of her husband to a great degree, and full of courage and prudence, she resolved not to inquire into Brutus's secrets, till she had tried whether she had courage and resolution enough to conceal them even in the midst of torments. With this view she dismissed all her attendants, and taking a knife, gave herself a deep gash in the thigh, which threw her into a violent fever. Brutus, who was then at home, flew immediately to her apartment, when she in the height of her pain addressed him thus: "I am, O Brutus, the daughter of Cato,

(B) The pinnacle, as madam Dacier observes, was a sort of ornament usually placed on the top of temples. The Greeks called it ἀκρόν ἀνάκτα, and the Latins fastigium. Private persons were not allowed to raise such ornaments on the tops of their houses without the consent of the senate, who had the superintendency of every thing relating to the public. Thus, as a token of honour, the senate accorded to Poplicola to have the doors of his house open towards the street instead of opening inwards. The pinacles were commonly adorned with statues of the gods, figures of victory, and such other decorations as were suitable to the rank and quality of those to whom the privilege of erecting them was granted.

" and was given to you in marriage, not to partake only in the common civilities of
" bed and board, but to bear a share in your good, as well as your evil, fortunes.
" When I look upon you, I find no reason to repent the match; but from me, what " evidence of my love, what satisfaction can you receive, if I am not allowed to share " with you in bearing your hidden griefs, nor admitted to any of your counsels, that " require secrecy and trust? I am well apprised, that women are commonly thought " to be of too weak a nature to be trusted with secrets; but certainly, Brutus, a " virtuous birth and education, and frequent conversing with men of honour, are of " some force to the forming of our manners, and the strengthening of our natural " weakness. I am the daughter of Cato and the wife of Brutus, in which two great
" titles I did not place much confidence, till I tried myself, and found, that even
" against grief itself and pain I am invincible." Having thus spoke, she shewed him her wound, and related to him the trial she had made of her own constancy. Brutus, touched with this affecting speech, could not help discovering the whole plot to her without reserve; which when he had done, he lifted up his hands to heaven, and begged the assistance of the gods in his enterprise, that he might live to be a husband worthy of such a wife as Porcia (C). But with all her resolution, when the day came, on which the design was to be put in execution, she was extremely disturbed with the expectation of the event, and, not being able to bear the greatness of her cares, she could scarce keep within doors. At every little noise she heard, she started up, and, running into the street, asked those who came from the forum, what Brutus was doing? At length, after having expected a long time, being overcome by her fears and doubts, she fell into a swoon. Whereupon her women making a great outcry, many of the neighbours ran to Brutus's house to know what was the matter, and the report was soon spread abroad, that Porcia was dying, though she recovered in a little time, and came to herself again. This news pierced Brutus's heart; yet he was not so carried away by his private grief, as to neglect the public concern. He came down immediately from his tribunal, but, instead of going home, went to Pompey's porch, adjoining to the hall, where the senators were to assemble, and there waited with the other conspirators the coming of Cæsar to the senate. But, as he did not appear, though the day was far spent, being detained at home by his wife

(C) Valerius Maximus is the only author, who supposes, that Porcia was acquainted with her husband's design before she wounded herself. According to him, Brutus discovered to her the whole plot the night before it was to be put in execution. Whereupon Porcia the next morning gave herself a dangerous wound with a razor; at which Brutus being greatly alarmed, Porcia told him, while he was expressing his concern in the most tender terms, that she had wounded herself to make a trial of her constancy and courage, being determined to lay violent hands on herself, in case the success of his enterprise did not answer his expectation.

a wife and the augurs, they were all under the greatest uneasiness, and ascribed his delay to the discovery of the plot. They were confirmed in their suspicion by several accidents, which were thrown in their way by mere chance. While they were thus waiting for Cæsar, a citizen, coming up to Casca, one of the conspirators, and taking him by the hand, You concealed, said he, the secret from me, but Brutus has told me the whole. At which words Casca being greatly alarmed, the other said smiling, How came you, Casca, to be so rich on a sudden as to stand for the ædileship? These words restored, we may say, Casca to life again; for he looked upon himself as lost, and, deceived by the ambiguity of the reproach, was upon the point of discovering the secret, in hopes of gaining his friend by that means. The senator Popilius Lænas gave room for new suspicions; for after having saluted Brutus and Cassius very obligingly, he accosted them, and whispered them softly in the ear; My wishes are with you; may you accomplish what you design; but I advise you to make no delay, for the thing is now no secret. Having thus spoke, he left them in the utmost consternation. Decimus Brutus, surnamed Albinus, one in whom Cæsar had such confidence, that he had made him his second heir, being no less alarmed at these words than the rest of the conspirators, resolved to go in person to Cæsar's house, to inform himself there of what kept him so long from coming to the senate. Accordingly, with the approbation of Brutus and Cassius, he flew thither, and being immediately admitted into the dictator's apartment, he asked him with his usual familiarity, what kept him so long from appearing in the senate. Cæsar, who looked upon him as one of his best friends, imparted to him in confidence what his wife had dreamed the night before, and what the augurs had told him. Hereupon Decimus, fearing lest he should put off the senate to another day, and the business might in the mean time get wind, turned into ridicule both Calpurnia's dreams and the divinations of the soothsayers, telling Cæsar, that he would be much to blame, if he gave the senate such just grounds to complain; For they are, said he, met upon your own summons, and are ready to vote unanimously, that you should be declared king of all the provinces out of Italy, and be allowed to wear a diadem in any other place. Now, if any one should be sent to tell them, that they must break up for the present, and meet again when Calpurnia shall chance to have better dreams, what will your enemies say? or who will with any patience bear your friends pretending to justify you, and maintaining, that this is not an instance of downright servitude on one side, and bare-faced tyranny on the other? But if you are so far prepossessed with groundless fears as really to think this an unlucky day, it will be more decent for you to go to the senate yourself, and adjourn it in person. Having thus spoke, he took Cæsar by the hand, and dragged him; in a manner, out of his house. He was not gone far from his door, when an unknown slave made towards him; but not being able to get near him by reason of the croud, he went into his house, and put himself into the hands of Calpurnia, begging her to secure him till Cæsar returned, because he had matters of the utmost importance to communicate to him. Soon after one Artemidorus, a native of the island of Cnidus, by profession a rhetorician, and intimately acquainted with most of the conspirators, put into Cæsar's hand a paper, containing the heads of what he had to discover to him. Artemidorus had observed, that Cæsar, as he received any papers, immediately delivered them to some of his officers; who attended him; and therefore coming as near to him as he could, he cried out, Read this, Cæsar, quickly; for it contains affairs of the greatest importance, and such as concern you nearly. Some writers tell us, that Artemidorus, not being able to come near Cæsar by reason of the throng, gave this note to another, who presented it to him. However that be, Cæsar attempted several times to read it; but being diverted by the croud of those who came to speak to him, he kept it in his hand by itself, till he came into the senate. When he was got to the door of the great hall, where the conscript fathers were assembled, Popilius Lænas, who, but a little before, had wished Brutus and Cassius good success in their undertaking, coming up to him, discoursed a great while with him in private, Cæsar standing still all the time, and seeming to be very attentive. The conspirators, not being able to hear what he said, but guessing from what they were conscious of, that this conference was a discovery of their treason, were strangely dejected; and, looking upon one another, laid their hands on the daggers they had concealed under their robes, and were drawing them with a design to stab themselves, if the plot was discovered; but judging from Lænas's looks and gestures, which they narrowly watched, and from the calmness and unconcern that appeared in Cæsar's countenance, that the conspiracy was not the subject of their conference, they took courage, and

and were soon after delivered from all their fears. For Lænas in retiring was observed to kiss Cæsar's hand, which was a plain indication that he had been petitioning, and not accusing. Cæsar having dismissed Lænas, entered the hall, where the senators were assembled. This was one of the many edifices which Pompey had raised for the use of the public; whence Plutarch concludes, that some deity guided the action, and brought Cæsar thither to revenge upon him the death of Pompey. Upon Cæsar's entering the hall, the senate stood up in respect to him. Of the conspirators, some stood behind the chair, which was placed for the dictator in the middle of the hall; others went to meet him, pretending to join their prayers with those of Metellus Cimber, in behalf of his brother who was banished. In the mean time, Trebonius (D) drew Marc Antony, who was faithful to Cæsar and a man of great strength and resolution, towards the door, and entertained him in the porch with a long discourse contrived for that purpose. When the dictator was seated, the conspirators, crowding round him, renewed their supplications in favour of Cimber's brother, and taking him by the hand, kissed it, in appearance, with great respect. But the dictator rejected their petition, and upon their urging him farther and growing very importunate, he first reprimanded them severely, and afterwards, starting up, pushed them from him. Hereupon Cimber, laying hold of the dictator's robe with both hands, pulled it off from his shoulders, which was the signal agreed on to fall upon him. In that instant Servilius Casca, who stood behind him, drawing his dagger, gave him the first wound in the neck, which was not mortal, nor dangerous, as coming from one, who at the beginning of such a bold action was probably very much disturbed; so that his strength as well as his courage might fail him. Cæsar immediately, turning about, seized Casca by the hand which held the dagger, both of them crying out at the same time, Cæsar in Latin, wicked Casca, what dost thou mean? and Casca calling to his brother in Greek to come and help him. Those who were not privy to the design were struck with such horror at the attempt, that they could neither fly, nor assist Cæsar, nay, nor utter a single word. But the conspirators, who came prepared, inclosed him on all sides with their naked daggers in their hands, so that which way soever he turned, he met with blows, and saw their daggers levelled at his face and eyes. Cassius, having first turned his face to a statue, which the republic had erected to Pompey in the hall, and silently implored the assistance of that hero, flew at Cæsar with the rage of a madman, and gave him a deep wound on the head, encouraging the others to follow his example and rid Rome of her tyrant. Hereupon they all pressed upon him; but, as each of them was eager to plunge his dagger in his body, and have the glory of dispatching him, they wounded one another, Brutus in particular received a wound on the hand from Cassius, and most of them were stained either with Cæsar's blood or their own. The Hero, though thus baited on all sides, to use Plutarch's expression, like a wild beast taken in a toil, fought and defended himself in the best manner he could, till, looking round about him to see if he could make his escape, he perceived Brutus with his dagger in his hand. This sight stung him to the heart, so that he struggled no more; but crying out, What! my son, Brutus, and you too? he covered his face with his robe, and quietly surrendered himself. Then the conspirators, pushing him either by chance, or, as some say, by design, to the pedestal, on which Pompey's statue stood, which by that means was sprinkled with his blood, dispatched him there with twenty-five wounds, the senate looking on with horror and amazement, but not one of them daring to lend him the least assistance. We are told, that as he found himself fainting away and ready to drop down, he wrapt the skirts of his garment round his knees, that he might fall with more decency.

(D) Plutarch in the life of Cæsar tells us, that Antony was detained without by Brutus Albinus; and in the life of Brutus, that he was kept in talk by C. Trebonius. How could he be guilty of so manifest a contradiction in the relation of an action so considerable and notorious? He was certainly mistaken in the life of Cæsar, and in that of Brutus hits upon the truth; since all the historians, who mention this action, agree, that Trebonius entertained Antony at the door. Cicero, who is more to be relied on than all the historians put together, says in express terms in his second Philippic, addressing his speech to Antony himself; Cum interficeretur Cæsar, tum te a Trebonio vidimus sevocari; and in the 13th. Sceleratum Trebonium? quò scelere? nisi quod te idibus Martiis a debita tibi peste seduxit; intimating, that Antony deserved the same doom with Cæsar.

THE PALACE OF JULIUS CÆSAR

The AMPHITHEATER of CLAUDIUS CÆSAR in the CAMPUS MARTIUS

^a THUS died in the fifty-sixth year of his age the greatest warrior that Rome, or perhaps the world, ever saw, after he had fought with success fifty pitched battles, taken by assault above a thousand towns, and slain, if Pliny is to be credited^m, eleven hundred ninety-two thousand men. He was, without doubt, a person of extraordinary parts and wonderful abilities, in all the arts both of war and civil government, and of equal diligence and application in the use of them. He was beloved and revered by the people, honoured and adored by his friends, and esteemed and admired even by his enemies. But as his ambition, which knew no bounds, prompted him to intrude his country, and usurp a despotic and arbitrary power over those who were as free as himself, he met in the end with that doom which all tyrants and usurpers deserve.

^b If the state had been deemed irretrievable and an usurper a necessary evil, Rome could not have had a better than Cæsar. But as Brutus, Cicero, and the best and ablest Romans judged otherwise, the dictator's power and dominion was downright usurpation, and consequently every Roman was warranted by all the laws of Rome to put him to death.

C H A P. XIV.

The history of Rome, from the death of Cæsar to the first consulate of Octavianus.

^c WHEN Cæsar was dispatched, Brutus, stepping forth into the middle of the senate house, offered to give an account to the conscript fathers of the motives of their undertaking, and to exhort them to approve an action, which had restored liberty to their country. But they all flew out of doors in the utmost consternation, and carried terror and confusion into all quarters of the city. So great was the throng at the door of the hall and in the porch, that some of the senators were stifled in the croud, and others dangerously wounded, by running blindly in that general distraction against the naked daggers of the conspirators. The news of Cæsar's death being in a trice spread all over the city, the friends of the deceased retired in all haste to their houses, and there shut themselves up, without knowing what they had to hope or fear from so tragical an event. The artificers, shutting their shops, ran in that sudden surprize, some to see the body of the deceased, others up and down the streets to inform themselves of the circumstances of so bold an attempt. In the mean time, Brutus and the other conspirators marched in a body from the senate-house all over the city, with their daggers yet bloody in their hands, not like persons who thought of escapeing, but with an air of confidence and assurance. Some persons of distinction, who had not been privy to the conspiracy, joined them with their drawn swords, being desirous to share in the honour of the action, as if they had borne part in it. Of this number were C. Octavius, P. Lentulus Spinther, Favonius, Patiscus, L. Staius Murcus, who had served under Cæsar in quality of lieutenant against the sons of Pompey in Spain, A. Aquinius, and several others, who afterwards paid dear for their vanity, being cut off by Antony and young Octavianus. As they marched along, they proclaimed in the streets, that they had killed the king of Rome and the tyrant of their country. They were preceded by a herald, who carried on the point of a lance a cap, the symbol of liberty among the Romans. As they marched along, they called to the people to resume their antient liberty, and complimented such persons of rank as came in their way. When they arrived at the comitium, Brutus, holding up his bloody dagger, cried out, Cicero, we have revenged the republic. This he did, as some writers conjecture, conjecture, either to engage that famous orator in the common cause, or to make the people believe, that he, who had formerly guarded his country against the wicked attempts of Catiline, bore a part in delivering it from the tyranny of Cæsar. However that be, the people did not join them; but, alarmed at the death of the dictator, ran up and down the city, some bewailing the loss of one who had supported them with his largesses, and others laying hold of the present general distraction to plunder the houses of their fellow-citizens. They were no more those antient Romans, to whom liberty was more dear than life itself. They were become effeminate, debauched, and accustomed to live by the price of their votes, which they sold to the best bidder. Brutus therefore, with his followers, thought it adviseable to retire to the capitol, whither they were attended by a body of gladiators belonging to Decimus Brutus Albinus. The next day, as no-body was injured by the conspirators either in his goods or person, the senators and many of the people took courage, and went up to the conspirators in the capitol. Brutus made an harangue to them, very popular and adapted to the present state of affairs. When he had done speaking, they applauded his oration, and invited him with one voice to come down into the city. Hereupon the conspirators descended with confidence into the forum, Brutus being attended and guarded by many persons of the most eminent quality in Rome, while the other conspirators went promiscuously mingled with the crowd. He no sooner appeared on the rostra, than the rabble, though consisting of a confused mixture and all disposed to raise a tumult, were struck with reverence, and hearkened to him with silence and attention. He acquainted them in a very affecting harangue with the motives that had prompted them to put Cæsar to death, and solemnly protested, that neither he nor his companions had any thing else in view, but the delivering of Rome from a tyrannical yoke, and the restoring of their country to her former condition; but the populace, more afraid of poverty than subjection, expressed by their melancholy looks, that they were highly displeased at the action; and that they revered Brutus, but at the same time pitied Cæsar. Hereupon the conspirators thought fit to withdraw again to the capitol, where Brutus, who expected to be besieged, dismissed several persons of distinction, who had attended him thither, not thinking it just, that those who had no hand in the action should share in the danger^m.

His death attended with great disturbances in the city:

As Cæsar had designed to set out in a few days on his intended expedition against the Parthians, he had resigned his consulship to P. Cornelius Dolabella, a young man of twenty-five years of age, who had married Tullia the daughter of Cicero. The new consul, out of respect to Cæsar, waited for his departure to enter upon his office; but he no sooner heard the news of his death, than he appeared with his lictors and fasces, without the consent either of the senate or people. As this was an open acknowledgement of the dictator's power, no one doubted but he would join his friends against Brutus and the other conspirators; but he, to the great surprize of all, after so unwarrantable a step, immediately went up to the capitol with all the pomp of a consul; and there, congratulating Brutus and his followers on the success of their glorious undertaking, declared, that he would support them to the utmost of his power. From the capitol he returned to the forum, where he made a harangue to the multitude, exhorting them to join the deliverers of their country; and, after having cast out many bitter reflections on Cæsar, and bestowed the highest elogiums on Brutus, he went so far as to propose a law, enacting, that for the future the ides of March should be celebrated with the same solemnity, as the day on which Rome was built. The day, said he, in which Rome recovered her liberty by the death of a tyrant, ought to be deemed by all true Romans as happy a day, as that in which the city was first built. To the latter she owes her being, to the former her liberty; and what is being itself without liberty? But the indigent populace, whom the dictator had supported with his liberal presents, were so far from being moved by his speech to approve of his death, that on the contrary they would have torn the consul in pieces, had he not, by a timely retreat, saved himself in the capitol. However, the menaces, which the multitude threw out on this occasion against the dictator's enemies, did not deter L. Cornelius Cinna from renouncing his party in a most solemn manner. Cæsar had married to his first wife Cornelia the sister of Cinna, and on that account had always favoured him in a particular manner. He had raised him this year to the prætorship, and promised him the consulate. But Cinna was in his heart a well-wisher to his country and

^a and an enemy to tyranny; and therefore, upon Cæsar's death, he not only sided openly with the conspirators, but going into the forum, with all the ensigns of his dignity, pronounced there an invective against his brother-in-law, styling him tyrant, usurper, oppressor of his country, &c. When he had done speaking, he stripped himself, in presence of the people, of all the ornaments of his dignity, crying out, These I received of Cæsar, against the known laws of Rome; and now I resign them to the Roman people, who alone have a right to dispose of them. But even this generous and disinterested proceeding was highly resented by the vile populace, and Cinna obliged to abscond, for fear of feeling the effects of their blind fury ⁿ.

^b IN the mean time, Antony and Lepidus, who were intirely addicted to Cæsar, and had concealed themselves for fear of being involved in his ruin, hearing how the people stood affected, appeared again in public. When the conspirators first consulted about the execution of their design, they were all, except Brutus, of opinion; that Antony should be cut off with Cæsar; for they looked upon him as a dangerous person, on account of his unbounded ambition and the powerful interest he had among the soldiery; but Brutus, whose intentions were upright and sincere, would by no means hearken to their advice, saying, That an action undertaken in defence of the laws and of justice ought be free even from all appearance of injustice. Besides, he gave them hopes, that a great change might be worked in Antony. I do not despair, said he, but such a lover of glory as Antony, stirred up with emulation of our great

^c attempt, will lay hold of this occasion to be joint restorer with us of the liberty of his country. Thus the generous Brutus saved Antony's life; but he, instead of answering the brave patriot's expectation, upon the first news of Cæsar's death, fled in the disguise of a slave, and concealed himself, till he was informed, that the populace were disposed to revenge his death. Then he appeared again with all the majesty and splendor of a consul, being this year Cæsar's colleague in that dignity; and managed matters with such address, that he paved the way for that triumvirate, which gave the finishing blow to the republic, and reduced Rome to a lasting monarchy. The first step he took was, to order Lepidus to march into the city a legion, which he commanded in the neighbourhood; and to incamp in the field of Mars. This alarmed ^d the conspirators in the capitol, who thereupon sent deputies to Antony and Lepidus, desiring them to consider the sad consequences of a division in so critical a conjuncture, and remonstrating, that no hatred to Cæsar's person had armed them against him, but only the love which every good citizen ought to have for his country; that the state was already so drained by civil wars, that any new disturbances must prove fatal to it; that they believed them too generous to let any particular views transport them to the prejudice of the public, &c. Both Antony and Lepidus, under pretence of revenging Cæsar's death, aimed at the sovereign power themselves, and sought it in the ruin of those brave men, who stood up in defence of their oppressed country; but, as Decimus Brutus was already set out from Rome to put himself at the head of an army

Lepidus is ordered by Antony to march a legion into the city.

^e of veterans in Cisalpine Gaul, which province had been allotted him by Cæsar, they both dissembled even their design of revenging Cæsar's death, and, to gain time, returned the following answer, That they were ready to sacrifice their private regards to the public good, and suffer the senate to be assembled, that they might govern themselves by the advice of so many illustrious and discerning persons as composed that venerable body. Accordingly Antony, as consul, appointed the senate to meet early the next morning in the temple of Tellus, near his own house, and, in the mean time, placed guards all over the city, to keep the unruly multitude from raising disturbances, and likewise ordered all Cæsar's money and papers to be conveyed to his house.

Antony assembles the senate,

^f Next morning by break of day, the conscript fathers assembled pursuant to their summons; and never did that august body meet on so important and nice an occasion. They came to decide, whether Cæsar had been an usurper, or a lawful magistrate; and whether those who had killed him deserved punishments, or rewards. As none of the conspirators appeared in the senate, not daring to expose themselves to the fury of the rabble, the debates were carried on with more calmness and temper than could have been expected in a matter of such consequence. Most of the conscript fathers were inclined to favour the conspirators; but nevertheless divided among themselves in their opinions. Some were for declaring them the deliverers, the saviours of their country, and allotting them, as such, ample rewards. Others were for approving approving the action, without appointing any rewards to the authors of it, since no-^a body demanded them. Some thought it was sufficient to bury in oblivion what was past, without bestowing either praises or rewards on the authors of Cæsar's death. Some of Cæsar's friends declared boldly, that the action was odious and detestable; but that they were nevertheless ready to concur in such measures as should be judged necessary for the safety of those who had committed it, out of a due regard to so many illustrious families. After several different overtures, it was at length concluded by a great majority, that, before the conspirators were declared guilty or innocent, this question should be put, Whether Cæsar was a tyrant, or a lawful magistrate? since on the decision of this depended that of all other questions relating to the conspirators. Antony, foreseeing that this question would be decided to the disadvantage of his^b party, warded off the blow with an address and dexterity, which will seem incredible to those who judge of his abilities from what they read of him in Cicero's letters and speeches. Antony's address. Have you well weighed with yourselves, conscript fathers, said he, the consequences that must attend the decision of this question? If you declare the late dictator a tyrant, all his acts will be of course void and null; and who can conceive what confusion and disorders will hence ensue, not in this metropolis only, but in all the states and kingdoms subject to Rome? The republic will be without lawful magistrates, the provinces without governors, the armies without commanders, &c. since we have been all invested in our offices, commands, and governments by Cæsar. If we pronounce Cæsar a tyrant and usurper, we must lay down those honours, since we can no longer think them lawfully conferred upon us. If Cæsar is an usurper, his body must, pursuant to the ordinances of our ancestors, be ignominiously dragged through the streets and thrown into the Tiber. What disturbances and tumults will not this produce among the populace, who adore him as a god? You are going, conscript fathers, to plunge the republic, nay, the whole world, which is filled with Cæsar's glory, into a bloody war and eternal disorders. Antony's words made a deep impression on the assembly, which was again divided into different opinions. Such as had not been nominated by Cæsar to any civil or military employments, still insisted on his being declared an usurper and tyrant; but all the present magistrates, and those whom Cæsar had appointed to succeed them (E), were for dropping the question relating to him, and only decreeing, that no-body should be prosecuted on account of his death. Among the latter was the consul Dolabella, who, as he had not yet attained the age required by the laws of Rome for the consular dignity, was well apprised, that, if he once parted with it, the people would not be easily induced to restore him, in defiance of the laws, to that post. However, several prætors were prevailed upon by the friends of the conspirators, that is, by the zealous republicans, to strip themselves of their robes and publicly resign the offices, to which Cæsar, by his authority alone, had raised them. The division, which reigned in the senate, was likely to have involved the republic anew in a civil war, when Cicero, by an excellent speech, which has been transmitted to us, not in the language in which he spoke it, but in Greek°, prevailed upon the conscript fathers to drop the question relating to Cæsar, viz. Whether he was a tyrant, or no; and to pass an act of oblivion for what was past. *An act of oblivion passed,

acts confirmed.* Accordingly a general amnesty was proclaimed, and at the same time it was decreed, contrary to the opinion of Cicero and the most zealous patriots, That not the least thing should be altered, which Cæsar had enacted during his government. This was, in a manner, declaring him at the same time both innocent and guilty, since it was inconsistent to confirm what he had done during his dictatorship, and at the same time decree, that those who had put him to death should not be prosecuted. Cicero, in one of his letters to Atticus, expresses himself on this subject thus; The tyrant is no more; but the tyranny still subsists. We express great joy at his death, and at the same time confirm all his ordinances P.

(E) Cæsar, foreseeing that his intended expedition against the Parthians, a brave and warlike nation, would prevent him from returning to Rome for some time, had appointed consuls, as Cicero informs us, for the two following years, viz. Aulus Hirtius and Caius Vibius Pansa for the first year after his departure, and Decimus Brutus with Lucius Munatius Plancus for the second. According to

Dion Cassius, he had named consuls for the three following years; according to Appian for five, and according to Suetonius for many years. But the authority of Cicero ought to be of more weight than that of any historian, since he writes of such transactions as happened in his time, and in which he bore, generally speaking, no small share.

- a THIS act of oblivion brought matters to a more peaceable posture. Antony and Lepidus were still resolved to pursue their revenge on the conspirators, hoping to raise themselves by their destruction to the same post which Cæsar had held; but, as they were afraid of each other, and both of Décimus Brutus, governor of Cisalpine Gaul, they artfully concealed their ambitious designs, and caused the act of oblivion to be published in all the quarters of the city. As the conspirators still kept in their asylum, for fear of some sudden tumult, Antony and Lepidus sent their children to the capitol as hostages for their security; and then Brutus, Cassius, and their followers came down into the city. The same night, in token of a perfect reconciliation, Antony invited Cassius to supper, as Lepidus did Brutus. As Antony liked joking, he asked Cassius, Whether he had a dagger concealed under his robe? Yes, answered Cassius, who was naturally choleric and fullen, and a sharp one too, for any who shall dare to aspire at the sovereign power. This answer put a stop to any further jests. And now nobody doubted, but the republic would soon be restored to her former tranquillity. Even the populace began to look upon the conspirators as the deliverers of their country, and honour them with the title of tyrannicides. This tranquillity did no ways suit Antony's ambitious views. He therefore soon found means to put the whole city in an uproar, and to incense the multitude anew against those, whom they had deservedly begun to look upon as worthy of the greatest honours and rewards. Cæsar, on the ides of September of the preceding year, had made his will in his house at Laricum, and appointed his father-in-law Calpurnius Piso to see it executed. To him Marc Antony applied, and pressed him to produce the will, that it might be publicly read, being well apprised, that this would produce new disturbances, and have a great effect on the inconstant multitude. On the other hand, the dictator's enemies endeavoured to persuade Piso to suppress it; but he, being supported by Antony, openly declared, that nothing should divert him from discharging the trust Cæsar had reposed in him. The affair was at length brought before the senate, where it occasioned fresh disputes. Antony and Piso warmly insisted on having the will read, and the body of the deceased dictator honourably interred. Those, said Piso, who boast of having killed a tyrant, treat us themselves in a most tyrannical manner. They are willing, that whatever Cæsar has done in their behalf should be ratified, and at the same time demand, that his last dispositions be suppressed. As to Cæsar's funeral, you may order what you think fit; but as to his will, which he has deposited in my hands, I am resolved to read it before the whole people. The affair was long debated by both parties and with great warmth, Cassius violently opposing the proposal of Antony and Piso, which, if complied with, he foresaw, would revive the affections of the people and cause fresh troubles; but Brutus at length yielded, and it was decreed, That Cæsar's will should be opened, his funeral rites performed at the expence of the public, and he worshipped as a god. This was an unpardonable oversight in Brutus, and Cassius loudly complained of his too easy condescension and unseasonable humanity; and indeed with a great deal of reason: for the reading of the will, and the public honours decreed to the deceased, proved fatal, both to the avengers of the republic and the republic itself. The will being produced was read in the presence of the people; and there it was found, that he had appointed his three great-nephews his heirs, C. Octavius, Lucius Pinarius, and Quintus Pedius. To Octavius, the grandson of his sister Julia, he left three-fourths of his estate; and the remaining part to the other two. He also ordained, that young Octavius, his principal heir, should take his name, and be adopted into the Julian family; and that if any of his great-nephews should die or renounce his inheritance, Décimus Brutus and M. Antony should be substituted in their room. Several of the conspirators were appointed guardians to his children, in case he should have any; and Décimus Brutus, for whom he had a particular affection, was named to succeed Octavius, in case he should die without issue male, and to be adopted into the Julian family. By the same will he bequeathed to the Roman people his fine gardens beyond the Tyber, and to each individual citizen the sum of seventy-five Attic drachmas, or three hundred sesterces. These last tokens of Cæsar's good-will revived the affection of the people for him, and provoked them anew against Brutus and his followers, on whom they no longer bestowed the glorious name of tyrannicides, but that of assassins, threatening to treat them in the same manner as they had treated the dictator their common benefactor. Brutus, perceiving this change, mounted the rostra in quality of prætor, and, with the following speech, endeavoured to appease the

We are accused at the same time of cruelty, ingratitude, and perfidiousness. It is pretended, that we have violated the oaths, which tied us to Cæsar. What oaths, immortal gods! Had Cæsar any lawful power to require them? Did he not extort them with his sword at our throats? Do you look upon forced engagements as really binding? Can forced oaths oblige us to submit to a tyrant? Has not Cæsar acted as such ever since Pompey's death? He has disposed of the great charges and principal employments, without your advice, or that of the senate. The public money, the revenues of the provinces, were conveyed into his coffers. All the orders in the republic were forced to submit to his laws and arbitrary will. There is not one Roman throughout the empire, whom he did not injure in the highest degree; for he robbed him of his liberty, which is the greatest blessing of mankind. When he seemed to be rendering his country the most important services by his successful undertakings, at that very time was he laying his schemes how to bring her into subjection. He made war on foreign enemies, only that he might know how to subdue and enslave his fellow-subjects. It is said, that he was meditating great things for the republic when he was cut off. He might indeed have gathered empty laurels for himself by more wars at the expence of the republic; but what advantage would have redounded to us from his victories? Every accession of power must, by raising his tyranny higher, have sunk us lower and strengthened our chains. Had he left us any hopes of his laying down one day the power he had usurped, we should have bore the yoke with patience; but the name of perpetual dictator threatened us with eternal slavery. He treated the very name of liberty and the republic with contempt. He ridiculed Sylla for resigning his usurped authority, and manifestly shewed, that he had nothing in his head or heart, but absolute rule, a diadem, the title of king, and controlling the world according to his lust. It is said, that his person was sacred and inviolable; but did not he the first violate that respect which is due to sacred persons? Did he not depose two of our tribunes, and even condemn them to banishment, for no other reason, but because they took from his statues the royal diadem?" Then turning to the old legionaries, who had for the most part, received lands of Cæsar by way of reward for their long services. "As for you, brave veterans, said he, when you first entered into the service, was it to Cæsar, or to the republic, you engaged your fidelity by the military oath? You have fought under Cæsar; but was it for him you fought? You have conquered; and your victories ought to be amply rewarded. We are resolved to allow you the rewards which Cæsar had promised you. The commonwealth will not suffer you to be losers by his death. Those who have already received inheritances, shall be confirmed in the possession of them; and such as have not yet been rewarded, shall be satisfied for their services out of the first money that comes into the public treasury. This I promise in the name of the republic; and my word shall be sacred and inviolable in every thing but the supporting of tyranny." This speech which was no frivolous apology, as some assertors of absolute power are pleased to call it, appeased both the people and soldiery; but Antony and Piso soon found means to inflame them anew with fury and sorrow, two gross passions, which do not reason, but feel. They caused the body of Cæsar (F) to be brought forth with a great deal of pomp, being carried on the shoulders of men, who were all in office and of the most illustrious families in Rome. They had raised a kind of stage in the forum over-against the rostra, and on the stage a small temple of gilt wood, after the model of that of Venus, Cæsar's pretended mother. In this temple was a bed of ivory, richly adorned with curtains of cloth of gold and of purple. On the bed was laid the body of the deceased, the robe in which he was killed being hung up by it. All Rome crowded to see the mangled body of their deceased hero, whose loss they bewailed anew with many sighs and tears. Those chiefly, who had served under him in most of his wars, were incon-

(F) We are told by some historians, that the conspirators designed at first to throw the dead body of the dictator into the Tyber, in order to remove that object of compassion out of the sight of the populace; but being prevented from putting their design in execution by the tumult which happened in the senate, they left it in the senate-house, from whence it was privately conveyed in a litter to his house by three of his slaves, who took care to have it embalmed, not doubting, but the senate or people would, in due time, order it to be interred with all pomp and magnificence.

 still more, ascended the rostra (G), and took upon him to pronounce his funeral oration, inlarging on every topic which could move compassion. He enumerated the many victories he had gained, the innumerable conquests he had made, the various nations he had subdued, &c. Then he took notice of all the titles of honour which the republic had conferred upon him, his dictatorship, his being several times honoured with the consulate, the censorship, the dignity of pontifex maximus, and above all, with the glorious name of the father of his country. From thence he passed to his virtues, crying up his courage, his eloquence, his humanity, generosity, clemency even to his enemies, &c. After this, he repeated the oath which the people of Rome had taken to him, and by which they had sworn, that his person should be sacred and inviolable, and that they would defend him at the hazard of their own lives. Antony, perceiving the people to be infinitely affected with what he said in commendation of Cæsar, to stir them up yet further to compassion, or rather to madness, unfolded the bloody garment of Cæsar, shewed them in how many places it was pierced, and exposed to their view the number of his wounds. Hereupon Antony, seeing rage mixed with grief painted in every one's face, resumed his discourse, and turning to the capitol, Great Jupiter, said he, and ye gods, protectors of the Roman empire, I call you to witness, that I was determined to revenge his death, and fulfil my obligations; but the decree of the conscript fathers has tied my hands. Am I guilty of sacrilege and perjury? At these words the mob made great outcries, and nothing was heard but, Vengeance, vengeance. The senators were highly provoked against Antony, for thus firing the multitude with new fury; which he observing from their countenances and fearing to disoblige them, in order to reconcile to him that august body, and, in some degree, qualify what he had said, concluded thus: Yes, the gods themselves absolve me from the obligation of my oath. What has been done ought to be forgot; since it is the crime of some evil demons, enemies to Rome, rather than of men; and nothing ought now to be thought of, but honouring the memory of the illustrious deceased, and placing him among the immortal gods^c.

d Antony had scarce done speaking, when one of the spectators, flying, as seized with some fury, from the midst of the crowd and mounting the stage, laid hold of Cæsar's robe, and displaying it again to the multitude, There is the spoil of a hero, he cried, beloved of the gods and revered by the world even to adoration. These words interrupted with frequent sighs, uttered with a mournful tone, and accompanied with great outcries and strange postures of sorrow, occasioned a general commotion. At the same time, appeared all on a sudden an image of Cæsar in wax, which moved by springs, and shewed the twenty-three wounds which he had received on his face and other parts of his body. This sight transported the populace even to madness: the forum resounded with sighs mixt with menaces and curses against the authors of his death, whom they styled assassins, parricides, &c. worthy of the most cruel punishments. Their fury was so great, that they would defer no longer the solemnities of the funeral; but tearing to pieces the benches and chairs of the magistrates, who held their courts in that place, and carrying away the counters and tables from the adjoining shops, raised with them a funeral pile, and, placing Cæsar's body upon it, set it on fire; so that the body, the bed, and the temple were consumed in a moment. When the fire first began to flame out, the old soldiers, who had served under the deceased, threw into the flames all the military rewards which he had given them. Many women of distinction, to testify their grief and honour the memory of the deceased, threw into the fire their jewels, their childrens ornaments and robes, and whatever they had of value about them. The incensed multitude, whose blind fury knows no bounds, flocking in like madmen, in spite of the guards placed round the pile, snatched the flaming brands out of the fire, and ran to burn the houses of the conspirators; but they, having before-hand got together a great number of their friends

(G) Suetonius is the only writer among the ancients, who tells us, that Antony pronounced no funeral oration. The consul, says that historian, made no oration, as was usual, in commendation of the deceased. He only ordered a herald to read aloud the decree of the senate, placing Cæsar among the gods, and ordering divine honours to be paid him. Antony spoke only a few words in praise of the illustrious deceased. It is surprising, that Suetonius should be ignorant of so remarkable an incident, related at length by all other historians, and, what is more by Cicero, who, in his second Philippic, reproaches Antony with it in most bitter terms.

friends and domestics, easily repulsed a disorderly mob, that had no other arms but their grief and fury. As they were returning from the conspirators houses, they met one Cinna (H), who had been always greatly attached to Cæsar's party; but mistaking him for another of the same name, who was concerned in the conspiracy, fell upon him and tore him to pieces on the spot. Brutus and his party were so alarmed at these proceedings, that they thought it adviseable to retire from the city; and accordingly they privately withdrew to Antium, with a design to return again as soon as the fury of the people was abated, which, they hoped, would be soon, since the senate had espoused their cause. All the strangers in Rome mourned after the custom of their respective countries, especially the Jews, who watched several nights at the place where his body had been burnt (I). At last divine honours were given him, and an altar erected by the populace in the same place, which was ever after looked upon as sacred, his great nephew Octavius having caused a temple to be erected there, and a pillar of jasper twenty foot high, with this inscription, To the father of his country.^f

THE conspirators and the conscript fathers were equally offended at the artful speech of Antony. They complained, that, contrary to the decree of the senate and his own word, by which it was agreed to bury all that had passed in oblivion, he had so pathetically enlarged on the praises of Cæsar, with no other view but to stir up the rage of the people. Antony therefore, finding he had discovered himself too soon, and being well apprised, that it was in the power of the senate to cross his designs, resolved to regain their favour, or at least to blind them for a while, by inflicting severe punishments on the authors of the disturbances, which were daily raised in all the quarters of the city. One Amatius, passing himself upon the multitude for the grandson of Marius, and giving out that it was incumbent upon him to revenge the death of Cæsar his kinsman, committed every-where great disorders, being backed by a numerous mob, whom the reputation of his pretended grandfather drew after him. But Antony, to make his court to the senate, caused him to be seized, and put to death, without any further trial. As the people flocked daily in crowds to the altar, which they had erected to Cæsar, Antony caused it to be demolished. This provoked the mutineers, who thereupon assembled the next day in great numbers, in order to rebuild the altar; but Dolabella, with the consent of his colleague, fell upon them at the head of some legionaries, and cut several of them in pieces. Those who escaped the swords of the legionaries, were prosecuted by the two consuls, and punished with the utmost rigor, as disturbers of the public tranquillity. The slaves were all crucified, and such as were of free condition thrown down from the top of the Tarpeian rock. Such vigorous proceedings struck the unruly multitude with terror, and for a while restored the city to its former tranquillity. After this, Antony, having assembled the senate, assured the conscript fathers, that thenceforth his whole attention should be how to re-unite the people's minds, divided on this fatal occasion, and to prevent the calamities of a civil war. At the same time, to gain the fathers intirely, he proposed the recalling of Sextus Pompeius, son to Pompey the Great, who, ever since the

(H) We are told, that Cinna, of whom mention is made here, had the night before an odd dream. He fancied that Cæsar invited him to supper, and that upon his refusing to comply with the invitation, the dictator pressed him very earnestly, and at length taking him by the hand, led him into a dark place. After this vision, he was seized with a fever; but nevertheless in the morning, hearing that Cæsar's body was to be interred, and being ashamed not to be present at the solemnity, he went into the forum, out of respect to the memory of his friend, tho' his dream gave him no small apprehension. One of the rabble, whom Antony's speech had stirred up and enraged, seeing him there, asked another, Who he was; and having learnt his name, told it to another. It was presently reported, that he was one of the conspirators, or what is most probable, that he was that Cinna, who had a little before, in a speech to the people, inveighed against Cæsar, and this was enough for the furious multitude to tear him to pieces.

(I) No people received more signal favours at Cæsar's hands than the Jewish nation. He restored Hyrchanus, the son of Alexander to the sovereignty of Judæa, and secured the crown to him and his family by a decree, which he caused to be engraved on tables of brass in Greek and Latin, and to be hung up in the capitol at Rome, and in the temples of Tyre, Sidon, and Askalon in Phœnice: he remitted great part of the tributes, which the Jews paid annually to the republic; in acknowledgment of the assistance he had from the Jewish nation in the war of Alexandria: before he left that city, he confirmed all the privileges they enjoyed there, and ordered a pillar to be erected, whereon, by his command, all these privileges were engraved, and also his decree confirming them (45).

(45) Joseph. antiq. l. xiv. c. 17.

- a the battle of Munda, had concealed himself in Celtiberia. He was even of opinion, that the loss of his paternal estate, which had been confiscated by Cæsar and divided among his creatures, should be made good to him at the expence of the public; and that the supreme command of all the naval forces of the republic should be conferred upon him, in the same unlimited manner as his father had enjoyed it before him. This proposal was heard with surprize, and received with general applause. Some ascribed this change in Antony to his fear of the conspirators; others suspected, that he was desirous of engaging the senate in his favour against young Octavius, the dictator's heir, who was on his journey from Greece to Rome. All the senators, however, bestowed on him the greatest commendations, which were so much the sincerer, as
- b the restoration of young Pompey seemed to be an implicit condemnation of Cæsar's memory. Cicero himself, deceived by this false appearance of zeal, highly commended Antony's conduct, first in the senate, and afterwards in a letter he wrote to him, which the consul kept, and in due time made public by way of answer to the orator's bitter invectives.

THE conscript fathers were highly pleased with such a conduct in a consul and a friend of Cæsar; but the populace, extremely provoked at his thus changing sides, reproached him with ingratitude to the memory of his benefactor. Antony failed not to make himself a merit with the senate of this aversion. He even pretended to be afraid, lest the enraged multitude should make some attempt upon his life, and, as

c if he were not safe, demanded a guard of the senate to secure himself against the rabble, who, he said, threatened him with destruction. The conscript fathers could not well reject his request; since he had incurred the hatred of the people for the interest of the senate. They allowed him therefore a guard for the security of his person; but Antony, under this pretence, chose six thousand old legionaries, who had served with him under Cæsar, and passionately longed to revenge the death of their general. The senate was alarmed to see the consul walk the streets of Rome always attended with such a number of armed men. Even his friends remonstrated to him, that such an extraordinary attendance made him suspected and odious in a free state. Antony promised to disband them, as soon as he thought himself out of danger; and, in the mean time, to remove the suspicion they might entertain of his aspiring to succeed Cæsar in the dictatorship, he proposed a law abrogating that dignity for ever, and got it passed in the assembly of the people. This calmed for a while the fears of the conscript fathers: but Antony soon gave them fresh motives of jealousy; for having gained over to his interest Cæsar's secretary, whom some call Faberius, others Tabirius, and by his means made himself master of all his papers, he appointed what officers he pleased, brought whom he thought fit into the senate, recalled some from exile, freed others out of prison, &c. and all this as ordered so by Cæsar, whose acts had been declared void by the senate. The Romans, by way of raillery, called those new magistrates and senators Charonites, because, if obliged to prove their patents, they must have had recourse to the registers of the dead, that is, of those who had passed the river Styx in Charon's bark. They were also styled Orcini, an epithet given to such slaves as were enfranchised by their masters will made on their death-bed. Antony, having by this artifice introduced many of his own creatures into the senate, began to act with great independency, knowing he had nothing to fear either from the conscript fathers or the populace, since he had now a strong party in the senate, and was guarded by a numerous body of chosen troops against the insults and attempts of the multitude. Besides, the whole authority of the government was, we may say, in his hands. He was himself consul, one of his brothers, Lucius Antonius, was tribune of the people, and the other, C. Antonius, prætor; so that, without taking upon him the title either of king or dictator, it may be said, that he governed Rome with an absolute sway. As for Lepidus, Antony attached that powerful Roman to his interest, by procuring for him the dignity of pontifex maximus, vacant by the death of Cæsar, and betrothing his daughter Antonia to young Lepidus his son.

IN the mean time, some of the conspirators returned to Rome, while others continued at Antium. Among the latter was M. Brutus, who, upon intelligence that many of the old soldiers, who had served under Cæsar, of whom they had received lands, lay in wait for him, and by small parties had stolen into the city, would not expose himself to unnecessary dangers. However, in his absence, most magnificent shews were exhibited exhibited to the people at his expence, he being then prætor; for having bought up a great number of wild beasts of all sorts, he gave positive orders, that not one of them should be disposed of or saved; but that they should be all used in those shews. He even went in person as far as Naples to engage a considerable number of comedians, and wrote to Cicero and his other friends, begging them by no means to omit honouring his shews with their presence^a. Cæsar had, before his death, allotted provinces to the chief men among the conspirators, viz. Macedon to M. Brutus, Syria to Cassius, Asia to Trebonius, Bithynia to Cimber, and Cisalpine Gaul to Decimus Brutus. Some authors write, that these provinces were given them by the senate. However that be, they still continued in or near the capital, to watch Antony's steps, who now manifestly aspired, notwithstanding all his former protestations, at the sovereign power.

SUCH was the posture of affairs, when news was brought, that young Octavius, Cæsar's great-nephew and adopted son, was coming to take possession of his inheritance. He was the son of Caius Octavius of the senatorial order, who had been prætor of Macedon, and of Accia, daughter to Julia Cæsar's sister. The Octavian family was divided into two branches, viz. the Cneii and the Caii. The former were early distinguished at Rome with the first honours of the republic; but the latter, from whom Cæsar's adopted son was descended, were but simple knights at the time of the second Punic war. Octavius's great-grandfather served in Sicily in quality of legionary tribune, and his grandfather bore the first employments in Velitræ, his native city. His mother Accia, or Atia, was the daughter of Julia and M. Accius Balbus, whose family, as appears from several ancient inscriptions, had been, long before the birth of Octavius, one of the most conspicuous of Aricia, an ancient city of Latium (K). Octavius was born in the consulate of Cicero and Caius Antonius, that is, in the year of Rome 690. His father Caius Octavius dying when he was but four years old, his mother Accia married again, and took to her second husband Lucius Marcius Philippus, descended from those Philippi, who signalized themselves in the Macedonian wars. From his infancy he bore the surname of Thurinus, borrowed, as Suetonius conjectures, from his father, who drove the remains of Catiline's army from the neighbourhood of Thurium, a city of Great Greece, and was from thence styled Thurinus. Accia d

His education. his mother and Philippus his father-in-law took care to have him educated and instructed by the best masters then in Rome; and he is said to have so profited by their instructions, that at nine years old he harangued the people with wonderful intrepidity, and pronounced the funeral oration of his grandmother Julia when he was not quite twelve. All the writers of his age tell us, that from his infancy he gave glaring proofs of an exalted mind, capable of managing the most difficult enterprizes. His extraordinary parts, say they, joined to the majesty of his mein and comeliness of his person, influenced in his favour all who knew, or only beheld, him. Above the rest

(K) Marc Antony reproached Octavius with the meanness and obscurity of his ancestors. According to him, Octavius's great-grandfather, on the father's side, was a freed-man, and by profession a rope-maker in the territory of Thurium, and his grand father a banker. On the mother's side, Antony derived his pedigree from a perfumer, who afterwards turned baker in the city of Aricia. Cassius Parmensis, in a letter he wrote to Octavius before the battle of Actium, told him, that he owed his birth to a money-changer and a woman brought up in the mills of Aricia. But these calumnies are learnedly rejected by Joseph Rocco Volpi, an Italian jesuit, in his account of the antiquities of ancient Latium, where he proves from several ancient inscriptions, that the Octavian family, before their migration to Rome, which happened, according to him, in the reign of Tarquinius Priscus, had borne the first employments in the republic of Velitræ, now Velletri. As to the Atian family, he shews, that, for several ages before the birth of Octavius, it had been one of the most conspicuous of Aricia. Virgil indeed derives the Atian family from Atys, the companion of Iulus, son to Æneas.

Many writers, and among the rest F. Volpi, are of opinion, that Octavius was brought up in the town of Ulubra, situated in the district of Velitræ; for Suetonius tells us, that he was educated in avito suburbano prope Velitras; and that, as soon as he spoke, he commanded the frogs that were croaking to be silent, and from that time, adds he, negantur ibi coaxare. From this passage they infer, that Octavius was brought up in a place near Velitræ, which abounded with frogs, and consequently at Ulubra, which was in the territory of Velitræ; and, as it was situated in the midst of the Pomptine marshes, must of course have been well stocked with frogs (47). Hence it is, that Tully calls the inhabitants of this town frogs, because, like frogs, they lived in the midst of marshes (48.)

a rest, Julius Cæsar, his great uncle, was so taken with his prudent conduct and a certain maturity of judgment, which young Octavius discovered from his tender years, that he cherished him, with all the tenderness of a father, and very early formed the design of adopting him, in case he had no children of his own. He designed to take him with him into Spain, when he went thither to make war on the sons of Pompey, that he might have an opportunity of instructing him in the military art; but his mother Accia, alarmed at a slight indisposition, with which he was seized when upon the point of departing, kept him in Rome till that war was near ended, the battle of Munda being fought before he reached Spain. He intended to carry him with him to the Parthian war, and with this view sent him before to Apollonia, on the other side of the Adriatic, to wait for him there, and in the mean time improve his talent for eloquence under the famous rhetorician Apollodorus of Pergamus. He had been six months in Apollonia, when he received the news of his uncle's tragical death, which most sensibly afflicted him. At first he knew not whether the whole senate was privy to his death, or whether he had fallen by a conspiracy of his private enemies; but, a few days after, he was informed that sixty senators of the most illustrious families in Rome had been in the plot; that even those who had no share in it, did, however, secretly favour the conspirators, whom they looked upon as the deliverers of their country; that this party was very powerful; that Antony, Lepidus, and the other friends of his great-uncle, under pretence of avenging his death, aimed at nothing else but to establish their own power; that the city was filled with troubles and commotions occasioned by the animosity of different parties. &c. At the same time he received letters from his mother and father-in-law, and his other friends and relations, advising him to forbear for the present declaring either his pretensions or resentment, since there could be no safety for him, but in an obscure and private life. Some of his friends went even so far as to advise him to renounce Cæsar's adoption, lest he should be involved in the same fate with his uncle. Others would fain have persuaded him to seek for shelter among the troops in Macedon, which had, for the most part, served under Cæsar, and were appointed to attend him in his expedition against the Parthians. But Octavius, rejecting the timorous counsels of his friends, resolved to pass over into Italy without delay, to inform himself on the spot of the situation of affairs. Accordingly he went on board a small vessel, and, passing the Adriatic sea, landed at Lupia, now known by the name of La Rocca, between Brundisium and Hydruntum. The former of these two cities was the usual place of landing for those who came from the east; but Octavius thought it advisable not to shew himself there, the place being full of soldiers, till he had, by means of some dexterous persons, sounded the dispositions of both the inhabitants and garison. The latter no sooner heard of the arrival of their late general's son, than they went out in a body to meet him, and introduced him in a kind of a triumph into the city. Octavius thanked them for their attachment and respect to the memory of his uncle, and, after having offered a solemn sacrifice to the gods, declared himself Cæsar's heir and son by adoption, calling himself no longer Caius Octavius, but Caius Julius Cæsar Octavianus (L); and by the latter name we shall distinguish him, following therein most of the ancients, till he acquires that of Augustus, which was given him by the senate after the victory he gained over Antony at Actium. His thus taking the name of Cæsar, and declaring himself his heir, in so critical a conjuncture, was, no doubt, a bold step in a youth scarce eighteen years old; the more, because it was against the advice of all his friends and relations: but, from his first setting out, fortune seemed to espouse his cause; and indeed his rise seems to us more owing to fortune, that is, to seasonable conjunctures, and to the great reputation of his uncle, whose memory was adored by the soldiery and populace, than to any extraordinary parts of his own. All the writers of his time, whether historians or poets, men of great wit, but notorious flatterers, represent him as the greatest commander, the ablest statesman, and the most accomplished prince, the world ever saw; but whether he deserved the praises, which they so lavishly bestowed upon him, and for which they were amply rewarded, is a question which

which must be decided by facts. But to proceed : the garison of Brundisium, which was very numerous and consisted for the most part of brave veterans, whom Cæsar intended to lead against the Parthians, not only offered their service to Octavianus, but put him in possession of all the military stores and provisions, which Cæsar had prepared for his Parthian expedition and conveyed to Brundisium, in order to be transported from thence into the east. At the same time, Octavianus had the good luck to intercept the tributes, which were sent annually to Rome from the provinces on the other side of the sea, and likewise the provisions and money designed for the support and payment of the troops of the republic in Macedon. These Octavianus seized for his own use, which was, according to the laws of Rome, a capital crime, and would have been punished with death in less turbulent times ; but Octavianus, young as he was, had already resolved to make himself master of the republic, under the specious pretence of revenging his uncle's death. Being thus supplied at once with men, money, arms, and provisions, he set out from Brundisium, and took his rout through Campania to Rome. On the fourteenth of the calends of May he arrived at Naples, and the next day went to visit Cicero at his country-house in the neighbourhood of Cumæ, whither the orator had retired for fear of Antony, who now governed Rome with an absolute sway. Of this visit Cicero himself makes mention in one of his epistles to Atticus^w. Octavianus wanted a man of Cicero's eloquence and authority to support his interest in the senate, and Cicero one of Octavianus's credit among the troops to screen him against the attempts of Antony, with whom he had quarrelled. It was therefore agreed between them, that Cicero should assist Octavianus with his eloquence, both in the senate and with the people, and that Octavianus, on the other hand, should defend Cicero against all his enemies especially M. Antony (M). From Cumæ Octavianus pursued his journey to Rome, being joined, as he passed through Campania, by the most considerable of his uncle's friends, his relations, free-men, and even his slaves. The veterans likewise, to whom Cæsar, after the civil war, had given lands in Italy, hastened from all parts to offer their service to his adopted son. As he drew near Rome, most of the magistrates, the officers of the army, and the people came out in throngs to meet him. Of all the friends and creatures of the dictator, Antony alone neglected to pay him the least respect ; nay, he did not so much as deign to send any of his servants or attendants to compliment him in his name ; but of this young Octavianus took no notice, being unwilling, on so trifling an account, to disoblige one, with whom he had affairs of much greater moment to transact. His friends indeed could not forbear publicly condemning the pride and ingratitude of Antony ; but Octavianus, with a seeming good temper, excused him on account of his great age and the prerogatives of the consular dignity. It behoves me, who am but a young man, and in a private station, said he, to wait the first on one who is my senior, and in the highest post of the republic. Accordingly he resolved to make him a visit the next morning ; but, as he designed to have his adoption first ratified by the prætor, according to the Roman custom, he desires his friends to meet him early the next morning in the forum, with as many attendants as they could get together, in order to assist at that ceremony. His friends and relations, with numerous crowds of clients and attendants, accompanied him early in the morning, pursuant to his request, into the forum, where he proved before Caius, the brother

(M) We are told by Plutarch, that Cicero had long had a tender regard for young Octavius, which, if that writer is to be credited, was occasioned by the following dream : While Pompey and Cæsar were yet alive, says Plutarch, Cicero, in a dream, seemed to summon the sons of the senators into the capitol, as if Jupiter designed to declare one of them the sovereign of Rome. The citizens, hastening thither out of curiosity, surrounded the temple ; and the youths, sitting in their purple robes, kept a profound silence. On a sudden the doors opened, and the youths arising passed one by one before the god, who reviewed them all one after another, and dismissed them ; at which they seemed much displeased : but when it came to Octavius's turn to be reviewed, Jupiter, stretching forth his hand, said aloud, This, O Romans ! this young man, when he shall become master of Rome, shall put an end to all your cruel wars. The same author adds, that Cicero, by this vision had framed a perfect idea of the youth, and preserved it in his mind, tho' he did not know him. The next day, as he was going down into the campus Martius, he met the boys returning from their exercises, and the first he saw was young Octavius, just as he had appeared to him in his dream. Being greatly surprised at this, he asked him who he was ; and hearing he was the grandson of Julia, Cæsar's sister, from that time he saluted him where-ever he met him, and shewed on all occasions a particular regard for him. But we do not find one word of this in all Cicero's works ; and yet it is not to be presumed, that he would have concealed so significant a dream from his friend Atticus.

brother of Antony, at that time prætor urbanus or city prætor, his adoption, declared Octavianus with the usual ceremonies his acceptance of the same, and caused this his acceptance to be registered by the public scribes or notaries. From the forum Octavianus went straight to Pompey's gardens, where Antony then resided, he having appropriated them to himself upon that great man's death. The consul made him wait a great while at the gate, to let him know, by that affected disregard, how much he was above him, and what degree of authority he designed to maintain over him. At length he admitted him into his apartment, and received him with great politeness and civility. Octavianus spoke first. He began with returning thanks to Antony for his attachment to the memory of his father, and the panegyric he made at his funeral. Then he modestly complained of his having suffered a pardon to pass in favour of the conspirators, whom he might have punished with as much severity, and as arbitrarily, as he had done the impostor Amatius. He reminded him in a very handsome manner of Cæsar's friendship to him, and of the many good offices he had done him. He conjured him, by the memory of his friend and benefactor, to assist him in revenge- ing his death, at least not to oppose him in so laudable an undertaking. In the close of his speech he gave Antony to understand, that he was resolved to pay immediately the legacies which his father had left to the people and soldiery; and therefore desired him to deliver up to him, as Cæsar's chief heir, the money which he had caused to be conveyed from Cæsar's house to his own; But as that, said he, will hardly be sufficient to discharge all my obligations, I shall be highly obliged to you, if you will either lend me some of your own, or procure me some at interest from the quæstors, that I may pay off what shall remain due to those whom my father has remembered in his will. As for his moveables, I am willing you should keep them, as marks of his affection; but for the ready money I have present occasion, and therefore hope you will order it, without delay, to be delivered to me. Antony, amazed at the young man's boldness, and piqued at what he said in the close of his speech relating to his father's money, which, according to Plutarch, amounted to no less than four thousand talents, told him with an air of authority, That he was very much mistaken, if he fancied, that Cæsar had left him heir of the Roman empire, as well as of his name and fortune; that his death ought to have taught his adopted son, that the constitution of the commonwealth allowed neither of hereditary nor elective sovereigns; and that therefore he ought not to demand reasons of a Roman consul for what he had done in the government of the commonwealth. As for the obligations, which he pretended to owe him on account of the honours which he had procured for his father's memory, he willingly acquitted him of them all, since what he had done was without any regard to him, and only designed for the good of his country. However, added he, to me alone you are indebted for his name and his estate; for had Cæsar been treated like an usurper, which I alone prevented, there had been neither will, inheritance, nor adoption: but I secured to him the honours due to his memory, and by that means his name and estate to you, even at the hazard of my own life. 'Tis true, I have suffered some decrees to pass in the senate favourable to the conspirators; but I have been prompted thereunto by reasons, which one of your age is not capable of discerning. As to Cæsar's money, which you demand, it does not amount to so great a sum as you imagine; besides, as it belonged to the commonwealth, from which your father took it, it has been, in great part, shared among the magistrates since his death, who are to lay it out according to the exigencies of the state. As for what remains, I am ready to put it into your hands; but give me leave to advise you, young man, not to lay it out in largesses and gratifications: employ it rather in sending back to their respective colonies that shoal of followers, who attended you hither. The populace is a monster that will never be satisfied, and will always requite the good offices of their fellow-citizens with the basest ingratitude. As you are conversant in the Grecian history, you must know, that the favourites of the people are, generally speaking, short-lived, and that the popular affection is more inconstant than the waves of the ocean*.

Octavianus, highly offended at this speech, took his leave of Antony, repeating several times, as he went out of the door, the name of Cæsar. He was well apprised, that the consul kept his father's money and estate from him, with no other view but to disable him from purchasing the favour of the people. He therefore resolved to expose expose to public sale all the houses and lands that belonged to the dictator, declaring, that he had not accepted his inheritance, had it not been to prevent Antony from depriving so many families of the effects of Cæsar's bounty towards them; but the consul, to put a stop to the sale, prevailed upon some private citizens to claim the lands, as the estates of their ancestors, which the dictator had appropriated to himself during the civil war. At the same time the quæstors and other officers of the revenue, at the instigation of the consul, claimed part of those lands, as having been confiscated for the use of the public. Hereupon Octavianus, foreseeing the affair would be drawn out to a great length, instantly put up to sale his own patrimony, with the estates of his mother and father-in-law, who willingly parted with them to promote his designs, and assist him in purchasing the favour of the people. With the money accruing from these sales he paid part of his father's legacies; which affected generosity so charmed the populace, who expected more favours from him, that they all declared in his favour, and broke out into bitter invectives against Antony, for withholding from him his father's estate. A few days after, a new dispute arose between Antony and Octavianus, on occasion of the public shews, which Crotonius exhibited during his ædileship. The senate had decreed, as we have related above, in Cæsar's life-time, that at all public shews a gilt chair and a crown of gold should be placed for him even after his death, to make the memory of that great man immortal. Pursuant to this decree, Octavianus failed not to send the chair and crown; but the ædile, gained over by Antony, refused to admit them. Hereupon the affair being carried before the consul, Antony answered coldly, That he would refer it to the senate; And I, answered Octavianus haughtily, will go and place my father's chair where it ought to stand, while you are consulting the conscript fathers. Antony, provoked at the young man's boldness, threatened to send him to prison, if he offered to bring forth his father's chair and crown, either at the games of Crotonius, or at those which he himself was to exhibit in honour of the dictator before the temple of Venus. Octavianus, perceiving that this prohibition was ill received by the people, resolved to turn it to his advantage; and accordingly going into the forum, complained there to the multitude of the injury done to the memory of his father, addressing himself to Antony, as if he had been present: Why should your hatred to me, said he, extend to Cæsar, who deserved so well of you? Why do you endeavour to prevent me from paying those honours to the memory of my father, which you yourself procured, and the senate decreed, for him? Sacrifice me, if you please, to your revenge; but do not thus revile the Manes of a great man, to whom you owe your present dignity. Suffer me at least, O Antony, to discharge those legacies, which he has left to his fellow-citizens; I freely abandon to your insatiable avarice all the rest. I shall think myself rich enough, if I can but do justice to his memory, by distributing among the people what he has left them by his will. This discourse incensed the populace against Antony; every one detested his ingratitude; even his own guards, who had all served under Cæsar, threatened to abandon him, if he continued to persecute the son of their general. Hereupon Antony, finding it behoved him to dissemble, notwithstanding his passion against young Octavianus, answered, That he preserved a tender regard for the memory of Cæsar, and had also a great value for his son; but that as the young man, proud of the name of Cæsar, pretended to put himself upon the level with a consul, he thought himself obliged to make him sensible of the difference there was between a private citizen and the chief magistrate of the republic; but that he was ready to forget all that was past, provided Octavianus would, for the future, pay him that respect and deference, to which his office and age intitled him. This explanation was, at the request of the officers, followed by an interview, in which, after mutual protestations of friendship, they promised to assist each other in revenging Cæsar's death and persecuting the authors of it.

In this pretended reconciliation with Octavianus, Antony had his private views. As the consular year was near expiring, he hoped, by the interest of Octavianus, to procure for himself the province of Cisalpine Gaul, which had been given to Decimus Brutus by the dictator, and confirmed to him after his death by a decree of the senate. As he knew the importance of that government with respect to all Italy, he remonstrated to Octavianus, that since he was generously disposed to revenge the death of his father, he ought not to suffer one of his assassins to enjoy a command at the very gates of Rome. Octavianus fell into the snare, and promised to assist him with all his interest.

a interest. Hereupon the affair was brought before the senate, where it met with great opposition, the conscript fathers looking upon the cause of the conspirators as the same with that of liberty. Besides, they could not turn Brutus out of the province which Cæsar had allotted him, without reversing the decree by which they had confirmed all his acts. The proposal was therefore rejected by a great majority; nay, there were not wanting some, who, well apprised of Antony's ambitious views, proposed declaring that province a free state, rather than trusting the government of it to one, who would make use of it as a place of arms, and from thence awe the capital; but as that province seemed very convenient for his designs, Antony had recourse to the people, whose tribunes he had bribed; and the undiscerning multitude, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the senate, granted him the government he desired. On this occasion Octavianus employed all his interest in favour of Antony, and it was chiefly by his intrigues and under-hand management, that the consul carried his point. The conscript fathers immediately dispatched a messenger to Brutus, acquainting him with what had passed, and advising him not to deliver up the province to Antony; but to fortify himself there, and keep out the consul, if necessary, by force of arms.

Antony obtains of the people the province of Cis-alpine Gaul.

THE friends of Cæsar triumphed on account of the reconciliation between Octavianus and Antony; but, as the interests of the two rivals were so widely opposite, each of them aspiring at the same power which Cæsar had enjoyed, it was impossible they should continue long united. Antony, thinking himself now master of Italy, began to thwart Octavianus's measures and regard him less; nay, he commanded him, under severe penalties, to forbear bribing the populace with his largesses: and because Octavianus, by the great interest he had among the people, was likely to get Flaminius, one of his creatures, named to the tribunate, Antony employed all his credit and authority with the multitude to postpone the election. Thus the hatred and aversion of the two rivals were kindled anew. Antony never mentioned Octavianus, but with the epithets of a rash, turbulent and seditious young man; while Octavianus, on the other hand, left no stone unturned to stir up the resentment of the people against Antony. The senate was overjoyed at this division; but Antony's guards and the late dictator's friends did not fail to remonstrate to him anew the dangerous consequences of their disagreement, and to exhort Antony to be reconciled again to the son of their general: Both your safety and ours, said they, depends upon the undoing of the conspirators. If their party prevails, we must expect to be proscribed, as the ministers and accomplices of an usurper. Nothing can support our party but your union with young Octavianus. Assist him therefore in his generous design of revenging Cæsar's death. Let it not be said, that the dictator's best friend crosses his son, in the prosecution of those who have basely and treacherously murdered his father. Antony was no less desirous of destroying the conspirators than his soldiers and officers: but he could not brook it should be owing to Octavianus. He was afraid, that, under pretence of revenging Cæsar's death, he might seize on the sovereign power, after having ruined the republican party. This was the secret motive that prompted him to oppose Octavianus, whom he saw greatly beloved both by the soldiery and people. However, as it much concerned him not to disoblige the officers and legionaries, who had followed him since the dictator's death, he undertook to justify his conduct to them in the following harangue, which is related at length by Appian, and unravels all the mysteries of his wicked policy. After having given them an account of the disturbances that happened in the city upon the first news of Cæsar's death, he goes on thus: "The general cry was, that the republic was restored, and the senate seemed disposed to decree a reward for the assassins, as the authors of liberty. If this had been effected, Cæsar had been declared a tyrant, and we all involved in the same sentence as his accomplices; but I alone stood up against all the conspirators, their relations, their friends, and, I may say, against the senate itself. Their adherents foreseeing, that, if Cæsar was not declared a tyrant, the conspirators might be punished, were very sanguine for having his memory branded with infamy. As both parties defended their opinions with obstinacy, I thought it adviseable to propose a general pardon for the conspirators, rather than a reward. The conscript fathers approved of my proposal, and, thinking the conspirators secure, were easily prevailed upon to drop the question relating to Cæsar. Thus I preserved the glory of his name intire, saved tual engagements and promises to assist each other, as the former had done; but notsist him in revenging Cæsar’s death; but would not put him at the head of a party, which, after the defeat of the conspirators, would be master of the republic. On the other hand, Antony, quite indifferent about the revenging of Cæsar’s death, only pretended to be in earnest, to ingratiate himself with the soldiery and populace. The sovereign power was what he aimed at, and whoever traversed him in the pursuit of it,

AND now Antony, the more to attach his colleague Cornelius Dolabella to his interest, and at the same time to weaken the party of the conspirators, persuaded him to demand the government of Syria, which had been allotted by Cæsar to Cassius, and the command of the army which the dictator had designed to lead against the Parthians.
The senate, highly offended at such an unseasonable demand, remonstrated to him, that it was an insult both upon the memory of Cæsar, who had given that government to Cassius, and upon them, who had, by a special decree, confirmed all his ordinances; but Dolabella, who was now wholly addicted to Antony, answered, That Cassius had first transgressed the ordinances of Cæsar; and that a traitor, who had imbued his hands in the blood of his friend and benefactor, ought to not have any share in his favours. As the senate continued inflexible, the affair was brought before the people, who readily granted the government of Syria to Dolabella, in hopes of seeing a speedy vengeance taken of the dictator’s enemies, without considering, that their death would be immediately followed with the loss of their own liberty. Antony, take-ing advantage of the present disposition of the people, prevailed upon them at the same time to confer on his brother Caius Antonius the government of Macedon and Illyricum, which had been given to M. Brutus. By these new promotions Brutus and Cassius were deprived of their governments; but the senate, who placed all their hopes in these brave patriots, and were equally jealous of Octavianus and Antony, procured other provinces for them, viz, Cyrene and Crete for Cassius, and Bitthynia for Brutus ^a.

A new breach between Antony and Octavianus.

As the reconciliation of Antony and Octavianus was forced and no-ways sincere, their pretended friendship was but short-lived. A few days after they had mutually engaged in the capitol to assist each other, Antony caused some of his guards to be put under arrest, giving out, that they had been corrupted by Octavianus to murder him.
This point has never been well cleared up. Some writers are of opinion, that it was only a fetch of Antony’s to estrange the minds of the people from his rival. Others seem inclined to believe, that Octavianus had really formed such a design, and that he was put upon it by the conscript fathers, with whom he was at that time upon very good terms. Cicero, tho’ a friend to Octavianus, does not question the fact;
but endeavours to turn it to the glory of Octavianus, as if he ought to be highly commended for attempting to deliver the republic from so cruel an enemy. There were not wanting some among the zealous republicans, who imagined, that the whole was agreed on before-hand between the heads of the two parties, that they might have a

a plausible pretence to raise troops for the accomplishment of their private designs; but their ensuing conduct sufficiently shewed, that each of them sought the others destruction, and aspired to remain alone at the head of the party, which was opposite to that of the conspirators. With this view they began now both to raise forces. Antony They both arm sent orders to his brother Caius, for whom he had procured the government of Macedon, to bring over into Italy four of the légions that were quartered in that province. He flattered himself, that Lepidus, who was now in Spain at the head of four legions, and Plancus, who commanded three more in Transalpine Gaul, would declare for him. On the other hand, Octavianus, fearing to be surpris'd and crush'd by his enemy, hastened into Campania, where he drew together ten thousand brave veterans, who had served under Cæsar, and had been rewarded by him for their service with lands in that part of Italy. To these the name of Evocati was first given, because after they had served their legal time, and received the rewards due to their valour, they were again invited into the army. He likewise found means to corrupt with large presents and gain over two of Antony's legions, the Martial and the fourth. Having thus raised an army of his own authority, without being invested either with a military title or any magistracy, which gave him right to head the forces of the republic, especially against a consul, he marched straight to Rome; but thought it adviseable to halt at the temple of Mars, about two miles from the city, till he obtained the consent of the people for his entry. Canutius, a tribune of the people, in an harangue to the multitude, assured them, that young Octavianus had no other view, in entering Rome with so numerous a guard, but to protect them and himself from the insults and dangerous attempts of the cruel and ambitious consul. The populace, always short in their foresight, believed their tribune, and suffered Octavianus to enter the city with all his forces. Antony was then at Brundisium, whither he had gone to appease a tumult, which some mutineers had raised among the Macedonian legions; but as he was hourly expected back, both with his own guards and the other legions which had remained faithful to him, no-body doubted, but a civil war would soon be kindled within the very walls of Rome. In this persuasion some sided with Antony, others with Octavianus; but the most discerning among the senators declared for neither, affecting to stand neuter, and, in the mean time, stirring up under-hand the heads of the two parties against each other, not without hopes of seeing them both undone by their mutual hatred^b. Cicero, out of the aversion he bore to Antony, sided with Octavianus, whom he had assisted with his advice ever since his first arrival in Italy, omitting no occasion to discredit his rival Antony both with the senate and people; as plainly appears from those inimitable declamations which have reached us, and are known by the name of Philippics, a name borrowed from the orations which Demosthenes wrote against Philip the father of Alexander. M. Brutus, who was still in the neighbourhood of Rome, wrote several letters to Cicero, wherein he complained of his conduct in very sharp terms, telling him, That, notwithstanding his boasted love of liberty, he was very sensible he could endure a tyrant; that it was manifest, from his courting Octavianus, that he did not intend liberty for his country, but a bountiful master for himself; but our forefathers, said Brutus, could not brook even an easy and gentle slavery. As for my own part, says he in one of his letters, I am not resolved whether I shall make war or peace; but as to one point I am fixed and settled, which is, never to be a slave. I wonder, that you, says he in writing to Cicero, should fear the danger of a civil war, and not be much more afraid of a dishonourable and infamous peace. All you can promise yourself from destroying the tyranny of Antony is, to make Octavianus the tyrant. Such were the sentiments of that noble and truly generous spirit^c!

f BUT to return to Antony: after he had appeased the tumult, which had been raised among his troops at Brundisium by the emissaries of Octavianus, and discharged such of the officers as he distrusted, he ordered his legions to march to Ariminum; but took himself his rout towards Rome, which he entered at the head of a thousand well-armed legionaries; but the very next day he left the city, and went to Alba, in hopes of regaining the two legions which had revolted from him, and were quartered in that city; but they shutting the gates against him, he hastened from thence to Tibur, where he had lodged great store of ammunition and provisions, with a design to drive Decimus Brutus out of Cisalpine Gaul. At Tibur he was joined by the tenth legion legion, lately arrived from Macedon, by several senators, and a great number of Roman knights, who came to offer him their service. Many veterans likewise, who had formerly served under him, flocked to him from all parts of Italy; so that he began his march towards Ariminum at the head of five legions, and a considerable body of Roman knights. Octavianus was in the mean time at Alba, with the two legions that had abandoned Antony, one of new-raised soldiers, and two of such veterans as had served under his father. From this place he wrote to the senate, complaining of the inconstancy of some members of that august body, who, after the most solemn protestations of friendship to him, had basely abandoned his party and joined that of his rival. At the same time, he offered to march with all his forces against Antony, as a common enemy. The senate commended the young general's zeal, but adjourned all deliberations on so weighty an affair, till the election of new consuls. But the soldiers pressed him to take upon him the title of proprætor, without waiting till the senate or consuls conferred it upon him, and in that quality to head them against Antony. Octavianus well knew that this would give great umbrage to the senate, whose favour he designed to court till he had got rid of Antony; and therefore he refused the title, with which his legionaries were willing to honour him. When his most intimate friends, whom he used to consult in all affairs of moment, remonstrated to him, that his troops would scruple to obey a citizen without any title or magistracy, he acquainted them with the reasons which induced him to refuse the title offered him by the army. The senate, said he, has declared for me, not out of friendship to me, but because they are afraid of Antony: their design is to make use of me to destroy him, and afterwards to destroy me by the hands of those who have assassinated my father; but this is not a proper time to let them understand, that I have penetrated so far into the mysteries of their policy, which I should certainly do, if I accepted of those honours which the army offers me: this they would look upon as an incroachment upon their authority, and hate me as much as they do Antony. Let us therefore dissemble for a while; my pretended respect and submission to them will engage them to confer on me a dignity which, they know, my soldiers are disposed to give me in spite of them. And indeed the conscript fathers, deceived by his seeming modesty, conferred on him that very title which he had lately refused; nay, at the motion of Cicero, desirous of having in him a powerful and hearty protector against Antony, they ordered a statue to be erected to him, gave him a place in the senate, and enabled him to hold the consulate ten years sooner than was allowed by law. Thus was the timorous orator securing a protector to himself at the expence of the public safety^d.

vince of Cis-

to Mutina.

In the mean time, Antony from his camp at Ariminum dispatched a messenger to Decimus Brutus, acquainting him with the decree of the people, which deprived him of the government of Cisalpine Gaul, and conferred it on himself. To the decree of the people Brutus opposed that of the senate, confirming all the acts of Cæsar. After several messages and deputations, Antony at length threatened to have him declared an enemy to the republic, if within a limited time he did not resign to him the government of a province, which had been allotted to him by the Roman people. Brutus, without being in the least frightened by his threats, returned answer, that he had been appointed governor of Cisalpine Gaul by a decree of the senate, and would not quit his province, till those who had placed him in it thought fit to recall him. Hereupon the consul, breaking into the province at the head of a numerous army, made himself master of several cities, and even laid siege to Mutina, now Modena, whither Brutus had retired with a troop of gladiators and three legions, two of which he had formerly commanded under Cæsar. The siege of Mutina was looked upon by the senate as a declaration of war; but they postponed all deliberations on so important a subject, till the new consuls entered upon their office. These were Caius Vibius Pansa and Aulus Hirtius, who had both served under Cæsar, and were great friends to Cicero. Hirtius was the author of that relation of the Alexandrian and African wars, which is annexed to Cæsar's commentaries. They no sooner entered upon their office, than they assembled the senate, and, after having set forth in a very pathetic speech the evils with which the republic was threatened, they proposed the two following questions to the consideration of the conscript fathers, viz. what rewards the two legions deserved, that had abandoned Antony to side with Octavianus, and what expedients

expedients they judged proper to be taken in order to bring Antony to renounce his pretensions to the province of Cisalpine Gaul? It was unanimously resolved, that the two legions should be rewarded, and the consuls were impowered to confer on them what rewards they thought proper. As for Antony, some were of opinion, that a deputation should be sent to him, intreating him in the name of the senate to raise the siege of Mutina and abandon that province. But Cicero, in a speech, which has reached us, viz. his fifth Philippic, shewed, it was beneath the dignity of the Roman people to treat with a revolted citizen, and that negotiations would only give him time to strengthen himself in the province he had usurped; he was therefore of opinion, and promoted his opinion with great warmth and eloquence, that war should be forthwith proclaimed against him, as a common enemy. His speech was filled with most bitter invectives against Antony and the highest commendations of Octavianus; which seems to confirm the truth of what M. Brutus wrote to his friend Atticus, viz. that Cicero did not, in siding with young Cæsar, intend to deliver his country from tyranny, but to procure a bountiful master to himself. Others are of opinion, that Cicero, deceived by the affected modesty and feigned protestations of the young politician, really believed, that he had nothing else in view but to guard himself and the republic against the ambitious attempts of Antony. However that be, after warm debates, which lasted three days, Cicero, who bore great sway in the senate, prevailed upon the conscript fathers to pass a decree, commanding Antony to raise the siege of Mutina without delay, to quit the province of Cisalpine Gaul, and marching his troops over the Rubicon, which parted Gaul from Italy, to wait on the banks of that river for further commands from the senate. All this he was ordered under pain of being declared an enemy to his country. But Antony, who had a numerous army under his command, and could not persuade himself, that Octavianus would imploy his forces against him in favour of one of the conspirators, paid no manner of respect either to the deputies of the senate, who were sent to acquaint him with the decree, or to the decree itself. Hereupon, at the motion of Cicero, Antony was declared an enemy to his country, and the two consuls were ordered to raise troops and hasten to the relief of Brutus, who was closely besieged, and already reduced to great straits in Mutina. At the same time, Octavianus was commanded by the senate to join his forces to those of the consuls; and to act in concert with them against the common enemy. He was invested with a power equal to that of the consuls, and it was decreed, that the veterans, who served under him, should be rewarded with lands as soon as the war was ended, and be exempted for ever from the service.

He is at the motion of Cicero declared an enemy to his country.

WHILE the two consuls were busy in raising troops, news was brought to Rome of the death of Caius Trebonius, who by a decree of the senate had been sent into Asia in quality of proconsul. The manner of his death is thus related by Cicero. Dolabella having obtained, as we have related above, by means of Antony, the government of Syria, hastened thither; but on his arrival found Trebonius in possession of several cities, which he had seized as lieutenant to Brutus, who had been first appointed governor of that province. As Dolabella was not in a condition to dispossess him by force of the places he held, he invited him to an interview, in which it was agreed that they should abstain from all manner of hostilities, and live in perfect amity and friendship; for Dolabella pretended now, as he had done formerly, to be in his heart a friend and well-wisher to Brutus and his followers. The credulous republican, relying on the promises of Dolabella, continued quietly at Smyrna as in the most peaceable times; but his treacherous rival, taking advantage of his security and indolence, surprized the city in the dead of the night, and having taken Trebonius himself prisoner, delivered him up to a Roman exile, by name Samarius; who, after having made him suffer by Dolabella's orders, for two days together, the most exquisite torments which rage and cruelty could invent, caused his head to be cut off, and his body to be dragged through all the streets of Smyrna, and then thrown into the sea. His head was carried on the point of a spear all over the city, and afterwards set up over-against the tribunal, where he used to administer justice. From thence it was taken down by the soldiers, who being incensed against Trebonius, as privy to the death of their general, abused the poor remains of his body in the grossest manner.

ner (N)^f. Thus was Trebonius, the first of all the conspirators, inhumanly sacrificed to the manes of Cæsar. He was one of the dictator's chief favourites, had been raised by him to the consulate for the three last months of the year 708, and had been two years before trusted with the government of Hither Spain, whither he was sent to stop the progress of the sons of Pompey. He served the dictator with great fidelity, till he began openly to aspire at the sovereign power; and then, the love of his country getting the better of all private obligations, he joined Brutus, and shared with him the glory of delivering, at least for some time, his fellow-subjects from slavery. When the news of his death, and soon after the remains of his mangled body, were brought to Rome, the senate, highly provoked at the cruelty and tyranny of Dolabella, declared him, at the motion of Cicero, a rebel and enemy to his country. At the same time, they passed a decree enacting, that Brutus should have the government of Macedon and Illyricum, and the command of the forces in those provinces, till such time as the republic recovered her ancient majesty; that he might make use of the fleet, which Apuleius had, by Cæsar's orders, got ready, together with all the provisions, military stores, and money, to the amount of seven thousand talents, which Cæsar had lodged in the city of Demetrias, and designed for his Parthian expedition; that Cassius should take upon him the government of Syria, and the charge of making war upon Dolabella and revenging the death of Trebonius; and, lastly, that all governors and commanders of forces belonging to the republic should receive orders from these two generals^g.

Dolabella declared a rebel and enemy to his country.

Antony endeavours to gain over Hirtius and Octavianus.

Antony, being informed by his emissaries of such an extraordinary step taken by the senate, laid hold of this opportunity to raise suspicions and jealousies in the minds of the consul Hirtius and young Octavianus against the conscript fathers. He writ a letter to them in common, putting them in mind of the many favours they had received at the dictator's hands, upbraiding them with ingratitude for basely betraying the cause of their benefactor to embrace that of his murderers, and laying open to them the secret designs of the senate, which were to make them the instruments of each others ruin. These remonstrances made a deep impression on Octavianus, and inclined him to a reconciliation with his rival. But, as his own interest was the sole rule of his conduct, and he apprehended, that if he joined Antony, that general would pretend to be acknowledged the head of the party, he still pursued his former measures, which were to court the favour of the senate, till such time as he had got rid of so powerful and formidable a rival. Pursuant to this scheme, he not only pretended to be quite unacquainted with the private views of the conscript fathers, but, to give proof of his deference to the consuls, readily surrendered to Hirtius the legions of Mars and the fourth, which had quitted Antony's party, and which the consul, by a secret order from the senate, required him to deliver up to himself. After this he joined the remainder of his forces to those of Hirtius, and marched with him into Cisalpine Gaul to the relief of Decimus Brutus, while Pansa, the other consul, continued in Italy to raise more troops there. Hirtius and Octavianus took Bononia and several other cities which Antony had seized, and then, advancing to the neighbourhood of Mutina, incamped at a small distance from Antony's lines, with a design to cut off his communication with the neighbouring country, and by that means oblige him, for want of provisions, to raise the siege. In the mean time, P. Ventidius, a soldier of

Hirtius and Octavianus march to the relief of Decimus Brutus.

(N) Appian, Dion Cassius, and Velleius Paterculus relate this affair in a different manner. They tell us, that Trebonius, who had been sent into Syria by Brutus as his lieutenant, refused to admit Dolabella, though consul, into the cities of Smyrna and Pergamus; but nevertheless, out of respect to the consular dignity, supplied his army with provisions, and sent word to the Ephesians, that they might open their gates to him. While the consul was marching towards Ephesus at the head of his army, Trebonius detached a small body of troops after him to observe his motions. As he quietly pursued his rout to Ephesus without committing any hostilities, the greatest part of Trebonius's troops returned to Smyrna.

Then Dolabella, turning back unexpectedly upon those who remained, cut them all to a man in pieces, and advancing by the favour of the night to Smyrna without being perceived, surprised the city, and put all those to the sword who offered to oppose him. A party of his soldiers, breaking into the house where Trebonius lodged, seized him in bed. The proconsul earnestly intreated the centurion, who commanded the party, to carry him to Dolabella. We will carry you to the consul, answered the centurion, who was one of Cæsar's old soldiers: But your head must remain here. Accordingly he immediately cut off his head, which was kicked about by the incensed soldiery in a most contemptuous manner (49)

a of fortune, who had served under Cæsar and was a particular friend to Antony, quitting Rome, were Cicero governed with an absolute sway, visited all the colonies which Cæsar had lately established in Italy; and, as he was well known for his valour, and greatly beloved by the soldiery, he raised in a short time two legions, consisting wholly of veterans, with a design to march them to the relief of Antony. But first, he caused several of them to enter Rome privately with orders to seize upon Cicero, who was daily inveighing against Antony, and wholly taken up in raising money, at the expence of Antony's friends, to pay the troops of Octavianus and the consuls. But the orator, having timely notice of his design, abandoned the city, with several other senators, and concealed himself in the country. Hereupon Ventidius, finding his design had got vent, marched in all haste towards Mutina; but all the passes being seized by Hirtius and Octavianus, he was obliged to retire into Picenum, where he raised another legion, keeping his troops in a readiness to march on the first opportunity that offered of serving his friend and party ^b.

In the mean time, Pansa, having raised four legions in Rome, left the city, and, taking his rout towards Cisalpine Gaul, arrived at Bononia. As the country between that city and Mutina was full of woods and marshes, Hirtius and Octavianus upon the news of his approach detached the legion of Mars, which consisted wholly of veterans, with their guards, or prætorian cohorts, under the command of Carfuleius, to cover his march. On the other hand, Antony sent out in the night-time his two best legions, the second and thirty-third, with orders to conceal themselves among the rushes of a large morass, which lay on each side of the Æmilian way, through which the consul Pansa was to march. Carfuleius joined the consular army with his detachment before they reached the morass, and was marching in the van at the head of the legion of Mars and the guards of Hirtius and Octavianus, when upon entering the causeway, which led across the marsh, he observed some armed men lying among the rushes. However, he advanced boldly on the causeway with the legion of Mars; but was not gone far before he saw himself invested by Antony's two legions, who, starting up from among the reeds and rushes, fell upon him with incredible fury. At the same time, Antony appeared in person at the head of his cavalry in the neighbouring plain. The consul Pansa, at the head of two of his legions, flew to the assistance of the legion of Mars, which was engaged with two of Antony's legions; but those brave veterans, refusing to admit the consul's raw and undisciplined levies into their ranks, for fear they should rather incumber than relieve them, the consul passing the morass, marched in good order into the plain, to prevent Antony from lending any assistance to his legions and guards on the causeway, where both parties fought with a fury hardly to be expressed. Antony's two legions were bent on revenging themselves on the Martial legion for having abandoned their party; and on the other side the Martial legion was resolved to maintain that honour and reputation which they had gained in many battles under Cæsar. Thus the engagement became a particular quarrel between the soldiers; and never did troops fight with more rage and emulation. As their numbers were pretty equal, Antony's two legions being supported by his guards, and the Martial legion by the guards of Hirtius and Octavianus, the battle lasted from morning to night without any considerable advantage on either side. Octavianus's guards were almost to a man cut in pieces, but those of Hirtius, after having made a dreadful slaughter of the enemy, obliged Antony's second legion to give ground, which they did in good order. The Martial legion and Antony's thirty-third fought the whole day, driving each other in their turns from the causeway into the morass, till Carfuleius drew off his men to relieve the consul Pansa, who was engaged with Antony in the plain and hemmed in by his cavalry. But, as Carfuleius's legionaries were greatly fatigued after so long and obstinate an engagement, before they reached the plain, the consul was mortally wounded and his troops put to flight. Torquatus, quæstor of the consular army, had, during the battle, formed a kind of camp, to serve as an asylum for his party, in case of any misfortune. Thither the consul's legions retired, carrying with them their general, who was run through the body with a javelin. Antony pursued them, not doubting but he should easily force their intrenchments, which were not yet completed. But the consular legions, though wholly consisting of raw soldiers, who had been just defeated in the plain, made so vigorous a resistance, that Antony, fearing Hirtius might come upon him in the mean time time, thought it advisable to content himself with the advantage he had gained, and return to his camp before Mutina. But while his troops were marching back in disorder, as often happens after a victory, Hirtius unexpectedly appeared at the head of twenty chosen cohorts, and, falling upon them before they could form their ranks, cut many of them in pieces. However, those brave veterans, tired as they were, made a vigorous resistance, and, being encouraged by the example of their general, who distinguished himself on this occasion in a most eminent manner, stood their ground a great while; but were at length entirely defeated, and forced to save themselves by flight cross the marshes on each side of the Æmilian way. Hirtius, who in this action discharged the duty both of an experienced general and a valiant soldier, would not suffer his men to pursue the fugitives for fear of some ambuscade, it being already dark, and the country full of woods and marshes. As for Antony, he passed a melancholy night with part of his forces in a small village called Forum Gallorum, at present Castel Franco, whence he returned greatly dejected by day-break to his camp before Mutina. His cavalry rallied in the dark, and, taking up their wounded behind them, reached their camp by midnight, being quite spent with the fatigue of two battles, and a march of sixty furlongs through woods and marshes. As for Octavianus, some writers tell us, that he was at the first battle; nay, Antony afterwards upbraided him with having fled, in a cowardly manner, before him, after having quitted his horse and thrown away his arms, that he might with more ease save himself, cross the woods and marshes, where, according to him, he lay concealed two days, being both ashamed and afraid to shew himself. Others say, that he remained in his camp in the neighbourhood of Mutina, and there repulsed with great bravery a strong detachment from Antony's camp, which attempted to force his intrenchments. They add, that for so gallant an action, which was, we may say, his first essay in the art of war, he was honoured by the senate with the title of Imperator, as were likewise the two consuls for their courageous behaviour in the two battles. The loss on both sides was pretty equal; in the first battle Octavianus's guards, with a great number of Pansa's legionaries, were cut in pieces; but in the second Hirtius lost only a small number of men, whereas the slaughter of the enemy was very great^d.

The consul Hirtius is killed.

AFTER the battle both armies returned to their respective camps in the neighbourhood of Mutina. Antony resolved only to defend his lines, and in the mean time carry on the siege with all possible vigor. On the other hand, Hirtius and Octavianus, fearing the place, if not relieved, might soon be obliged to capitulate, were for venturing another engagement. But as Antony kept close within his lines, the two generals resolved to make a bold push, in order to throw some succours into the invested city. Accordingly, leaving a sufficient number of forces to guard their camp, they marched with the rest close up to Antony's lines, with a design to force them where they appeared weakest. Antony immediately sent out all his cavalry against them; but his horse being put to the rout, after a sharp engagement, by the enemy's legionaries, who had possessed themselves of an eminence, he caused two legions to advance, which were so vigorously attacked by Hirtius, that they soon began to give ground and retire in disorder to their intrenchments. The consul pursued his advantage, and, suffering himself to be carried away by his courage and ardour, entered the lines pell-mell with the fugitives, and penetrated, in spite of all opposition, as far as the general's quarters, where he received a blow, which laid him dead on the ground. And now, by the death of one of the consuls and the absence of the other, who had been conveyed to Bononia after the first battle, in which he was mortally wounded, Octavianus was left commander in chief of the whole army. He is said by some writers to have given on this occasion signal proofs of an extraordinary courage, and to have conducted the action with all the prudence of an old and experienced commander. For at the head of some brave legionaries he rescued the body of the dead consul out of the enemy's hands, and one of his standard-bearers being killed, he carried the eagle himself, fighting like a private man in the first line. But, as he observed the consular troops somewhat discouraged by the death of their leader, he retired in good order out of the enemy's camp into the neighbouring plain, where the action being renewed, he gained a complete victory, and obliged the enemy to seek for shelter behind their intrenchments. Some ascribe the whole glory of this action to Decimus Brutus, who, sallying out of the city, and falling a falling upon the enemy's rear while they were engaged with Octavianus, forced them to give ground and retreat in the utmost confusion to their camp (O). However that be, Antony, weakened by these losses and fearing the event of a third battle, raised the siege the next day; and, not being in a condition to keep the field before a victorious army, retired towards the Alps, and took the road to Transalpine Gaul, with a design to join Lepidus, Plancus, and Asinius Pollio, who were in those large provinces at the head of considerable armies ^k.

Decimus Brutus, being thus delivered from a long and troublesome siege, was for some time at a loss how to behave with Octavianus, who, he knew, bore him an irreconcilable hatred, notwithstanding the assistance he had lent him against Antony.
b At length, by the advice of his friends, he dispatched a messenger to him, inviting him to an interview on the banks of the Scultemnis, now the Panaro. Octavianus received the messenger with great coldness, but agreed to his proposal; which Brutus no sooner understood, than he caused the bridges on the river, which parted the two armies, to be broke down, and by a second message required, that the conference might be held in the presence of their troops, and with the river between them. These were not unseasonable precautions, it being well known, that Octavianus had vowed the destruction of all those who had been any ways concerned in the death of his father; for this was the pretence he made use of, on all occasions, to destroy such as were true friends to their country and enemies to tyranny. Octavianus having
c agreed to these conditions, both he and Brutus appeared on the opposite banks of the river; when the latter thanked him in a very obliging manner for the assistance he had lent him, and acknowledged himself indebted to him for the liberty he enjoyed. To this polite discourse Octavianus answered with great furliness, that Brutus owed him no obligations, since he had relieved Mutina, not for his sake, but to chastise the insolence of Antony, who nevertheless might one day become his friend, whereas he should ever maintain a mortal enmity to Brutus, and all those who had embrued their hands in the blood of his father. Brutus, piqued at this haughty and threatening answer, replied smartly, that since Antony was already sufficiently humbled, he had no further business in the province of Cisalpine Gaul, which had been confirmed to him by a decree of the senate, forbidding any other general to enter it without his leave. Octavianus was highly offended at the boldness of Brutus; but, being well apprised that he was supported by the senate, he thought it adviseable to stifle his resentment for the present, and quitting the neighbourhood of Mutina to return to Bononia, where he found the consul Vibius Pansa lying at the point of death. He no sooner heard of the arrival of Octavianus, than he sent for him, and, tenderly embracing him, spoke to him in the following manner: I always loved your father more than myself, and when he was slain, would have ventured my own life to save his, had I been armed. I never laid aside the desire, nor the hopes, of revenging one day his death, though some prudential reasons, to which even you have submitted, have tied my hands, and kept me in the party of the senate. But now my death, just at hand, deprives me of that comfort. However, before I expire, I will at least acquit myself towards the son of what I was indebted to the father. Know then, that the senate both hates and suspects you. Nothing has pleased them more than to see you fall out with Antony, and they flatter themselves with the hopes of finding you become the instruments of each other's ruin. If they have declared for you, it was only because they thought you the weakest, and the man they could the more easily overcome. This they have declared more than once to Hirtius and to me. The friendship therefore, with which Cæsar once honoured me, obliges me to give you such advice, as I myself would follow on the like occasion. Agree with Antony; for you have no other means of saving your life and advancing your fortune. My design was not, as the senate believed, to destroy Antony, but to compel him by force of arms to be reconciled with you, and afterwards to join our armies, and in conjunction pursue the murderers

(O) The battle of Mutina was fought on the seventeenth of the calends of May, as is plain from a letter, which Galba, who was in the battle, wrote to Cicero (50). From the third day after this victory, those seem to reckon the beginning of Augustus's reign, who will have him to have governed the Roman empire forty-six years four months and one day (51).

of our common benefactor. I return to you your two legions, and would willingly surrender up to you the rest of the army, but they do not intirely depend upon me. The commanders are most of them the spies of the senate, who have private orders to observe your conduct. Suffer me therefore to put them into the hands of Torquatus. The words of the dying consul made a deep impresson on the mind of Octavianus, and produced at length the famous triumvirate. Pansa died presently after, having first delivered up his army to Torquatus one of his lieutenants ¹ (P).

IN the mean time, the senate, upon the news of the advantages gained over Antony by the generals of the republic, decreed, at the motion of Cicero, fifty days supplications to return thanks to the gods for the success of the campaign. By the same decree large sums were ordered to be paid immediately out of the public treasury, to such of the victorious legionaries as remained alive, and to the widows and heirs of those who had died in the battle, or since of their wounds; which had never been done before on account of any victory. The bodies of the two consuls were, by an order from the senate, conveyed to Rome, and with the utmost magnificence interred in the Campus Martius at the expence of the public; an honour which had been hitherto granted to none but the most eminent personages of the republic. The bodies of three other officers of distinction, viz. of Caius Peduceus, Decimus Carfulcius, and Pontius Aquila, were conveyed to Rome with those of the consuls, and interred with great pomp in the burying-places of their respective families, most of the senators attending their obsequies ^m.

AND now the conscript fathers, conceiving Antony to be utterly undone, began to slight Octavianus, for whom they believed they should have no further occasion. He demanded a triumph, which was refused to him and granted to Decimus Brutus, though Octavianus, it must be owned, had at least as just a claim to that honour as Brutus. Cicero indeed was for granting an ovation, but could not, with all his eloquence, prevail upon the senate to allow him even that mark of distinction. On the other hand, they heaped all sorts of honours on Decimus. They ordered Torquatus to deliver up to him the troops which the consul Pansa had commanded: they appointed him commander in chief of all the forces in Cisalpine Gaul, charging him, without so much as mentioning Octavianus, to pursue Antony, and treat him as a public enemy. All the temples of Rome were opened, and public prayers appointed for the success of his arms: as the siege of Mutina had been raised on his birth-day, the senate decreed, that it should be for ever deemed a lucky day, and as such marked in the fasti. At the same time, the conscript fathers, as if they had taken pleasure in mortifying Octavianus, passed a decree, enacting, that a statue should be raised at the public expence to the memory of Pontius Aquila, one of the conspirators who had been killed in the battle of Mutina; and that all the charges he had been at, and the losses he had sustained during the war, should be made good to his heirs out of the public treasure. So many marks of distinction heaped upon the conspirators, left Octavianus no room to doubt of the disposition of the senate toward him. From that moment he resolved to follow the last advice of Pansa, and to be reconciled to Antony. With this view he sent back to him a great number of officers, who had been taken prisoners in the last battle, and among the rest Decius, one of Antony's most intimate friends, after having signified to him in ambiguous words his intention. Ventidius, as we have observed above, had raised three legions for Antony, and was attempting to join him after the battle of Mutina. Octavianus overtook and surprised him with a superior force, and might easily have defeated him; but he suffered him to escape, after having had a private conference with him, wherein he charged him to tell Antony in his name, that he was ignorant of his true interest, and acted

(P) Octavianus was suspected of having murdered both the consuls; Hirtius with his own hand in the heat of the battle, and Pansa after it, by causing poison to be poured into his wound by Glyco his physician. It is certain Glyco was seized, and even condemned to the torture, but saved by the credit of his master Octavianus. Decimus Brutus indeed wrote to Cicero in behalf of the physician, whom he seems to have thought incapable of so black a crime. But notwithstanding Brutus's declaration, who was known to be a humane and good-natured man, the report was credited by many in Rome. As for the consul Hirtius, Aquilius Niger wrote, that Octavianus killed him undesignedly in the hurry of the battle. We will not warrant the truth of these reports; but neither can we look upon them as calumnies altogether groundless, as some modern writers call them, broached by enthusiastic republicans to blacken the reputation of so great a man. But of the treachery, ingratitude, and horrid cruelties of this great man, we shall have many, too many, instances in the sequel of this history.

a acted directly contrary to it. At the same time he opened himself without reserve to Lepidus, Plancus, and Asinius Pollio, all old officers of the dictator, and with whom he had always maintained a secret correspondence. He wrote to them, that the senate, intirely addicted to the assassins of his father, were resolved to destroy him; that they ought not to expect a more favourable treatment; that their common enemies studied only how to divide them, in order to crush them the more easily one after another; that for their own safety they ought to unite their forces, and join in maintaining the party, and revenging the death, of their late general, &c. He added some complaints of Antony; but in so artful a manner, that it was easily seen he was no ways averse to a reconciliationⁿ.

b IN the mean time, Antony, pressed by Brutus, endeavoured to gain the Alps with a design to pass those mountains, and join Lepidus, who commanded seven legions in Transalpine Gaul, and who, he imagined, would stand his friend in consideration of the many kind offices he had done him, during his late consulship and in the dictator's life-time. Brutus, having thus driven him out of Italy, wrote to the senate, that he had dispersed his army, and that Antony himself was sculking somewhere among the Alps, where he could not avoid falling into his hands. The senate, overjoyed at this news, cried out, that the republic had at length recovered its ancient liberty, and appointed, as if Antony had been actually taken, ten commissioners to try him. They talked of nothing less than repealing all the laws which had been enacted by him during his consulship, and even including in this repeal all the ordinances of the dictator, in order to resettle the commonwealth on its ancient foundation. At the motion of Cicero a decree immediately passed, confiscating all Antony's effects, and those of his friends and adherents, with grievous menaces against such as should dare to conceal any part of his effects. While Cicero, at the head of the senate, was thus venting his rage upon Antony, that general was struggling among the Alps with all the hardships and miseries that can be imagined. Brutus, having obliged him to quit Italy, he attempted to pass those mountains, without his baggage and the necessary provisions for so long and painful a march. His men were forced to feed first upon the flesh of their horses, and afterwards on such wild fruits and roots as they could find in that mountainous and inhospitable country, and which no man had ever tasted before; nay they were at last so pinched with hunger, that they devoured the very bark of trees. Plutarch tell us, that in this extremity, Antony, though accustomed to luxury and ease, was a most illustrious example of patience to the whole army, and that in misfortune he could not be easily distinguished from a virtuous man. He suffered all hardships imaginable with the constancy of a hero, and fell into a behaviour, which no one could have expected from a man wholly addicted to his pleasures. But after all, he must have perished with his whole army, if Culeo, one of Lepidus's lieutenants, who guarded the passes, had performed his duty. But the venal commander suffered himself to be bribed by Antony, and for a sum of money granted him a free passage. Antony no sooner entered Gaul, than he wrote to Lepidus, Plancus, and Asinius Pollio, reminding them of their ancient friendship, and exhorting them to join him against the murderers of Cæsar, their common enemies. Lepidus was greatly surprised at his arrival, and quite at a loss how to behave in so critical a conjuncture. He was a man of an illustrious family, but of slender parts, of a narrow mind, and at the same time of an unbounded ambition. He was afraid, that if he joined Antony, who was greatly beloved by the troops, he might get the ascendant over him, and scarce leave him the rank of a lieutenant in his own army; and upon this consideration alone he rejected Antony's proposals, and wrote him word, that, since the senate had declared him an enemy to his country, he could not join him without drawing upon himself a decree of the same nature; but he assured him at the same time, that whatever orders he received from the senate, he would carefully avoid coming to an engagement, or any ways molesting him. Asinius Pollio on the contrary no sooner received Antony's letter, than he assured him, that he should find him always ready to concur with him in all his measures; for he had been one of Cæsar's particular friends, and bore an irreconcilable hatred to all those who had been concerned in his death. As for Plancus, he kept a secret intelligence with both parties, and carefully avoided declaring himself openly for either side, till he saw which was most likely to prevail. In the mean time, Antony marched straight up to Lepidus's army, and marked out his camp near his,

but without fortifying it, as if they had been of the same party and interest. He sent out immediately some of his officers to him, putting him in mind of their ancient friendship, and conjuring him by Cæsar's memory to concur with him in revenging the death of their common benefactor. But Marcus Juventius Laterensis, one of Lepidus's most intimate friends, and in his heart a zealous republican, did all that lay in his power to dissuade him from joining Antony. To conceal his attachment to the party of the conspirators, he artfully represented to Lepidus; that, having seven legions under his command, he was one of the most powerful generals of the republic, and would be of great weight, what side soever he chose; but that, if he joined Antony, he would be obliged to submit to the authority of so haughty and imperious a commander, and would make but a very poor figure. By this means the zealous patriot strove to prevent a conjunction, which he was well apprised would prove fatal to his country. But Antony, who saw his ruin unavoidable, if Lepidus should be at length prevailed upon to act in concert with Decimus Brutus, resolved to push his fortune and venture all. His hair was long and disordered, nor had he shaved his beard since his late defeat. In this condition and with a mourning mantle flung over him, he went boldly into the camp of Lepidus, and there began to harangue the soldiers, who had all served with him under Cæsar. They were all greatly moved at his habit, and more at his speech; which Lepidus observing, ordered the trumpets to sound, that he might be heard no longer. This raised in the soldiery a great sense of compassion; insomuch, that they secretly sent Clodius and Lælius disguised in women's cloaths, advising Antony to attack Lepidus's camp, and assuring him, that the greater part were disposed to receive him with open arms, and even to dispatch Lepidus, if he would give them orders for so doing. Antony would by no means suffer any violence to be offered to Lepidus; but early the next morning he marched at the head of his troops, founded a river (Q), which lay between the two camps, and was the first who flung himself into the water to gain the opposite side. The soldiers of Lepidus no sooner saw him than they ran in crowds to receive him, and began to beat down the works, and level the ramparts to make way for him. Antony entered the camp amidst the loud acclamations of the soldiery, and marched straight to the general's quarters, whom he found asleep in his tent. We may easily conceive the surprise of Lepidus at the sight of Antony, no longer in the attire of a suppliant, but surrounded by his guards, and attended both by his own officers and those of Lepidus. He leaped out of his bed in the utmost consternation, and throwing himself at Antony's feet, offered him the command of the army. Antony, though now absolute master both of his person and army, treated him with great civility, tenderly embraced him, giving him the name of father, and even left him the title and all the badges of a general, though he alone performed the functions of that office. The brave Juventius Laterensis was so touched with the misfortunes which he foresaw this fatal conjunction would bring upon his country, that, while the generals were embracing each other, he killed himself in the height of his grief with his own sword. This union happened on the fourth of the calends of June, as is plain from Cicero's epistles. Afinius Pollio, who was incamped at a small distance from Lepidus, followed his example and joined Antony. Munatius Plancus, who had been hitherto wavering and doubtful which Side to take, thought it now high time to declare himself; and accordingly, leaving his camp at the conflux of the Rhone and the Saone, where he had been trusted by the senate with the charge of founding a colony (R), he led all the troops under his command to Antony, who was much about the same time joined by Ventidius at the head of three legions. So that he, who a little before had fled before Brutus, and abandoned Italy, that neighbourhood a colony which he called Lugdunum. The ancient city was founded, according to some writers, in the year of Rome 364 by two brothers, named Momorus and Atepomarus, chiefs of the Gaulish nation, and contemporaries with the famous Brennus. In process of time Lugdunum and Lugdunum became one and the same city (52).

^a Italy, found himself now in a condition to return thither with twenty-three legions and above ten thousand horse.

WHILE these things were transacting in Gaul, Octavianus continued still at Bononia with the fourth legion, that of Mars, and some others, which had remained with him after the battle of Mutina. As the senate had committed the whole management of the war against Antony to Decimus Brutus, he concluded from thence, that the conscript fathers intended to reduce him to the state of a private citizen. To ward off this blow, he resolved to stand for the consulate, which office was become vacant by the death of Hirtius and Pansa. But as he was well apprised of the difficulties he should meet with in the pursuit of that dignity from the senators, who were for the most part intirely addicted to the party of Brutus and Cassius, he artfully applied himself to Cicero, with whose vanity and ambition he was well acquainted. He wrote a letter to him, discovering his design to him as to a bosom friend, and telling him, to flatter his ambition, that he was very desirous of having him for his colleague in the consulate; in order to be instructed by so great a master in the rules and maxims that are requisite for the government of the commonwealth; that for his part, he only desired the name of consul, to make him some amends for the loss of a triumph which he thought due to him, but that all the power and authority should be left to him; so that he might manage affairs as he pleased. Cicero, old as he was, suffered himself to be made the dupe of a child as he used to call him; and, to the great surprize of all, proposed in the senate the raising of Octavianus to the consular dignity, as the only means of preventing him from being reconciled with Antony. He added, that, as Octavianus was yet very young, the conscript fathers ought to appoint him such a colleague, as by his age and prudence might be capable of having an eye on his conduct, and be, as it were, a governor to him. At these words the senators, plainly perceiving that he pointed out himself as the most proper person to be chosen for Octavianus's colleague, could not help laughing out aloud; and it was no small mortification to Cicero to see his vanity at the same time both exposed and disappointed; for all the relations and adherents of the conspirators cried out with one voice, that to put Cæsar's son at the head of the republic was utterly destroying it ^a.

^d Octavianus, finding he could obtain nothing of the senate even by Cicero's means, resolved to put off no longer his reconciliation with Antony; and accordingly wrote a letter to him, inviting him back into Italy, and exhorting him to forget all private injuries, and concur with him in humbling their common enemies. Antony, overjoyed to find Octavianus so earnest for a reconciliation, readily consented to it, and, without further delay, began his march towards Italy to confer there with Octavianus. He led with him seventeen legions and a thousand horse; having left six legions in Gaul under the command of Varius, one of his bottle companions, who on that account was nick-named Cotylon, which signifies a bottle.

^e IN the mean time, the news of the conjunction of Antony and Lepidus reaching Rome, filled the city with consternation. The senate immediately assembled, and passed a decree, declaring Lepidus an enemy to his country; and likewise the legions of his army, who should not abandon him and return to their duty before the calends of September. This decree was enacted the day before the calends of July, as appears from one of Cicero's letters to C. Cassius ¹. The statue of Lepidus was, by order of the senate, thrown down, and that of the brave Juventius Laterensis raised in its room. As the senate was quite ignorant of the reconciliation between Octavianus and Antony, and the private treaty, which by this time was concluded between them and Lepidus, they had resource to Octavianus, and committed to him, in conjunction with Decimus Brutus the management of the war against Antony and Lepidus. ^f Octavianus, who was well acquainted with all the arts of tricking and deceit, returned the senate thanks in the most humble terms, for the honour they had been pleased to confer upon him; and began, without delay, to raise troops, and make the necessary preparations for a new war. When he saw himself again at the head of an army, he threw off the mask, and assembling his soldiers, told them, that the only thing the senate had in view was, to destroy all his fathers friends, by sowing divisions among them, and arming them against each other; but that he, well apprised of their wicked designs, had entered into a confederacy with Antony and Lepidus, who were on their march into Italy at the head of seventeen legions; that this was the only means of procuring safety for themselves, and for so many brave men who had espoused their cause : Do you believe, said he, that those who have murdered my father, will spare my life or yours, if their party should prevail ? and prevail they must, if we are divided among ourselves. What security can you have for those houses, lands, and inheritances, which my father allotted you, if those men got into power, who approve of his death and are for annulling all his ordinances ? You know I am not ambitious ; for you have seen me refuse the prætorship, which you yourselves offered me. But now I must intreat you, not for my own sake, but for yours, to concur with your votes and interest in raising me to the consulate. I shall be in a condition, when vested with that dignity, to secure to you the possession of those inheritances, which my father bestowed upon you, and at the same time to revenge his death, with the destruction of those who endeavour to destroy us. The soldiers received this proposal with great joy, and immediately appointed deputies to go to Rome, and demand the consulship for their general in the name of the legions. The senate received the deputies with great civility, but refused to comply with their request, alledging Octavianus's youth, who had not yet attained the age which the laws required in a consul. But the deputies, who had been well instructed beforehand, brought several instances of persons who had been raised to the consular dignity without any regard to their age, viz. of Rullus, of Decius, of Corvinus, of the two Scipios, of Pompey, and of Dolabella, who had been but very lately honoured with the consulate, though much of the same age with Octavianus. These precedents were of no weight with the conscript fathers : others, 'tis true, had enjoyed that honour before the lawful age ; but most of them were persons of unblemished characters, and avowed defenders of the public liberty ; whereas they had reason to believe, that Octavianus would make use of his power to oppress his country. As for Dolabella, he had been raised to the fasces by Cæsar without the consent of the senate. The fathers therefore, without casting any reflections on Octavianus or declaring their real motives, under divers other pretences, endeavoured to elude the request of the legionaries ; when one of those armed ambassadors, by name Cornelius, laying his hand on his sword, If you will not make him consul, said he, this shall. Having thus spoke, he left the senate with his companions, and they all returned to give their general an account of the bad success of their negotiation. The soldiers, provoked at this refusal, pressed Octavianus to lead them to Rome, saying, that he, as heir to Cæsar, had a right to dispose of the consulate as he pleased. The ambitious youth heard this with pleasure, and, taking advantage of the present disposition of the soldiery, marched immediately towards Rome with eight legions. He passed the Rubicon, as his father had done, when he began the first civil war, and, dividing his army into two bodies, he advanced with one by long marches towards the capital, in order to surprize his enemies, and ordered the other to follow him leisurely. The unexpected news of Octavianus's approach filled the city with dread and confusion. Several senators, among the rest the cowardly Cicero, abandoning the city, withdrew into the country. Those who remained, assembled in haste, and came to the following resolutions ; viz. that the money, which the senate had promised to the two legions, the fourth and that of Mars, should be immediately sent them ; that the same sum should be promised in the name of the republic to the other legions under the command of Octavianus, and that he, though absent, should be allowed to stand for the consulate. Deputies were immediately dispatched to acquaint him with these resolutions. They were scarce gone, when the conscript fathers, reflecting coolly on their behaviour, began to be ashamed of their pusillanimity in thus submitting to a boy, and giving way to the insolence of the soldiery. At the same time two legions, which had been in Africa, arrived at the gates of Rome. These the senate looked upon as a supply sent them by the gods, and taking courage, resolved, with them and a legion which Vibius Pansa had sent back to guard the city, to put themselves in a posture of defence. Two prætors, viz. Quintus Gallius Luperus and Marcus Cornutus, had governed the city, and supplied the room of consuls ever since the death of Hirtius and Pansa. The former favoured in his heart the party of Octavianus, and therefore continued inactive ; but the latter, who was a zealous republican and an avowed friend to Brutus and his followers, left nothing untried to encourage the conscript fathers, and inspire them with resolutions becoming the rank they held in the republic. He ordered all the citizens, who were fit to bear arms, to appear on the ramparts, placed guards in all the avenues to the city, and detached a good number of cohorts to garison the Janiculum, whither the public money had been conveyed. In the mean time, Octavianus drew near, a near, and posting himself on the Quirinal, then without the walls, he sent from thence emissaries into the city, assuring the people, that both their lives and estates were safe. Hereupon they flocked out in crouds to see their friends and relations, who served under Octavianus, carrying them refreshments, and freely conversing with them. Many of the senators themselves and of the chief nobility, mixed with the people, went out to pay their compliments to the young general, who, finding the people generally inclined to favour him, entered the city the next day amidst the loud acclamations of the multitude, being attended by a chosen body of legionaries. He was met by his mother and sisters, who had concealed themselves among the vestals, and accompanied by them and a numberless croud to his house, whither all the nobility flocked to make their court to him. Cicero, who had returned to the city upon the arrival of the two African legions, was one of the last who came to pay him his devoirs. Octavianus received him coldly, and when the orator congratulated him on his return to the city, You are the last of my enemies, answered Octavianus with an ill-natured sneer, who have honoured me with a visit. He well knew, that Cicero was intirely in the interest of Brutus and Cassius, and besides, he had been told by some of his emissaries, that the orator, in the speech which he made to the conscript fathers, when he demanded the consulship for him, had used a very odd and equivocal expression; Egregius iste juvenis, said he, laudandus, honorandus, & tollendus est, that is, The brave youth ought to be praised and honoured; but as to the last word, it signifies equally to be advanced, and to be cut off. The next day, the three legions that were in the city went out to join Octavianus, who thereupon ordered his troops to march into the city and incamp in the field of Mars. From thence he sent a detachment to seize on the Janiculum and the public money lodged there, out of which he immediately paid two thousand five hundred drachmas to each soldier under his command. The prætor Quintus Gallius summoned the people to meet in the campus Martius in order to proceed to the election of new consuls. But his colleague Marcus Cornutus, foreseeing the evil consequences that must inevitably attend the promotion of Octavianus, gave up the republic for lost, and, scorning to submit to the yoke of his fellow-citizen, laid violent hands on himself. A memorable instance of the old Roman spirit, which in the virtuous ages of Rome would have been celebrated with the highest encomiums, but is scarce taken notice of by the slavish writers, who flourished under Augustus and his successors. On the day appointed for the election, Octavianus withdrew from the city, that the comitia might have, at least, some appearance of liberty. When the people met, they unanimously declared Octavianus first consul, and appointed Quintus Pædus, one of his relations, and a legate of the dictator for his colleague. Upon the news of his election he returned to the city, where, as he was sacrificing according to custom, six, as some say twelve, vulturs are said to have been seen, the same number that appeared to the founder of Rome. Hence he concluded, that he should one day be invested with the same power and authority as Romulus. This year is reckoned by most of the antient historians and modern chronologers the first of the long reign of Octavianus, known afterwards by the name of Augustus. However, his authority was not yet either full or peaceable, but for some time divided with Antony and Lepidus, and warmly disputed by the republican party both in the east and west. Livy says, that Octavianus was but nineteen years old, when he was created consul^f: but Suetonius writes more freely, that he usurped the consulship in the twentieth year of his age^g. Plutarch tells us, out of Octavianus's own commentaries, that he was scarce twenty years old, when he was honoured with the consular dignity^h. He was declared consul, says Velleius Paterculus^w, the day before he was twenty years old, on the tenth of the calends of October. But Velleius was certainly mistaken, for there wanted a whole month and five days to the completing of the twentieth year of Octavianus's age; neither did he obtain the consulship in the month of September, in which he was born, but in that of Sextilis, which was thence called Augustus, as is manifest both from Suetonius^x and the decree of the senate, which is to be seen in Macrobius^y. Dion observes, that on the nineteenth of August he was made consul the first time, and that he died on the same day^z; and Tacitus tells us, that the superstitious multitude after Augustus's death admired the strange events of his fortune, That the last day of his life and the first of his reign were the same, &c.^a And thus far of the disturbances which

which happened in the west from the death of the dictator to the first consulate of Octavianus. We shall now briefly relate what passed in the east, during the same period of time; for there likewise a war was kindled, and those vast provinces involved in the same fate with Italy and Gaul.

What happened in the east, from the death of Cæsar to the consulate of Octavianus.

Brutus passes over into Greece.

How received at Athens.

To return therefore to Brutus and Cassius; these two chiefs of the republican party, having left Rome to escape the fury of the populace, whom Antony's artful speech and the sight of Cæsar's dead body had stirred up against them, retired first to Antium, with a design to return to the city, and there discharge the functions of their office, for they were both prætors, as soon as the rage of the unsettled multitude was abated. But Antony raising daily new disturbances, they wrote to their friends, that since it was not safe for them to resume the functions of their office in the city, they were determined to spend the rest of the year in Italy as private citizens; which the senate, who favoured them underhand, no sooner understood, than they committed to them the care of supplying the city with corn, which Brutus was appointed to send out of Asia, and Cassius out of Sicily^b. The design of the conscript fathers in charging them with such a commission was, to give them an opportunity of assembling fleets, and privately engaging the governors of those provinces in their cause, which all good citizens looked upon as that of the republic. But, in the mean time, Octavianus arriving from Apollonia at Rome, the city began to be divided into two factions, some siding with him, and others with Antony, and the legionaries, without any regard to their country, publicly selling themselves to the highest bidder. Hereupon Brutus and Cassius, despairing of being able to do their countrymen any service in Italy, resolved to pass over into Greece, and from thence into the eastern provinces, where they hoped to gain over the many legions that were dispersed about those countries. Accordingly, Brutus, crossing Lucania, came to Elea, a maritime city, in order to imbarque there and sail for Athens. From Elea he thought it adviseable to send back to Rome his beloved Porcia, who had accompanied him thither. That illustrious matron, though overwhelmed with grief at the thoughts of parting from so tender a husband, yet concealed her affliction with a constancy worthy of the greatest heroes, till it was accidentally betrayed, in spite of her many resolutions, by a picture which she happened to observe in the House where they lodged. It represented Hector, parting from Andromache to go and engage the Greeks, and giving his young son Ashtanax into her arms, while she fixed her eyes upon him with an earnest and affectionate look. The resemblance this piece bore to her own case, and the remembrance of the misfortunes which befel Hector, made her burst out into tears. She often went to the place where the picture hung, gazing at it, and weeping before it (S), when she reflected on the dangers to which her husband, like a second Hector, was going to expose himself. Brutus was extremely troubled, and not without reason; yet he did not suffer himself to be so carried away by his private grief, as to neglect the public concerns. After having tenderly embraced his dear Porcia and recommended her to the protection of the gods, he went on board a small vessel, and set sail for Athens, while she, bathed in tears, took her rout towards Rome. At Athens Brutus was received with loud acclamations and all possible demonstrations of kindness and esteem. The Athenians still retained those noble sentiments of honour, virtue, and liberty, for which their forefathers had been so renowned; and therefore could not help admiring a man, who had so generously sacrificed his private interest to the public welfare. They compared him and his faithful companion Cassius, who joined him a few days after his arrival at Athens, to Harmodius and Aristogiton, two brave Athenians,

(S) Plutarch tells us, that on this occasion Acilius, one of Brutus's friends, repeated out of Homer the following verses, spoken by Andromache:

Yet, while my Hector still survives, I see
My father, mother, brethren, all in thee. Pope.

To which Brutus replied with a smile; But I must not answer Porcia as Hector did Andromache:

For though the natural weakness of her body hinders her from acting what only the strength of man can perform, yet she has a mind as valiant and as active for the good of her country as the best of us. This Plutarch borrowed, as he tells us, from the memoirs of Brutus, written by Bibulus the son of Porcia (53). For Porcia, when Brutus married her, was the widow of M. Calpurnius Bibulus, by whom she had a son named also Bibulus.

^a Athenians, who, by the death of the tyrant Hipparchus, had delivered their country from slavery. Their ancestors, to perpetuate the memory of so glorious an action, had, near five hundred years before the times we are now writing of, by a public decree, erected statues to those two deliverers of their country: and the present Athenians, thinking the enterprize of Brutus and Cassius equally glorious; in imitation of their ancestors, by a public decree ordered statues to be erected to them over-against those of Harmodius and Aristogiton. How different were the sentiments of the Athenians from those of the greater part of our modern writers! Notwithstanding these public demonstrations of honour and esteem, Brutus seemed to have laid aside all thoughts of public business, that he might be wholly at leisure for the study of philosophy. He lived privately with one who had been formerly his guest, and constantly attended the lectures of Theomnestus the Academic and Cratippus the Peripatetic, as if he intended to pass the remainder of his life in quiet and retirement. But all the while; being unsuspected, he was secretly making preparations for war; in order to which he made it his chief business to gain the affections of the young Roman noblemen, who were attending their studies at Athens. Among these was Marcus Tullius, Cicero's son, of whom he used to say, That, whether sleeping or waking, he could not help admiring a young man of so great spirit, and such an enemy to tyrants. As Brutus, during his stay at Athens, began to want money, young Marcus generously supplied him with as much as he could spare; for in one of his letters to Tiro, wherein he speaks of those who boarded with him, I have hired, says he, a place hard by me for Brutus, and, as much as my poverty allows me, relieve his want. I intended to declaim in Greek before Cassius, but before Brutus I will perform my exercise in Latin, &c. ^c Cassius by this time, it seems, had left Greece to go into Syria, whither we shall soon follow him. As for Brutus, he continued some time longer in Athens, whence he sent one Herostrates, whom he had gained over to his interest, into Macedon, to sound the Roman troops quartered in that province. Herostrates discharged his trust with no less fidelity than address; for he either found the Macedonian troops ready to side with Brutus, or dexterously prevailed upon them to do so. Hereupon Brutus, pulling off the mask, began to act openly and raise troops in all the cities of Greece, whither many Romans had retired, being dissatisfied with the present situation of affairs at home. He wanted money; but his want was soon supplied by a very lucky accident. For being informed that the quaestor Vetus Antistius, his particular friend, who had been charged with the care of conveying to Rome the tributes of Asia, was in his course to touch at Carystus, a city of Eubœa; he went thither to meet him, and easily persuaded him to deliver up to him great part of the treasure (T). Brutus on his birthday make a splendid entertainment for the quaestor, at which, while the company were drinking merrily to the victory of Brutus and liberty of Rome, Brutus, calling for a larger bowl and holding it in his hand, pronounced aloud this verse, which was spoken to Hector by Patroclus at the point of his death:

Fate and Apollo against me conspire (U).

It was no sooner known, that Brutus was raising forces, than all the remains of Pompey's army, who, ever since the defeat of their general, had wandered about Thessaly, readily and joyfully joined him. With these he obliged Cinna, who was leading five hundred horse to Dolabella in Asia, to deliver up that body to him.

^c Cic. 1. xvi. ad famil. epist. 21.

(T) Plutarch tells us, that Antistius, out of the money he was carrying to Italy, gave Brutus πεντήκοντα μυριάδας, five hundred myriads, which the Latin interpreter rendered twenty thousand sesterces: and this sum Brutus himself acknowledges in an epistle, wherein he commends him to Cicero, as Antistius was going to Rome to stand for the prætorship (54). Pomponius Atticus likewise sent him a present of C M. sesterces, when he left Italy, and ordered three hundred more to be remitted to him in Epirus (55).

(U) Plutarch pretends, that Brutus quoted this verse on a sudden without any premeditation, or any preceding circumstance to prompt him to it. But this is highly improbable, as madam Dacier well observes. According to her, Brutus spoke this verse in the person of Cæsar, signifying thereby, that in putting Cæsar to death, he had only lent a helping hand to fate and Apollo, and that his death was purely owing to the gods and his destiny. Some historians, quoted by Plutarch, tell us, that the word Brutus gave his men at the battle of Philippi was Apollo; whence they conclude, that the line quoted on this occasion was a presage of that overthrow (56).

Young Cicero gained over to him an intire legion, which Piso designed to convey^a over to Mark Antony in Italy. And now Brutus's army being greatly increased, the prudent leader imbarqued with a strong detachment for Demetrias, a town of Thessaly, which we have often mentioned in the history of Greece, and there seized a prodigious quantity of arms, which had been formerly amassed in that city by Cæsar for his Parthian expedition, and were now designed for Antony. Macedon was then governed by Hortensius, the son of the famous orator, who was Cicero's rival in eloquence. As he was a sincere friend to his country, he declared, without the least hesitation, for Brutus; and before the arrival of Caius Antonius, who was appointed to succeed him and already on his march, he resigned to that chief of the republican party both his province and his troops; nay, he raised new forces for him in all the countries under his jurisdiction, and appeared as sanguine in the great cause of liberty as Brutus himself. And now, Brutus being at the head of a powerful army and master of Greece and Macedon, all the petty kings and princes round about flocked to join him, and offer him their service. Among the rest a queen of Thrace, by name Polemocratia, whose husband had been lately murdered by his rebellious subjects, had recourse to him, and, delivering up to him all her treasures, put herself and her son under his protection. Brutus received her with that humanity which was peculiar to him, and sent her to Cyzicum in Asia Minor, to live there far from danger, till a favourable opportunity offered of restoring her to her kingdom^d.

IN the mean time, news being brought, that Caius, the brother of Antony, having^c crossed the Adriatic, was advancing to join Gabinus, or, as others call him, Vatinius, who commanded three legions in Dyrrachium and Apollonia, Brutus resolved to be beforehand with him. Accordingly, he moved forwards in all haste with the few troops he had then with him. His march, though through rugged places and a deep snow, was so expeditious, that he left those who were to bring his provisions a great way behind. When he got near to Dyrrachium, he was seized with a distemper, which the Greeks call Bulimia, that is, a violent hunger (W). As he grew very faint for want of food, and none in the army could supply him with any, his attendants were forced to have recourse to the enemy, and, advancing to the very gates of the city, acquainted the centinels, who were there upon duty, with the sad state of Brutus, and begged them to relieve him. They were touched with compassion, and immediately flew to his relief with plenty of provisions. Brutus on this occasion won so much upon the affections of those legionaries by his obliging behaviour, that they all joined him to a man, Gabinus himself not excepted, whom Cicero commended on that score, laying aside the hatred he had formerly bore him. Caius Antonius, receiving intelligence of what had happened at Dyrrachium, advanced with all possible expedition to Apollonia, and summoned all the soldiers, who were quartered near that city, to join him there. But finding they went all over to Brutus, and suspecting that the garison of Apollonia were inclined to the same party, he abandoned that city, and hastened to Butrotus, now Butrinto, on the Ionian sea. Brutus pursued^e him close, and on his march cut in pieces three of the seven cohorts that attended him. Upon this success Brutus wrote to the senate, acquainting the conscript fathers with what he had done in Greece and Macedon. His letter was read in the senate by the consul Pansa, who was still in Rome, and his generous concern for the welfare of his country set forth by Cicero in his tenth Philippic; at whose motion a decree passed, appointing Brutus to govern Macedon, Illyricum, and all Greece, in quality of proconsul^f. By the same decree both he and Cassius were empowered to make use of the public money, and to raise what sums they pleased in the provinces subject to Rome. The kings and cities of the east, in alliance with the Roman people, were at the same time ordered to lend them all the assistance they could^f.

IN the mean time, young Cicero, whom Brutus had detached with his light-armed foot in pursuit of Caius Antonius, coming up with him near Byllis, or Bullis, a city of Illyricum on the Adriatic, attacked him, and give him a total overthrow. Caius fled with a with his troops to a neighbouring marsh, where he was surrounded by Brutus, without any possible means of making his escape. Brutus might with great ease have cut him off with all his troops; but he would not suffer his men to fall upon them, saying, that in a little time they would be all of his side; which accordingly happened, for they went all to a man over to Brutus, and even delivered up to him their general; so that Brutus had now eight legions under his command, a numerous body of horse, and a great many archers and slingers, with several companies of Macedonians, whom he daily exercised after the Roman manner^g. As for Caius Antonius, Brutus treated him with the utmost civility, and even suffered him to enjoy the title of proconsul, and all the badges of that dignity, though several senators, and particularly Cicero, solicited him by letters to rid the republic of so dangerous an enemy. But finding at length that he abused his good-nature, and made use of the liberty, which, through an excess of kindness, was allowed him, to corrupt the officers and raise seditions among the soldiers, he confined him on board a ship, and there kept him close prisoner. Several soldiers, whom he had privately seduced, abandoning Brutus, retired to Apollonia, whence, repenting of the step they had taken, they sent him word, that if he would come thither, they would return to their duty. Brutus answered, that this was not customary among the Romans, but that it became those, who had offended; to come to their general and beg forgiveness of their crimes; which they did, and were received with great kindness by their humane and good-natured general^h.

c ABOUT this time Brutus received a letter from the famous Titus Pomponius Atticus, in which was inclosed, it seems, the copy of one written by Cicero to Octavianus after the battle of Mutina; wherein he first congratulated him on his late victory, and then told him, that it was desired and expected of him, that he would suffer those citizens to lead a quiet and peaceable life, whom all good men and the people of Rome loved and esteemed, meaning Brutus and his followers. As this was tacitly acknowledging an authority in Octavianus above the laws, Brutus highly resented it, and expressed his resentment in the letters he wrote to Atticus and Cicero himself. I had rather not live, says he, writing to Cicero, *than owe my life to him. I do not believe, that the Roman people have provoked the wrath of all the gods to such a degree, that Octavianus must be intreated for the safety of one private citizen, much less for that of the deliverers of the world*ⁱ. Cicero had, it seems, on what occasion we know not, reproached Cæsar with the murder of Cæsar, and was employing all his interest in favour of Octavianus. This drew several letters in very sharp terms from Brutus, which are still extant among Cicero's epistles, and will be lasting monuments of the honour, virtue, and truly noble spirit of that brave patriot, in spite of the many ill-natured reflections with which the flatterers of Augustus, and, since his time, the abettors of absolute power have endeavoured to blacken his character.

Brutus's letters to Cicero.

e Brutus, being now at the head of a powerful army, and master of all Greece, Illyricum, Macedon and Thrace, resolved to pass into Asia and there join Cassius, whose progress in those eastern provinces, from the time he parted with Brutus in Athens to the consulate of Octavianus, we are now to relate. We have observed above, that P. Cornelius Dolabella, by the interest of Marc Antony, obtained of the people, in spite of the senate, the government of Syria. This Cassius no sooner understood, than he left Athens, and sailed first into Asia, which province was then governed by Trebonius, one of the conspirators, in quality of proconsul. It had been allotted to him a few days after Cæsar's death, and he, upon the arrival of Octavianus at Rome, had quitted the city and retired to his government, as is manifest from several of Cicero's epistles^k. Cassius was well received by Trebonius, and also by P. Lentulus, who had been sent with him in quality of proquæstor extraordinary, his ordinary quæstor being L. Patiscus. This we gather from Cicero's epistles^l, which some writers seem not to have consulted, or to have misunderstood. These supplied Cassius with money; and he was soon after joined by a body of horse, which Dolabella had sent into Asia, with orders to pursue their march into Syria, and there wait for him. Lentulus, in one of his letters to Cicero, ascribes to himself the glory of having brought over these troops to Cassius's party^m. It was no sooner known in Asia and Cilicia, that Cassius was raising forces, than the Romans, who were dispersed about those provinces, flocked to him from all quarters; so that seeing himself at the head of a considerable army, he

he left Asia, we mean Asia properly so called, and marched into Syria, with a design^a to seize on that province, before the arrival of Dolabella. He was scarce gone when Dolabella landed on the Asiatic coast, laid waste the country, made himself master of Tarsus, where Cassius had left a garison, and murdered in a most cruel and treacherous manner the proconsul Trebonius, as we have related above. Cassius, on his arrival in Syria, found Statius Murcus, and Marcius Crispus carrying on the siege of Apamea against Q. Cæcilius Bassus, as we have related above. These two leaders immediately joined him with all their forces, and Bassus's soldiers forced him to do the same; whereupon the city being delivered up to Cassius, an end was put to the siege, and the army of that general, by this new addition, increased to the number of eight legions. From this time he took upon him the title of proconsul, as appears from his letters^b to *Cicero*ⁿ; though Cicero, in his letters to him, does not acknowledge that title, as not yet granted him by the senate^o. Both Murcus and Crispus heartily embraced Cassius's party; the former was by him appointed governor of Syria, and also admiral of his fleet; but Bassus, not caring to engage in this war, was permitted quietly to retire^p. Cassius, being thus strengthened, soon made himself master of all Syria, which he did the more easily on account of the great reputation he had formerly acquired in that province, by defending it against the Parthians after the overthrow of Cassius at Carrhæ, as we have related at length in the history of the Parthians^q. From Syria he passed into Phœnice and Judæa, and secured to himself those countries^r. While he lay there, he was informed, that Allienus, one of Dolabella's lieutenants, was marching through Palestine with four legions, which Cæsar had left in Egypt after the Alexandrian war. Upon this advice he went to meet them, and coming upon them unawares, obliged both Allienus and his legions to side with him, which, with those he had before, made up the number of twelve legions. Of these forces he gave a particular account to Cicero, in a letter dated the nones of March from his camp at Tarichæa in Galilee^s. For the maintaining of so numerous a body of men, he was forced to lay the country under heavy contributions; and Judæa being taxed at seven hundred talents, Antipater took speedy care for the answering of this sum, committing it to the charge of his two sons, Phasael and Herod, and to Malichus and some others, ordering them to raise the sum forthwith, and assigning to each of them their proper districts for this purpose. Herod, having brought in his quota the first, gained by that means the favour of Cassius. But Gophna, Emmaus, Lydda, Thamna, and some other cities of Judæa, being backward in raising their quotas, Cassius caused the inhabitants to be sold for slaves to the best bidder, for the more speedy payment of the sum required. He was provoked to such a degree against Malichus, who was very dilatory in this matter, that he would have put him to death, had not Hyrchanus appeased him with a present of a hundred talents, which he sent him by Antipater^t. In the mean time, Dolabella, after a long stay in Asia, where he burdened the cities with new taxes and oppressed the inhabitants in a most cruel and tyrannical manner^u, passed first into Cilicia, and thence into Syria, with two legions, whither his fleet, composed of vessels hired of the Lycians, Pamphylians, and Cilicians, sailed soon after under the command of L. Figulus^w. Upon his arrival in Syria, he attempted to enter Antioch, as governor of that province; but being repulsed by the inhabitants and the garison, which Cassius had left there, with the loss of about a hundred of his men, he abandoned the enterprize, and retired in the night towards Laodicea. During his march, most of the troops he had raised in Asia abandoned him, some of them returning to Antioch, where they joined Cassius's men, and others retiring over mount Amanus into Cilicia^x. As the inhabitants of Laodicea were entirely devoted to Cæsar's party, they received Dolabella with open arms, and put him in possession of their city; which Cassius no sooner heard, than he hastened thither, leaving Herod governor of Cælo-Syria, with a strong detachment from his army to keep that province in awe^y. Upon his arrival, he found Dolabella incamped under the walls of the city, nay, as we learn from a letter of Cassius Parmensis, and not of Cassius Longinus, as we conjecture, to Cicero, he had beat down part of the walls, and joined

^a joined his camp to the town². As Laodicea was placed on a peninsula, Cassius, to prevent Dolabella from making his escape by land, carried on a wall two furlongs in length cross the isthmus, with materials brought from the neighbouring villages and sepulchers. At the same time he dispatched messengers to the Phœnicians, Lycians, and Rhodians for ships, with a design to block up the harbour. But the Sidonians alone complied with his summons, and sent him what vessels they had already equipped in their harbour. They were scarce arrived, when Dolabella's fleet under the command of L. Figulus appeared off Laodicea. Cassius, though his fleet was far inferior in number to the enemy's, yet would by all means venture an engagement, in which both parties fought with incredible bravery. But at length Cassius's fleet was over-^{Cassius's fleet} powered, and five of his ships taken with all the mariners on board. Hereupon Cassius ^{defeated} dispatched messengers anew to those who had slighted his first summons, and besides to Cleopatra queen of Egypt, and to Serapion, who commanded her forces in Cyprus. The Tyrians, Aradians, and also Serapion, without the knowledge of his mistress, obeyed the second summons, and sent what ships they could assemble. But Cleopatra herself, who had been greatly favoured by Cæsar, and consequently bore an irreconcilable hatred to all those who were concerned in his death, refused to lend them any assistance, under pretence, that Egypt was then afflicted with a plague and famine. The Rhodians and Lycians declared, that they designed to maintain a strict neutrality, though it was well known, that Dolabella's fleet consisted mostly of Lycian and Rhodian vessels. Of this Lentulus, who was præquæstor extraordinary of Asia, complained in his letters both to the senate and to Cicero; for Dolabella had been declared an enemy to the people of Rome, and the republic had lately renewed her alliance with the *Rhodians*³. However Statius Murcus, the admiral of Cassius's fleet, having got together a considerable number of ships of war in Phœnice and on the coasts of Asia, ventured two other engagements, in the first whereof they parted upon equal terms; but in the second Dolabella's fleet was entirely defeated. Then Murcus blocked up the port with his victorious fleet; so that no provisions could be conveyed into the besieged city either by sea or land, the wall, which Cassius had begun to cross the isthmus, being now completed. The place being thus reduced to the utmost extremity, Dolabella attempted several times to sally out at the head of the garison, but was constantly driven back into the city, which was at length, without his knowledge, delivered up to the enemy by one Quintius, a chief officer of his army. Dolabella, seeing the enemy in possession of the city, and fearing Cassius would retaliate upon him his cruel treatment of the unfortunate Trebonius, ordered one of his guards to cut off his head; which he did accordingly, and then killed himself with the same sword. The example of Dolabella was followed by M. Octavius his lieutenant, and Q. Marfus, another of his chief officers. Cassius ordered their bodies to be decently interred, though they had refused that honour to the poor remains of Trebonius, which they threw into the sea, after having insulted them in the grossest manner. But Cassius, at the sight of Dolabella's head, seemed to have forgot the vengeance he owed to the manes of his friend. As for the soldiers, who served under the deceased general, though they had been declared enemies to the republic as well as himself, Cassius generously forgave them, and, having obliged them to take the military oath to him, incorporated them among his legionaries^b. Appian tells us, that Cassius plundered both the temples and treasury of Laodicea, that he laid heavy taxes on the inhabitants, and put all the nobility to the sword; so that the city was reduced to a most miserable condition^c. What Appian says has not been a little exaggerated by the authors of the Roman history now publishing at Paris: for they tell us, that the streets in an instant were covered with dead bodies; that the blood ran in streams; that neither temples nor palaces were spared; that those, whom the conqueror thought fit to pardon, were forced to pay such exorbitant sums that death seemed less painful to them than life^d. These reverend writers, men indeed of great learning, but avowed champions of arbitrary power, omit no opportunity of throwing what dirt they can upon those who stood up in defence of their liberties. They constantly follow those authors, whose accounts are the least favourable to them, without taking notice of what others, less partial and biassed, have wrote on the same subject. AND now Cassius, after the reduction of Laodicea, become master of all Syria, acquainted the conscript fathers with the success of his arms; who thereupon confirmed to him the government of those vast provinces, as they did to Brutus that of Greece, Macedon, and Illyricum, ordering all the states and cities, in alliance with or subject to Rome, to obey their orders and assist them to the utmost of their power^f. Thus Brutus and Cassius, who had fled from Rome, as Plutarch observes^g, like despicable exiles, without money or arms, without ships, soldiers, or one single city to rely on, were now masters of large provinces, had above twenty legions under their command, and were in a condition to keep in awe and withstand the united forces of Octavianus, Antony, and Lepidus. Thus was the Roman state, taken in its utmost extent, divided between two opposite parties, the Cæsareans, that is, those who were for introducing absolute government and arbitrary power; and the republicans, that is, zealous defenders of their liberties and the ancient customs and laws of the republic. The latter prevailed in the east; and the former in the west: where they were obeyed by all the nations between the ocean and the straits of Messana, or the most southern borders of Italy. As for Sicily, it was held at this time by Sextus Pompeius, the younger son of Pompey the Great, of whom we shall have frequent occasion to speak in the sequel of this history. Such was the situation of affairs at the beginning of Octavianus's first consulate. What happened in Italy and the several provinces subject to the distracted and expiring republic, from his consulate to the death of Brutus and Cassius, shall be the subject of the following chapter.

CHAP. XV.

The history of Rome, from the first consulate of Octavianus to the death of Cassius and Brutus.

Octavianus
causes Brutus and Cassius to

THE first step Octavianus took, after he had entered upon his consulate, was, to get his adoption confirmed in a general assembly of the people. In the next place, he prevailed upon the senate to revoke their decree, declaring Dolabella, whose death was not yet known at Rome, an enemy to his country^h. Soon after his colleague Q. Pædus, at his instigation, proposed a law for impeaching, trying, and condemning all those who had been any ways concerned in the death of Cæsar. Pursuant to this law which passed without opposition, L. Cornificius took upon him to accuse Brutus, and the famous M. Vispanius Agrippa (X) appeared against Cassius. The conspirators

(X) Marcus Vispanius Agrippa was, according to Suetonius (37), of a mean descent, but of an equestrian family according to Cornelius Nepos (38). The former writer tells us, that the emperor Caligula, ashamed to acknowledge Agrippa for his grandfather, gave out, that his mother Agrippina was not the daughter of Agrippa, but the fruit of an incestuous commerce, between Julia the wife of Agrippa and her father Augustus; chusing out of a foolish and shameful vanity, to owe his birth rather to an incest, than a lawful marriage (39). Agrippa was brought up from his infancy with Octavianus, and served him to the last

a spirators were all summoned to take their trials; and we are told, that when the herald pronounced the name of Brutus, both the people and senate expressed their concern for so worthy a citizen with sighs and tears. Among the many judges, who were chosen for the decision of so important a cause, Silicius Coronas was the only person who had courage enough to declare in their favour, which cost him his life; for though Octavianus thought it then adviseable to dissemble his resentment, and pretended even to be reconciled to Silicius, yet he soon after sacrificed him to his revenge. Notwithstanding the opposition of that generous citizen, the conspirators were all condemned, without being heard, to perpetual banishment, and their estates confiscated. But as Brutus and Cassius were at the head of twenty legions, Octavianus rightly judged, that it would not be easy for him to destroy them, without the assistance of Antony and Lepidus. He therefore dispatched trusty messengers to these two chiefs, desiring them to march with all possible expedition into Italy, that they might, with their united forces, fall upon Brutus and Cassius, and drive them out of the provinces which they had seized. Hereupon they both set out without delay, and passing the Alps, at the head of seventeen legions, entered Cisalpine Gaul. The senate, alarmed at their approach, and still strangers to the private managements between them and Octavianus, ordered the latter to march out against them, and make war upon them as public enemies. Octavianus with great joy embraced this opportunity of putting the last hand to the treaty, which had been begun some time since between him and his rival. But, before he left Rome, he gave private instructions to Quintus Pædus his colleague and creature, to insinuate, as of his own motion, to the senate, that it was for the advantage of the commonwealth to repeal their decree against Antony and Lepidus, and not drive such men to despair, especially Antony, who was as great a commander, and no less to be dreaded than Sylla and Marius. This proposal was no-ways agreeable to the senate; but nevertheless, as they suspected Octavianus to be at the bottom of the whole, they wrote to him for his advice in so nice a point. The crafty general readily consented to the repealing of the decree, as we may well imagine; but, to deceive the senate, told them in his letter, that his consent had been in a manner extorted by the earnest intreaties of his soldiers. However, the conscript fathers began now plainly to see, that Octavianus's design was to gain over Antony to his party, and to act in concert with him against the defenders of the public liberty. But they were no longer in a condition to withstand him, and therefore solemnly disannulled all the decrees against Antony and his adherents. In acknowledgment of this good turn, Antony marched immediately against Decimus Brutus, who was incamped in the neighbourhood of Mutina with ten legions, four whereof consisted of veterans, but who were in a very bad condition on account of the distempers and fatigues they had suffered during the late siege; the six others were newly raised, and quite unacquainted with military discipline. So that Brutus, not finding himself in a condition to oppose the united and superior forces of Antony and Lepidus, resolved to quit Cisalpine Gaul, and by the way of Aquileia pass into Illyricum, and from thence into Macedon, where M. Brutus commanded. But, finding all the passes seized on that side by Octavianus's troops, he took his rout towards the Alps with a design to pass the Rhine, where that river divides Transalpine Gaul from Germany, and through the latter country pursue his march into Macedon. But the apprehension of the fatigues and dangers of so long a journey had such an effect on the minds of the new-raised troops, that they all abandoned Brutus and went over to Antony. Their example was soon followed by the other four legions; so that Brutus's army was soon reduced to a few squadrons of Gaulish horse; and to such of these also, as betrayed any unwillingness to follow him, Brutus not only gave leave to return home, but generously supplied them with money to defray the charges of their journey. Thus guarded only by three hundred horse, he marched as far as the Rhine, the sight of which rapid river so frightened the few Gauls he had with him, that they stole away one after another, except last with the utmost fidelity. We shall have occasion to make frequent mention of him in the sequel of this history. Velleius Paterculus, a scandalous flatterer of the Cæsars, tells us, that his uncle Capito joined Agrippa in accusing Brutus (40).

except ten, who seemed determined never to forsake him. In this extremity he laid aside all thoughts of entering Germany, and dressing himself after the Gaulish manner, as he spoke the language like a native, he resolved in that disguise to return through Gaul into Italy, not without hopes of reaching at length Macedon undiscovered. But he had not gone far, before he had the misfortune to be taken by a band of freebooters, who conducted him, at his request, to the lord of that district, by name Camillus, or, as others call him, Camelius, who had received a thousand favours at his hands in the dictator's life-time. But the ungrateful wretch, after having received him in a friendly manner, dispatched a messenger to Antony, acquainting him, that he had Brutus in his power, and was ready to dispose of him as he pleased. Antony was touched with compassion at the misfortunes of a man so considerable for his birth and the great offices he had borne. But nevertheless, as it was for the interest of his party that he should be cut off, he wrote word to Camillus to dispatch him and send him his head; which the treacherous Gaul did accordingly, without any regard to the sacred laws of hospitality. Dion Cassius, Valerius Maximus, and Seneca tell us, that Brutus behaved on this occasion in a manner very unbecoming a man of his rank and station, and that he earnestly begged for his life, even after Helvius Blasia, his intimate friend and inseparable companion, had killed himself in his presence, to animate him by his example^k. Cicero on the contrary, who was intimately acquainted with him, speaks of him as a man, who was never afraid, or even disturbed^l; and the authority of Cicero is more to be relied on, than that of all the historians, who wrote long after, put together. However, the learned fathers Catrou and Rouille, in their Roman history, take no notice of this passage; which would have left no room for their long descants on the cowardice of that perfidious wretch, that cruel traitor, that inhuman assassin, as they are pleased to stile Brutus for conspiring against so fine a man as Cæsar, guilty of no fault but that of tyranny and usurpation. When his head was brought to Antony, he looked on it with some concern, and then delivered it to his friends, by whom it was decently buried^m. Thus died Decimus Junius Brutus, a year and a half after the death of Cæsar. He had been always honoured by the dictator with particular marks of friendship and confidence, as appears both from his will, and from the great employments to which he raised him. For he was appointed one of his second heirs, in case any of his great nephews should renounce the inheritance; and had been general of his horse; governor first of Transalpine, and afterwards of Cisalpine, Gaul, and named consul, according to Velleius Paterculus, for the year after the consulate of Hirtius and *Pansa*ⁿ. And indeed Decimus served him with the utmost fidelity, till he began openly to aspire at the sovereign power; and then, considering him no longer as a friend, but as a tyrant, he preferred the public welfare to his private interest, which the abettors of arbitrary power look upon as an enormous crime. Antony immediately acquainted Octavianus, that he had sacrificed Decimus to the manes of his father, and than advanced with Lepidus at the head of his army to meet him. The place they chose for their private conferences was a small island formed by the river Rhenus, now the Reno, which falls into the Po, after having watered the territory of Bononia or Bologna (Y). Both armies advanced to the opposite banks of this river, from whence by two bridges a communication was opened with the island. Lepidus entered the first into the island, to view whether it was safe for the other two to venture into it. Such was the unfortunate condition of those ambitious men, who, even in the midst of a reconciliation, could not help mistrusting each other. Lepidus having made the signal that was agreed on, the two generals entered the island from the opposite banks, each of them guarded by three hundred men, who remained at the head of the bridges, while the two chiefs advanced to the place of the interview, which was a rising ground, whence they could be equally seen by their guards and both armies. After they had saluted and embraced each other in a polite and friendly manner, they took their seats, the other two yielding to Octavianus, as consul, the most honourable place. The conference lasted three days, during which time they had the precaution to speak constantly so low, notwithstanding some warm debates, that not a single word could be heard even by their guards, who stood but at a small distance: At length they agreed on the following articles: The articles of their agreement.

1. That Octavianus should forthwith resign the consulate, which gave him a kind of pre-eminence over the other two, to Ventidius one of Antony's lieutenants.
2. That the supreme authority should be divided among them three, and kept by them for the space of five years, under the name of triumvirs, and in quality of reformers of the commonwealth.
3. That they should cause this authority to be confirmed by the Roman people.
4. That Antony should have all Transalpine and Cisalpine Gaul, except Narbonne, which together with both Spains should be yielded to Lepidus; and that Octavianus should have for his share Africa, with Sicily and Sardinia.
5. That Italy and the eastern provinces, which were possessed by Brutus and Cassius, should for a while remain in common.
6. That Antony and Octavianus should forthwith join their forces and make war upon Brutus and Cassius, while Lepidus with four legions staid at Rome, to maintain the authority of the triumvirate there.

Thus was the empire of the world divided, as Plutarch observes, among these three chiefs, as if it had been their paternal inheritance. Besides these, several other articles were settled. As it was of the utmost importance, especially for Octavianus and Antony, who were to march into the east against Brutus and Cassius, to secure the fidelity of the legions, it was agreed, that each legionary should receive after the war five thousand drachmas, each centurion twenty-five thousand, and each tribune fifty thousand. To these immense and almost incredible sums, were added other rewards, yet more substantial. The triumvirs agreed to promise their soldiers settlements, on their return from the east, in eighteen of the best cities of Italy, which should be chosen out by the three chiefs, and abandoned in property with their houses and lands to the soldiers. As for the antient proprietors, they were by a crying injustice to be driven out of their old habitations, stripped of their lands and effects, and suffered either to perish with famine, or shift for themselves in the best manner they could. Some of these unhappy cities were even then named, viz. Capua, Rhegium, Beneventum, Luceria, Ariminum, and Vibo. As the triumvirs had occasion for immense sums to carry on the war, and besides were well apprised, that there were still in Rome great numbers of zealous republicans, who probably would raise disturbances in Italy, during their abode in the east, they came to that barbarous and inhuman resolution, which will render their memories execrable and infamous to the latest posterity; a resolution, The proscription. which brings disgrace upon tyranny itself. They agreed not only to cut off all their enemies, but those also who were either possessed of great estates, or were thought to retain the least spark of zeal for their antient laws and liberties. This they looked upon as the surest means of maintaining themselves in the peaceable possession of their usurped tyranny, and at the same time of raising the necessary sums for the support of their troops. These regulations were made without the least contest or dispute; but the list of the proscribed, when it came to be settled, occasioned warm debates, each of them intending to destroy his enemies and save his friends. Antony would come to no agreement till Cicero's name was set down in the fatal list. Octavianus endeavoured to save him, and was for having Antony to sacrifice Lucius Cæsar, his uncle by the mother's side. As for Lepidus, some writers tell us, that contrary to the inclination of the other two, he insisted upon the condemnation of his own brother L. Æmilius Paulus, who had voted the first in the senate for passing the decree, which declared him a public enemy when he joined Antony. Other authors say, that he would fain have saved his brother, but that Octavianus and Antony demanded his head. However that be, the thirst of being revenged on their enemies at length got the better of the desire of saving their friends and relations. Octavianus in the end sacrificed Cicero to Antony; Antony his uncle Lucius to Octavianus; and Lepidus was either allowed to murder his brother Paulus, or forced to abandon him to the resentment of the other two. The death of these three being agreed on, the list of the others, whom the triumvirs doomed to die, was soon drawn up, each of the three tyrants setting down the names of his particular enemies, and even of the enemies of his creatures. The first in this list was Paulus, the brother of Lepidus; Lucius Cæsar, Antony's uncle, was the second; and Cicero the third. After these were named Plotius, consul elect, and brother to Plancus one of Antony's lieutenants; Quintus, who was also designed consul for the ensuing year, and whose daughter Asinius Pollio, a great stickler for the triumvirate,

virate, had lately married; Thoranius, who had been governor to Octavianus, and had taken particular care of his education, and many others, whom we shall have occasion to mention in the sequel of the history. And now the articles of this wicked confederacy being agreed on, and sworn to by the contracting parties, the three chiefs separated, after embracing each other, and went to impart the result of their conferences to their respective armies, who, overjoyed at the advantageous promises that were made them, heard the report with the greatest satisfaction. The same day the two armies joined, and mutually feasted and entertained each other (A). Thus was concluded the second triumvirate about a year and a half after Cæsar's death, the consequences whereof were most dreadful, and gave the last blow to the liberty of Rome °.

AND now the triumvirs, seeing their agreement, and each of the articles on which it was concluded, approved by the soldiery of both armies, resolved in the first place to publish the decree of proscription, and hasten the execution of it, before their enemies could have any notice of their wicked designs. Accordingly, the fatal decree was drawn up and made public. It began thus: M. Lepidus, M. Antonius, and Octavianus Cæsar, chosen for the reformation of the commonwealth. If the generosity of Julius Cæsar had not prompted him to pardon some faithless men, and to grant them besides their lives, of which they were unworthy, honours and offices, which they deserved as little, he had not fallen by their treason, nor should we have been obliged to proceed in a manner disagreeable to us, against those who have declared us enemies to our country. But the wicked designs they formed against us, the horrible treachery they shewed towards Cæsar, and the certain knowledge we have of their execrable practices, force us to prevent the evils with which we are threatened. Then followed a justification of the proceedings of the triumvirs, founded on the advantages which Cæsar had procured for the Roman people by his victories, on the ingratitude of those who had murdered him, and on the necessity of clearing the city of such as might involve it in new troubles. They concluded thus: No man shall dare to receive, conceal, help to escape, any ways relieve those who are proscribed, or hold any manner of intelligence with them, upon pain of being himself proscribed. Whosoever shall bring to any of the triumvirs the head of a proscribed person shall receive, if a freeman, twenty-five thousand sesterces, and ten thousand, if a slave. The slave who shall kill his master, shall moreover be declared a Roman citizen. The same rewards shall be given to such as shall declare the place, where any proscribed person lies concealed, and the name of the informer shall not be entered into any register, to the end it may never be known who he was. This decree, together with the first list of the unhappy wretches who were doomed to die, was immediately sent to Rome, and at the same time some companies of soldiers dispatched thither, to put the cruel orders of the triumvirs in execution. The soldiers arrived in the evening before the decree, and meeting four of the proscribed persons in the streets, immediately put them to death: others were inhumanly massacred in their houses; some while they were supping with their friends, and some in the temples, whither, upon the first alarm, they had fled for refuge. The city was in an instant filled with horror and confusion. Nothing was heard but cries and lamentations. As the list of the proscribed persons was not yet made public, every one fancied himself in that number; and hence a general terror and consternation. Some in the height of their despair resolved to involve the whole city in their destruction, and accordingly set fire to it in different quarters. The darkness of the night, the fire which began to flame out in several places, the cries and groans of those who were inhumanly butchered in the streets, the running up and down of the armed soldiers, the flight of the people, the shrieks of the women, &c. filled every breast with dread and horror. Q. Pædius, the only consul then in Rome, to remove the fears of the alarmed multitude and prevent disorders, ran from street to street, causing it to be every-where published, that the number of those, who were

were doomed to die, was but very small, and that, as soon as it was day, he would cause their names to be fixed up in the forum. Accordingly, early next morning, the list of the proscribed, containing the names only of seventeen persons, was set up in a public place, together with the decree of the triumvirs. This restored tranquillity to the city for a while; but the consul Pædius, having over-heated himself with running up and down the city, to calm the minds of the people and prevent disorders, died the night following^p.

DURING these alarms, the triumvirs advanced, at the head of their united forces, towards Rome, which they entered on three different days, Octavianus on the first, Antony on the second, and Lepidus on the third, each of them being attended with his prætorian cohort and one legion. The first step they took after their arrival was, to get a law passed, investing them with the authority which they had usurped. It was accordingly proposed by the tribune P. Titius to the assembled tribes, who passed it the same day in the following terms: The Roman people lawfully assembled have thought fit to appoint three persons to govern the commonwealth with consular power. These are M. Antonius, M. Lepidus, and Cæsar Octavianus; whose authority shall be acknowledged and obeyed by all for the space of five years. The decree was no sooner passed, than Octavianus, pursuant to one of the articles of the confederacy, resigned his consulship, some say to C. Carrinas, others to Ventidius (B). However that be, these two were by the triumvirs appointed consuls for the remaining part of the present year; but they made no figure, the whole power and authority of the republic being lodged in the triumvirs. These three tyrants, looking upon themselves now as lawful magistrates, added the night following the names of a hundred and thirty persons to those they had already proscribed; a few days after they proscribed a hundred and fifty more, and thus they daily increased the number, till it amounted at last to three hundred senators, and above two thousand knights. It is impossible to paint the horrors of this bloody proscription; by it every considerable man in Rome, who was disliked, or suspected by the triumvirate to disapprove their tyranny, who was rich and had wherewithal to glut their avarice, was doomed to die. As it was death to conceal or help them, and ample rewards were given too such as discovered and killed them, many were betrayed and butchered by their slaves and freedmen; many by their treacherous hosts and relations. Many fled to the wilderness, where they perished for want with their tender children. Nothing was to be seen but blood and slaughter; the streets were covered with dead bodies; the heads of the most illustrious senators were exposed upon the rostra, and their bodies left unburied in the streets and fields, to be devoured by the dogs and ravenous birds. This looked like dooming Rome to perish at once. Many uncondemned persons perished in this confusion, some by malice or mistake, others for concealing or defending their friends. Some of the ancient historians seem to take pleasure in describing the horrors of this bloody and cruel proscription, which reduced the populous capital of the world almost to a wilderness. They produce many remarkable and affecting instances of the affection of wives for their husbands, and of the fidelity of slaves towards their masters; but few, very few, as they own with great concern, of the love of children towards their parents. However, the dutiful behaviour of Oppius may stand for many, who, like Æneas, carried his old and decrepit father on his shoulders to the sea-side, and escaped with him into Sicily. His piety was not long unrewarded; for, on his return to Rome, after the triumvirs had put an end to the proscription, he found the people so taken with that generous action, that all the tribes unanimously concurred in raising him to the ædileship; and because he wanted money to exhibit the usual sports, the artificers worked without wages, and the people not only taxed themselves to defray the necessary charges attending such shews, but gave proofs of the esteem they had for so dutiful

(B) We have given elsewhere a particular account of the rise, exploits, and character of Ventidius (43); and therefore shall only add here, that as he had been formerly a muletier, and had got his livelihood by providing mules to carry the baggage of such Roman magistrates as were sent to govern foreign provinces, when he was raised to the consulate, the

tiful a son by such contributions, as amounted to twice the value of his paternal estate, which had been confiscated by the triumvirs. Caius Hosidius Geta was likewise saved by his son, who spread a report, that his father had laid violent hands on himself, and, to render the fact more credible, spent the poor remains of his fortune in performing his obsequies. By this means Hosidius, not being searched after, made his escape, but lost one of his eyes, which he had kept too long covered with a plaister, the better to disguise him. As for the barbarous impiety of those children, who by a strange apostasy from nature betrayed their own parents, it ought to be buried with them in eternal oblivion. Nothing can reflect greater infamy on the memory of the triumvirs, than their countenancing such impious monsters. Several slaves chose rather to die on the rack, amidst the most exquisite torments; than discover the place where their masters lay concealed; others, not caring to outlive them, fell by their own hands upon their dead bodies. Many illustrious matrons gave remarkable proofs of their conjugal love in these times of calamity, which ought not to be passed over in silence. The wife of Q. Ligarius, seeing her husband betrayed by one of his slaves, declared to the executioners who cut off his head, that she had concealed him, and consequently ought, in virtue of the decree, to undergo the same fate. But they not hearkening to her, she appeared before the triumvirs themselves, upbraided them with their cruelty, owned she had concealed, in spite of their decree, her husband, and begged death of them as a favour. Being driven away by their officers, she shut herself up in her own house, and there, as she was determined not to outlive her husband, starved herself to death. Acilius was betrayed by one of his slaves, and apprehended, but redeemed by his wife, who readily parted with all her jewels to save his life. Apuleius, Antistius, Antius, Q. Lucretius Vispallio, Titus Vinus, and many others, were saved by the ingenious contrivances of their wives, after they had given themselves up for lost. Lucius, the uncle of Antony, was saved by his sister Julia, in whose house he had taken refuge. The ministers of the triumvirs endeavoured to break into the room, where he lay concealed; but his sister meeting them at the door, cried out several times, You shall never kill Lucius Cæsar, till you first dispatch me, me, who gave your general his life and being. The assassins, thunder-struck at these words, retired; but nevertheless Julia flew to the forum, where her son was sitting on his tribunal, receiving the heads of the proscribed, and paying the assassins the promised rewards. I have transgressed your decree, said she to Antony, and am come to inform against myself. I have taken my brother into my house, and am resolved to protect him, till you shall think fit to put us both to death. You have behaved, replied Antony, like a good sister, but as a bad mother, and took no further notice of what Julia said; but Lucius was no more inquired after. Though the country as well as the city swarmed with informers and assassins, yet many illustrious citizens found means to avoid the fury of the proscription, and to get safe, either to Brutus in Macedon, or to Sextus Pompeius in Sicily. The latter kept constantly a great number of small vessels hovering on the coasts of Italy, to receive such as made their escape, and treated them with great kindness and civility. The most considerable persons among those who had the good luck to elude the fury of their enemies and persecutors, were, besides those we have already mentioned, Valerius Messala, Bibulus, Arianus, Metellus, Restio, Appius, Meneius, Junius, Pomponius, Hirtius, Apuleius, Aruntius, Coponius, and Ventidius. Messala and Bibulus were invited home by the triumvirs, who by a public declaration owned, that they had not been any ways accessory to the death of Cæsar; but they chose to continue with Brutus in Macedon, and signalized themselves in the battle of Philippi. Bibulus was afterwards raised to the first employments in the state. Arianus and Metellus were saved by their children, Restio, Appius, Meneius, and Junius by their slaves. Restio had marked one of his slaves on the forehead with a red-hot iron; the usual punishment inflicted on such slaves as attempted to run away from their masters. This slave, having by chance found out the place where Restio lay concealed, appeared unexpectedly before him, asking whether he could do him any service? Restio had afterwards treated the slave with great humanity, and done him many favours; but nevertheless, seeing himself now in his power, he looked upon his case as desperate, not doubting, but the slave would seize this opportunity of being revenged on him for the former affront; which the faithful and generous slave observing, addressed him thus: Can you imagine, that the marks, with which you formerly branded me, have made a deeper impression on my forehead, than the favours, which you have since bestowed upon me, have done in my heart!

Having

a Having thus spoke, he led him to a cave, and there supported him for some time with what he earned by his daily labour. At length a company of soldiers coming that way, and approaching the cave, the faithful slave, alarmed at the danger his master was in, followed them close, and falling upon a poor peasant, killed him in their presence, and cut off his head, crying out, I am now revenged on my master for the marks with which he has branded me. The soldiers, seeing the infamous marks on his forehead, and not doubting but he had killed Restio, snatched the head out of his hand and returned with it in all haste to the triumvirs. They were no sooner gone, than the slave conveyed his master to the sea-side, where they had the good luck to find one of Sextus Pompeius's vessels, which transported them safe into Sicily. The generosity of the slaves of Appius and Meneius, or Menenius, was still more heroic; for they suffered themselves to be slain in their masters habits, while their masters made their escape in the disguise of slaves. Pomponius, finding no other means to get safe out of Rome, assumed the habit of a prætor, and went early out of the city in that attire, being attended by his slaves in the disguise of lictors: he travelled at the expence of the public, giving out every-where, that he was sent by the triumvirs to negotiate a treaty with young Pompey: he was well received in all the cities on the road, and supplied both with horses and provisions: several bands of soldiers and assassins met him on his journey, but none of them offered to stop or examine an ambassador of the triumvirs; so that he reached Sicily undiscovered. Hirtius, Apuleius, and Aruntius killed, with the assistance of their friends, clients, and slaves, the soldiers, who were sent to murder them, and made their escape sword in hand. Ventidius, not the consul, deceived the murderers, by pretending to be one of them himself, and patrolling about the country with some of his friends, as in search of proscribed persons. The senator Coponius was saved by his wife at the expence of her virtue; Antony having caused his name to be struck out of the black list in regard of her compliance with his unlawful demands, after she had been proof for several years against the offers, caresses, and menaces of the lewd tyrant. Another senator, being quite tired with concealing himself in caves and dens, and sculking about the country in continual alarms, returned to Rome in the disguise of a school-master, opened there a little school, and kept it as long as the proscription lasted without being discovered, no-body imagining, that a poor pedant could have been of such significance, as to be ranked among the proscribed senators and knights.

The bold undertaking of Pomponius.

THOUGH we may perhaps seem to have dwelt already too long on so disagreeable a subject, yet we must, before we dismiss it, acquaint our readers with the fate of Cicero. The great reputation of that orator, the obligations which all men of learning owe to his memory, and the inimitable works he has left behind him, require of us a particular account of his death, and the most minute circumstances attending it. He was with his brother Quintus, who was likewise proscribed, at his country-house near Tusculum, when the first news was brought him of the proscription. He no sooner heard it, than he left Tusculum with his brother, taking his rout towards Astura (C), or, as some call it, Stura, another of his country-houses, on the sea-side between the promontories of Antium and Circæum. There they both designed to take shipping, and endeavour to join Brutus in Macedon. They travelled together each in his litter, oppressed with sorrow, and often joining their litters on the road to console each other. As they had, in the first alarm and hurry, forgot to take with them the necessary money to defray the expences of their voyage, it was agreed between them, that Cicero should make what haste he could to the sea-side, and Quintus return home to provide necessaries. Thus they embraced each other, and parted with reciprocal fears. Quintus returned to Rome, and got to his house undiscovered, where he thought himself safe at least for a short time, since it had been lately searched by the ministers of the triumvirs. But, as in most houses there were as many informers as domestics, his return was immediately known, and the house of course filled with soldiers.

soldiers and assassins, who, not being able to find him out, put his son to the torture, in order to make him declare where his father lay concealed. But filial affection was proof in the young Roman against the most exquisite torments. However, the tender youth could not help sighing now and then, and groaning in the height of his pain. Quintus was not far off; and the reader may imagine, though we cannot express, how the heart of a tender father must have been affected, in hearing the sighs and groans of a son dying on the rack to save his life. He could not bear it; but quitting the place of his concealment, he presented himself to the assassins, begging them with a flood of tears to put him to death, and dismiss the innocent child, whose generous behaviour the triumvirs themselves, if informed of the fact, would judge worthy of the highest encomiums and rewards. But those inhuman monsters, without being in the least affected, with the tears either of the father or the son, answered, that they must both die, the father, because he was proscribed, and the son, because, in defiance of the decree of the triumvirs, he had concealed his father. Then a new contest of tenderness arose between the father and the son, who should die the first: but this the assassins, destitute of all sense of humanity, and no-ways affected with such melting scenes, soon decided by beheading them both at the same time. Tho' Quintus Cicero's life was not perhaps without reproach, his death, it must be owned, was truly glorious; as for that of his son, it has been, and ever will be, celebrated by the writers of all nations and ages, as an instance of the most heroic affection and filial duty.

Embarques for Macedon.

BUT to return to the elder brother: Cicero, having reached Astura, and by good luck found a vessel there ready to weigh anchor, went on board with a design to pass over into Macedon and join Brutus. But, either dreading the inconveniencies of such a voyage, or still depending on the friendship of Octavianus, whom he had all along supported with his credit and eloquence, he soon changed his mind, and ordered the master of the ship to set him ashore at Circæum, whence he took his rout towards

Rome by land. But after he had gone about two hundred furlongs, he altered his resolution anew, and returned to sea, where he spent the night in a thousand melancholly and perplexing thoughts. One while he resolved to go privately into Octavianus's house, and there kill himself upon the altar of his domestic gods, in order to bring upon him the wrath of those furies, which were deemed the avengers of violated friendship. But the fear of being taken on the road, and the apprehension of the cruel treatment he expected, if taken, soon made him drop that resolution. Then falling into other thoughts equally perplexing, and wavering between the hopes he had in Octavianus's friendship, and the fear of death, he at last suffered his domestics to convey him by sea to a country-house, which he had in the neighbourhood of Gaïeta. Near the place, where he was to land, stood a little temple dedicated to Apollo, from which, it is said, a flight of crows, coming with great noise, made towards Cicero's small vessel, as it was putting into port, and perching on the sails and rigging, pecked them with a hideous noise; which was looked upon by all as a bad omen. However, Cicero went ashore, and entering his house, lay down upon his bed to take some rest. The crows followed him, and, fluttering about the windows of the room where he lay, made a dreadful noise. One of them was so bold as to fly into the chamber, and making to the bed where Cicero was reposing with the cloaths cast over his head, pecked them off by degrees and uncovered his face. The example of this creature roused his indolent domestics, who began to reproach each other for neglecting to save the life of a man, for whose preservation the very birds of the air seemed concerned: wherefore, partly by force partly by intreaty, they put him again into his litter, and carried him towards the sea-side. They were scarce gone, when a band of soldiers under the command of Herennius, a centurion, and Popilius Lænas, a military tribune, came to the house. Cicero had formerly undertaken the defence of Popilius, when he was under a prosecution for the murder of his own father, and by his triumphing eloquence had got him absolved by those very judges, who a little before were ready to condemn him to a most cruel death. But the ungrateful wretch, unmindful of former obligations, and wholly intent on currying favour with Antony, had promised to find out Cicero, where-ever he lay concealed, and bring him his head. He found the doors of his house shut, but breaking them open and searching in vain every corner, he threatened to put all the slaves in the house to the torture, if they did not immediately declare where their master lay concealed. But the faithful slaves, without betraying the least fear, answered with great constancy and resolution, that they knew not where he was. At length a young man, by name Philologus (D), ^{Is discovered.} who had been slave to Quintus, and afterwards enfranchised by him, and instructed by Cicero in the liberal arts and sciences with all the tenderness of a father, discovered to the tribune, that Cicero's domestics were then carrying him in a litter through the close and shady walks to the sea-side. Upon this information, Popilius with some of his men hastened to the place, where he was to come out; while Herennius with the rest followed the litter through the narrow paths. As soon as Cicero perceived Herennius, he commanded his servants to set down his litter, and stroking, according to his custom, his beard with his left hand, he put out his head, and looked at the assassins with great intrepidity. This constancy, which they did not expect from him, his face disfigured and emaciated with cares and troubles, his hair and beard neglected and in disorder, &c. so affected the soldiers who attended Herennius, that they covered their eyes with their hands, while he cut off his head, and, pursuant to Antony's directions, his right hand, with which he had wrote the Philippics. With those trophies of their cruelty, Herennius and Popilius hastened back to Rome, and laid them before Antony ^{His head and right hand cut off, and carried to Antony.} while he was holding an assembly of the people for the election of new magistrates. The cruel tyrant no sooner beheld them, than he cried out in a transport of joy, Now let there be an end of all our proscriptions; live Romans, live in safety; you have nothing more to fear. He took the head in his hand, and looked on it a long time with great satisfaction, smiling at a sight, which drew tears from all who were present. After he had satiated his cruel and revengeful temper with so dismal a spectacle, he sent, as we are told by several writers, the head of the orator to his wife Fulvia, who was naturally more cruel than the triumvir himself, and had borne an implacable hatred to Cicero, ever since the time of her first husband P. Clodius, who was slain by Milo. That infernal fury, after having insulted the poor remains of her enemy with the most injurious reproaches, took that venerable head in her lap, and drawing out the tongue of the deceased, which had uttered many bitter invectives against both her husbands, pierced it several times with a golden bodkin, which she wore in her hair. ^{The cruelty of Fulvia} When Fulvia had satiated her impotent rage, Antony ordered both the head and the hand to be set up on the rostra, where Rome could not without horror behold the remains of a man, who had so often triumphed in that very place by the force and charms of his eloquence (E). Thus fell the greatest orator Italy or any other country ever bred; a man who, as Cæsar the dictator used to say, had obtained a laurel as much above all triumphs, as it was more glorious to extend the bounds of the Roman learning than those of the Roman empire. In his consulate, which was truly glorious, he discovered with wonderful sagacity the most secret plots of the seditious Catiline, defeated his best concerted measures, and saved, we may say, Rome from utter destruction; whence he was deservedly honoured with the glorious title of the father of his country. The Roman people, no doubt, owed him much; and he took care to put them frequently in mind of their obligations; for he was quoting on all occasions, in and out of season, the nones of December, as M. Brutus observed in one of his letters to Atticus. He loved his country; but his zeal did not carry him so far as to make him sacrifice his private interest to the public welfare. This Brutus, who sincerely loved him, but knew his foible, insinuates in several letters to their common friend Pomponius Atticus. We are too much afraid, says he in one of his epistles, of death, banishment ^{His character.}

(D) Plutarch seems to question what some authors have wrote of the treachery of Philologus; at least he tells us, that this circumstance was unknown to Tyro, Cicero's emancipated slave, who published an account of his life, which in Plutarch's time was in great request, but has not reached ours. Appian tells us, that Cicero was betrayed and discovered by one Cyrillus, who had formerly served Clodius, his mortal enemy.

(E) We have followed Plutarch's account; but other writers tell us, that Cicero's slaves and domestics, seeing Popilius and Herennius pursuing their master, put themselves in a posture of defence, and seemed determined to defend his life at the expence of their own; but that Cicero would not allow them to use any violence, saying, Let us obey the decrees of destiny, and avoid shedding more blood than it has pleased the gods to require. Having thus spoke to his domestics, he encouraged Popilius to advance, and putting his head out of the litter, Draw near, veteran, said he, and shew us what you can do. At these words the tribune came close to the litter, and with one blow cut off his head (48).

banishment, and poverty. These things appear to Cicero as great evils, who, provided he be allowed what he desires, provided he be respected and praised, reckons an honourable slavery as nothing, if honour is compatible with so great infamy. And elsewhere; I have no great opinion of those fine arts, of which Cicero is so great a master; for what use do we see him make of all he has written concerning the liberty of his country, true honour, death, and banishment? &c. Plutarch tells us, that though Brutus and his followers both loved and trusted Cicero, yet none of them ever thought of imparting their design to him, because they were determined to admit into the conspiracy such only as were bold, brave, and despisers of death; whereas Cicero was by nature a coward, and besides become so wary and over-cautious by old age, that he would not have made one step without the greatest security, which would have blunted the edge of their forwardness and resolution, in an affair that required all the dispatch imaginable^f. But after all, the intrepidity, with which he offered himself to death, ought to make us in a manner overlook the timorousness, pusillanimity, and irresolution, which he betrayed in most occurrences of his life. He died on the seventh of the ides of December, in the sixty-fourth year of his age, and was greatly lamented by all ranks of men. Antony himself made some sort of reparation to his memory; for, instead of rewarding the perfidious Philologus, who betrayed his master and benefactor, he delivered him up to Pomponia, the widow of Quintus Cicero and sister of Pomponius Atticus, who, after having glutted her impotent rage and desire of revenge with the most exquisite torments cruelty itself could invent, obliged the miserable wretch to cut off his own flesh by piece-meal, boil it, and eat it in her presence. But Tyro, Cicero's freedman, has not so much as mentioned the treachery of Philologus, as we have observed above out of Plutarch. Octavianus, who shamefully sacrificed Cicero to his most cruel and bitter enemy, declared several years after the esteem he had for him: for visiting one day his daughter's son, and finding him with a book of Cicero's in his hand, the boy for fear endeavoured to hide it under his gown; which Octavianus perceiving, took it from him, and turning over a great part of the book standing, gave it him again, saying, This, my child, was a learned man, and a lover of his country^g.

WHILE the proscription was still raging, and Rome in the utmost consternation in seeing herself daily deprived of some of her best citizens, Lepidus took it in his head to triumph, on account of some inconsiderable advantages he had formerly gained over the revolted Spaniards. The decree, empowering him to enjoy this honour, was issued by himself with the consent and approbation of his two colleagues, and began thus: To all those who shall honour our triumph with sacrifices, feasting, and other demonstrations of joy, health and good fortune; but to others misery and proscription. This decree drew greater crowds to his triumph than had ever been seen on the like occasion: he was attended by all the nobility of Rome, who strove to outvie each other in offering sacrifices for the safety of Lepidus and his colleagues, and in feasting their friends and the friends of the triumvirs. L. Munatius Plancus was likewise decreed a triumph for something, we know not what, he had done in Gaul^h. As it was customary for the soldiers to sing, during the triumphal procession, satyrical verses on the victorious generals, the following were often repeated on this occasion; De Germanis, non de Gallis, duo triumphant consules. The Latin word Germani signifies equally brothers, and, the inhabitants of Germany, so that the verses might be understood as importing, either that the designed consuls triumphed over the Germans, or over their brothers; for they had both procured the proscription of their brothers, or at least consented to it^w.

The cruelty and avarice of the triumvirs.

AND now the triumvirs, having glutted their revenge with the blood of so many illustrious citizens, began to think of raising the necessary sums for the carrying on of the war against Brutus and Cassius. In order to this they published daily new lists of proscribed persons, containing the names of the richest citizens in Rome, whom they caused, under several pretences, to be inhumanly murdered, and then seized on their estates, defrauding the poor widows and orphans of their right of inheritance and succession. They burdened the people with most grievous taxes, seized all the gold and silver, whether in plate or specie, they could lay their hands on, and took away by force immense sums, belonging both to strangers and citizens of Rome, which had been deposited in the hands of the vestal virgins. But with all this, not being able to make up the sum of two hundred thousand talents, which they judged necessary

a to defray the charges of the war, they drew up a list of fourteen hundred of the richest ladies of Rome, mothers, daughters, relations, or any ways allied to such persons as they had proscribed, and taxed them all equally, and at an extravagant rate, though most of the alliances were very far fetched. Hereupon the ladies, after having had recourse in vain to the female relations of the triumvirs, agreed to go all in a body, and plead their cause at the tribunal of those magistrates, while they were administering justice in the forum. Accordingly, having made their way through the croud and the numerous guards attending the tyrants, they demanded to be heard. The triumvirs, alarmed at such an unusual sight, ordered their guards to disperse them; but this occasioning great murmurs among the people, one of them was at length permitted to speak, and the person the suppliants chose for this purpose was Hortensia, the daughter of the celebrated orator Hortensius, who addressed the triumvirs thus: The unhappy women you see here imploring your justice and bounty, would never have presumed to appear in this place, had they not first made use of all other means, which their natural modesty could suggest to them. Though our appearing here may seem contrary to the rules of decency prescribed to our sex, which we have hitherto observed with all strictness, yet the loss of our fathers, children, brothers, and husbands, may sufficiently excuse us, especially when their unhappy deaths are made a pretence for our further misfortunes. You pretend, that they had offended and provoked you; but what injury have the women done, that they must be impoverished? If they are as blameable as the men, why do you not proscribe them too? Have we declared you enemies to your country? Have we suborned your soldiers, raised troops against you, or opposed you in the pursuit of those honours and offices which you claim? We pretend not to govern the republic; nor is it our ambition, which has drawn the present misfortune on our heads. Empire, dignities, and honours are not for us. Why should we contribute to a war, wherein we have no manner of interest? 'Tis true indeed, that in the Carthaginian war our mothers assisted the republic, which was at that time reduced to the utmost distress; but neither their houses, their lands, nor their moveables were sold for that service; some rings and a few jewels furnished the supply: it was not constraint and violence that forced it from them: what they contributed was intirely owing to their own good will and generous disposition. What danger at present threatens the city? If the Gauls or Parthians were incamped on the banks of the Tiber or the Anio, you should find us no less zealous in the defence of our common country, than our mothers were before us. But we ought not, and will not be any ways concerned in civil wars. Neither Marius, nor Cæsar, nor Pompey, ever thought of obliging us to take part in the domestic troubles which their ambition raised; nay, not Sylla himself, who first set up tyranny in Rome; and yet you assume the glorious title of reformers of the state, a title, which will turn to your eternal ignominy, if, without the least regard to the laws of equity, you persist in your wicked resolution of plundering those of their estates and fortunes, who have given you no just cause of offence.

The triumvirs, provoked at the boldness of this speech, and fearing it might occasion some sudden tumult, ordered their lictors to drive away such troublesome suppliants; but the people crying out against such violence, they adjourned the affair to the next day, when, to appease the multitude, who had openly espoused the cause of the women, they reduced their number from one thousand four hundred to four hundred; but at the same time taxed above a hundred thousand men, as well strangers as citizens, without exempting the priests themselves, obliging them to pay immediately the fiftieth part of their estates, and a whole years revenue. In the levying of this tax the soldiers committed such unheard-of cruelties, that the triumvirs were obliged to charge one of the consuls to watch them, and punish the offenders with the utmost severity. But the cowardly magistrate, fearing to disgust the legionaries, winked at the disorders committed by them, and exerted his authority only against a few slaves, whom he caused to be crucified for the enormous cruelties they had exercised, in the disguise of soldiers, on some of the most illustrious citizens *.

AND now the triumvirs, having caused about three hundred senators and two thousand knights to be inhumanly massacred, and raised by a thousand extortions the necessary sums for their eastern expedition, assembled at last the few senators they had left alive, and, entering the senate-house, declared, that the proscription was at an end. Lepidus endeavoured to justify their past proceedings, and assured the conscript fathers, that for the future he at least should give them no occasion of complaint. But Octavianus, not yet satiated with so many butcheries, openly declared, That he still reserved to himself the liberty of punishing the guilty. And indeed Suetonius tells us, that though he was at first unwilling to sign the fatal decree, which doomed so many citizens to die, yet he was the most cruel and inexorable of the three in the execution of it¹. Some of the antient and most of the modern writers endeavour to clear him from that reproach, and lay all the blame upon Antony; nay, they cry him up for one of the most mild, humane, and moderate princes that ever swayed a sceptre. But we meet with too many instances in history, which evidently shew that cruelty was the natural bent of his temper. We shall give only one here, which we have omitted in our account of his short consulate, and reserve the rest for their proper places. The prætor Quintus Gellius had on all occasions assisted him to the utmost of his power, and employed all his interest in his behalf, when he first stood for the consulate. Octavianus therefore no sooner obtained that dignity, than he appointed him governor of Africa with the title of proconsul: but soon after, taking it into his head that the prætor designed to murder him, he caused him to be seized by a band of soldiers in his seat of justice, and to be hurried away, without further inquiry, to the rack, like the meanest slave. He confessed nothing, nor indeed had any such thing ever entered into his thoughts; for he had been always greatly attached both to Cæsar and Octavianus. But neither could his great quality and high station, nor his innocence, exempt him from the hands of the executioner. The gentle consul condemned him to die, but first caused the venerable magistrate to be brought before him, that he might have the cruel and brutal pleasure of digging out his eyes with his own hands; which he did accordingly, and then ordered the executioner, less cruel than himself, to dispatch him². Is not this single instance an undeniable proof of the cruelty of his temper?

virs appoint consuls, prætors, &c. for several years.

AFTER the the triumvirs had declared, to the inexpressible joy both of the senate and people, that the proscription was at an end, they appointed of their own authority, without so much as assembling the people, the consuls for the ensuing year. These were M. Æmilius Lepidus, the triumvir, and Lucius Munatius Plancus. After this, as Antony and Octavianus were wholly intent on their grand expedition into the east, against Brutus and Cassius, they named, in concert with Lepidus, consuls, prætors, and ædiles for several ensuing years, chusing for these great offices such persons as they all approved of, and could safely rely on. This precaution seemed necessary, to prevent the people from raising to these dignities, during their absence, men of seditious tempers, or ill-affected to the triumvirate. When they had thus settled matters in the city, Antony and Octavianus first divided both the money and troops, and then set out, the former for Brundisium, and the latter for Rhegium, where the fleets, appointed to transport them into the Levant, were ready to take the forces on board, and put to sea with the first favourable wind. But, before we relate the great events, which determined the fate of the unhappy republic, we must give a succinct account of what passed in the east, from the taking of Laodicea by Cassius, to the arrival of Antony and Octavianus in Macedon.

vade Egypt.

Cassius, having, by the reduction of Laodicea, made himself master of all Syria, resolved in the next place to invade Egypt; for Cleopatra had not only declared for the triumvirs, but was ready to join them with a powerful fleet; but, as he was on his march, he was recalled by Brutus, who, by letters after letters, pressed him to come and join him against the triumvirs, who were making a dreadful havock of their friends in Italy, and assembling forces with a design to pass over into Macedon. It is not, said he in one of his letters, to gain an empire for ourselves, but to relieve our country, that we have assembled such powerful armies. We ought not so much to think of gaining glory by new conquests, as of destroying those who have enslaved Rome. Let us remember what we have undertaken, and persevere in our first intentions. It is high time for us to turn our thoughts upon Italy, which now groans under the oppression of tyrants. Let us make what haste we can thither, and endeavour to relieve our fellow-citizens. As Cassius had a great esteem and veneration for Brutus, he dropt his enterprize upon Egypt; and, committing the government of Syria to his brother's son with one legion, he set out with all the rest to meet him. On his march he detached a body of horse into Cappadocia, with orders to put king Ariobarzanes to death, upon an information that he had conspired against him, and kept up a private correspondence with his enemies. His orders were put in execution, and, after the king's death, great sums raised on his subjects, a subjects, who were looked upon by Cassius as disaffected to the republican party. As he passed by Tarsus, being touched with compassion on the miserable condition of that unhappy city, he remitted the rest of the heavy tax, which he had formerly laid on the inhabitants for siding with Dolabella, and refusing to supply with provisions the troops which Tullius Cimber, one of the conspirators, was leading into Syria. This conduct of the Tarsenses, after they had entered into an alliance with Cassius, and even presented him with a crown of gold, so provoked the republican general, that he condemned them to pay fifteen hundred talents; for the raising of which sum they first sold the lands belonging to the public, and the ornaments of their temples, afterwards their children of both sexes, and at last their women and old men. As the money accruing from these sales did not amount to the sum of fifteen hundred talents, they were at last forced to sell some of their young men, who were fit to bear arms; but the unhappy wretches, preferring death to slavery, laid violent hands on themselves; which Cassius no sooner heard, than he forgave them the rest of the payment, and exempted them from all tributes for the future. From Tarsus he pursued his march into Asia to join Brutus^a. That general, seeing himself master of all Greece, Macedon, and Illyricum, had resolved to pass over into Asia with the greater part of his army, and was already on his march, when news was brought him, that Caius Antonius, whom he had taken prisoner, as we have related above, and treated with the utmost civility, had raised a sedition among the troops that were left in Macedon. Hereupon he turned back, quelled the tumult, and having put Caius under close confinement in the city of Apollonia, pursued his march, and passed over into Asia, where he was joined by all the princes of that country, and among the rest by Deiotarus, king or tetrarch of Galatia, tho' he had refused to send any succours to Cassius. While Brutus was in Asia, Caius Antonius, having found means, even in his confinement, to debauch many of his soldiers, attempted to make his escape; but the plot being discovered, Antonius was more closely confined, and the guilty soldiers forced to take refuge on a neighbouring hill, where they seemed determined to stand it out, and rather undergo any hardships, than submit to the will of their officers. Hereupon Caius Clodius, to whose custody Brutus had committed the seditious prisoner, fearing he might raise new disturbances, and at length make his escape, put him to death; but whether of his own authority, or by Brutus's orders, is uncertain. Thus Dion Cassius^b. But Plutarch tells us, that Brutus no sooner heard the news of Cicero's death, than he sent orders to Hortensius to kill Caius Antonius; and adds, that, on this account, Antony having afterwards taken Hortensius in the battle of Philippi, slew him on his brother's tomb. However that be, Brutus, fearing the death of Antonius might occasion disturbances in Macedon, left Asia, and hastened back thither. On his arrival, he put himself at the head of a legion, and marched against the mutineers, whom he soon forced to sue for mercy. As Brutus was a man of an extraordinary mild nature, great magnanimity, and insensible of the passions of anger and revenge, he could not prevail upon himself to put any of the seditious legionaries to death, respecting, as Appian observes, the character of a Roman citizen even in an enemy. His officers pressed him to punish at least a small number of the mutineers, in order to deter others from the like practices. The good-natured general seemed to yield to their importunity; and, having ordered a galley to be got ready, caused the ringleaders of the late tumult to be put on board of it, as if he intended to have them thrown into the sea, and drowned; but, in the mean time, he gave private orders to the commander of the galley to convey them to some place of safety, and there leave them^c.

Brutus, having thus quieted all disturbances in Macedon, hastened back into Asia. It was, as is commonly believed, on his march thither, that he coined a new piece of money, which was for some time current in all the eastern countries. On one side was the head of Brutus, and on the reverse a pileus or cap, the badge of liberty, between two poniards, with this legend, Eid. Mar. to revive the remembrance of the ides of March, which was the last day of Cæsar's life and usurped empire. Brutus, arriving in Asia, advanced in all haste to Smyrna, where he had appointed to meet Cassius, who accordingly came after him. As they had not seen one another since they parted at Pireæus, the one for Syria, and the other for Macedon, we may easily imagine how great their joy was at their first meeting. They had been intimate friends long before before the death of Cæsar, were nearly related, Cassius having married Julia the sister of Brutus, and looked upon themselves as the only protectors of their oppressed country. Their joy was doubled, when they compared their present circumstances with the despicable condition they were both in when they left Italy. Cassius shewed all possible respect for Brutus, having a great opinion of his virtue, honesty, and integrity. On the other hand, Brutus, considering Cassius as the elder man, and of a more weakly constitution than himself, desired that their conferences might be held in his camp; for their two armies incamped separately. When they came to deliberate about the proper measures to be taken with relation to the great war with which they were threatened, Brutus was for transporting all their forces over into Macedon and Thessaly, and there making head against the triumvirs, who, in all likelihood, would land their numberless troops in one of those countries; but Cassius was of opinion, that they should first reduce the Rhodians and Lycians, that they might not leave two such formidable maritime powers unsubdued behind them; for both these nations had refused to pay them any contributions, or to take part in the war, under pretence of maintaining a strict neutrality, though it was well known, that they had sent succours under-hand to the triumvirs. As for the numberless forces of the enemy, their great number, said Cassius, renders them less formidable; they will find a powerful enemy to contend with in Greece, Macedon, or Thessaly, famine. Where will they find provisions for so great a multitude? Let us therefore turn our arms against their friends the Lycians and Rhodians, and in the mean time leave them to fight with want and famine^d. Brutus readily came into the opinion of Cassius, who was deemed an officer of great experience, and had given extraordinary proofs of his conduct after the unhappy battle of Carrhae, as we have related in our history of the Parthians^e. It was therefore agreed, that, before they passed farther westward, Brutus should march against the Lycians, and Cassius sail with his fleet against the Rhodians; but as Brutus had spent great sums in equipping a fleet, he desired Cassius to share with him the immense treasure he had amassed in Asia. This demand was taken ill by the friends of Cassius, who endeavoured to dissuade him from complying with the just request of Brutus, saying, That it was not reasonable the money which he had saved with so much parsimony, or got with so much envy, should be disposed of to enrich Brutus's soldiers, and to make him popular. But Cassius, without hearkening to their remonstrances, generously gave him a third part of the great treasure he had heaped up; after which the two generals parted, Cassius marching against the Rhodians, and Brutus against the Lycians^f.

As the city of Rhodes was at that time in a very flourishing condition, and had a powerful fleet at sea, Cassius, before he attempted to make a descent on the island, took care to exercise his mariners at Mindus, a maritime city of Caria. Thither the Rhodians sent ambassadors to him, putting him in mind of the victories they had formerly gained over Demetrius king of Macedon, over Mithridates the Great, king of Pontus, and many others, and representing, that their nation was not easily to be conquered; that he might, in so dangerous an attempt, lose, as many others had done, all the glory he had hitherto acquired; that they had a numerous fleet at sea; that their naval forces had been always dreaded by all nations, &c. As they were going on, Cassius interrupted them: Since you have so great an opinion of your own valour, said he, I will soon give you an opportunity of exerting it. You have sent succours to Dola-bella, and unless you assist me in the like manner, neither the numerous fleet you have at sea, nor the dread of your naval forces, shall deter me from invading your island, and laying siege to your proud capital. This answer terrified the wiser citizens, who were for complying with Cassius's demands; but the populace, conceited of their own valour, opposed all their measures; and two orators, Alexander and Mnaseas, by magnifying the strength of the nation, the number of their ships, the experience of their mariners, the fortifications of the city and its port, prevailed upon the multitude to reject all proposals of an accommodation; nay, the people, in an assembly which was held at this time for the electing of new magistrates, appointed Alexander commander in chief of the land forces, and Mnaseas of the fleet, who immediately began to make the necessary preparations for war. However, the nobility, who dreaded the valour of the Romans, sent a second embassy to Cassius, employing for that purpose Archelaus, who had formerly taught him the Greek tongue in Rhodes, and for whom the Roman had had on all occasions shewed great respect and veneration. Archelaus put him in mind of their ancient friendship, of the alliance that was still subsisting between the republic of Rhodes and that of Rome, and of the education he had received in that city. Cassius answered, That if Archelaus had consented to the hostilities of his countrymen Cassius's speech to the Rhodian envoy. against him, he had, by that means, renounced his friendship, and effaced all former obligations; but if he had advised them to embrace his interest, and they had rejected his advice, he was determined to be revenged on them for the contempt they had shewn for him. As to their alliance with Rome, he said, that in virtue of that treaty with the republic, they were obliged to assist him against those who were using their utmost efforts to overturn the republican government, and introduce arbitrary power in its room; that he demanded succours of them as prætor and proconsul appointed by the senate and the most honest part of the Roman people, and that, if they refused to acknowledge him in that character, or would not send him the succours he demanded in the name of the senate and Roman people, he could not look upon them otherwise than as enemies to Rome, and would treat them as such. Archelaus finding Cassius inflexible, and the reasons he alledged for making war upon the Rhodians unanswerable; took his leave, and returned to Rhodes, where he found Alexander and Mnaseas ready to put to sea with a fleet of thirty-three ships of war, and a great number of smaller vessels. These two commanders no sooner heard the Roman general's final answer, than they weighed anchor, and went in quest of the enemy's fleet, which they met off Cnidus, where they had formerly defeated the navy of Mithridates the Great. This they looked upon as a good omen, and therefore immediately attacked the Roman fleet, which was commanded by Statius Murcus, with incredible bravery and resolution. The fight was long and bloody, on account of the great experience of the Rhodian mariners, and the nimbleness of their ships; but at length the Rhodians The Rhodians overcome in a sea-fight. were put to flight, after having lost a great number of soldiers, as well as mariners, and five of their best ships, three whereof were taken, and two sunk. After this engagement, Cassius, who beheld it from a neighbouring mountain, marched his army to Loryma, a maritime city of Caria, situated over-against the island of Rhodes, and there, without loss of time, put his forces on board a great number of transports, which he had assembled before-hand, and ordered them to land in the island, and fortify themselves there, while he, with a fleet of eighty ships of war, invested the city of Rhodes by sea, in hopes of striking terror into the inhabitants, and obliging them, without further bloodshed, to submit, and comply with his demands. With this view he continued some days inactive before the place; but was greatly surprised to see the enemy's fleet unexpectedly sail out of the harbour in good order, and offer him battle. In this second engagement the Rhodians were defeated anew, with the loss of two galleys, and forced to take shelter under the walls of their city, which was immediately invested both by sea and land, and, after a short but most vigorous resistance, forced to surrender at discretion^s. Appian tells, that some of the rich citizens, to save their estates, betrayed the city to Cassius; after he had solemnly promised not to destroy it. The inhabitants seeing him master of the place, whether by force or treachery is uncertain, flocked to him from all quarters, calling him their king and master. But Cassius, abhorring those titles, I am neither your king nor master, said he, but the destroyer of a tyrant. who would have been your king and master. He Cassius treats the Rhodians with severity then caused a tribunal to be raised in the market-place, and seating himself on it, with a spear planted before him, as it was customary among the Roman generals, when they had taken a city by storm, he first forbade his soldiers, upon pain of death, to plunder the houses, or offer any sort of violence to the inhabitants. He then summoned fifty of the citizens before his tribunal, who had been most sanguine for war, and pronounced sentence of death upon them, which was immediately put in execution. He condemned twenty five more, who had made their escape, to perpetual banishment. Afterwards he commanded all the gold and silver, whether belonging to the temples, to the public, or to private persons, to be brought to him in a limited time, threatening those with death who should conceal any part of their wealth, and promising rewards to such as should discover it, viz. a tenth to persons of a free condition, and liberty to slaves. At first some concealed their treasures, not thinking he would proceed with so much rigour; but when they saw three or four of the richest citizens die by the hand of the public executioner, for having put out of the way part

part of their wealth, they desired that the time prefixed might be prolonged; which, being granted, they brought to light what they had hid in tombs, wells, and other places, and laid it before Cassius, who by that means raised, at the expence of private persons, the sum of eight thousand talents, as we have related more at length in the history of Rhodes^b. Cassius, having thus reduced and pillaged the city of Rhodes, returned to the continent, leaving Lucius Varus with a strong garison on the island, to exact a fine of five hundred talents more, which at his departure he laid on those refractory islanders. On the continent, he was informed, that Cleopatra had left Egypt, and was sailed with a numerous fleet to join Antony and Octavianus. Upon this intelligence he sent Statius Murcus with sixty ships of war, and a legion on board, to cruize on the coast of Peloponnesus, pillage that rich country, and keep near the promontory of Tenarus, in hopes of meeting there with Cleopatra's fleet; but the queen's navy was dispersed by a violent storm, and most of her ships dashed to pieces on the coast of Africa; which misfortune obliged her to return home, and lay aside for the present all thoughts of sending any succours to the triumvirs. Cassius, having now no enemies behind him, began his march to rejoin Brutus, obliging all the provinces of Asia, as he passed through them, to pay, without the least abatement, ten years taxes^c.

WHILE Cassius was thus employed against the Rhodians, Brutus was making war in Lycia, agreeable to the scheme concerted between the two republican generals. Before he began hostilities, he sent to the Lycians to demand a supply of men and money; but one Maukrates, a popular man among them, persuaded them not to comply with Brutus's request, and taking upon him the whole management of the war, posted several bodies of troops on the frontiers, to prevent Brutus from entering the country. But the Roman general detached a party of horse against them; which, coming upon them unexpectedly, killed six hundred of them, drove the rest from their posts, and opened a passage into the country for the whole army^d. Dion tells us, that the Lycians, who were a brave and warlike people, met Brutus on their frontiers, with all the forces of their nation, and gave him battle; but were overcome by the Romans, who made themselves masters of the enemy's camp, and all their baggage^e. However that be, Brutus, after this first skirmish or battle, entered their country, and finding no enemy in the field to contend with, made himself master of all their cities and villages, except Xanthus (F) their capital, whither the flower of the nation retired, with a design to stand a siege. Brutus, who was of an extraordinary mild nature, and great magnanimity, being unwilling to shed the blood of those unhappy wretches, set all the prisoners he had taken free without ransom, hoping to win the whole nation by his clemency; but the Lycians, despising his humanity and good-nature, would hearken to no terms; so that Brutus was forced, to his great grief, to lay siege to the place, which, he foresaw, would bring innumerable evils on a brave and gallant people. Xanthus was reckoned one of the strongest cities of Asia; its walls were of an extraordinary height and thickness, and surrounded with a ditch fifty foot deep, and broad in proportion. The inhabitants had cut down the woods to a great distance, destroyed all the neighbouring villages, and conveyed away the materials; which obliged Brutus to send parties a great way off to fetch the necessary timber for building his machines, and even the earth to fill up the ditch, the country round about being very rocky; but notwithstanding the many difficulties which he had to struggle with, and which he did not himself expect to surmount in many months, as Appian tells us, he in a few days built his machines, filled up the ditch, and began to batter the walls with the ram: so great was the eagerness and ardour of the soldiery, animated by the example of their general, who shared with them all the toils and dangers of so difficult an undertaking. The besieged made a most vigorous defence, and behaved in their sallies with unparalleled bravery; but were always beaten with great loss, Brutus keeping the half of his army night and day under arms. A breach being at length made in the wall, the Xanthians began to think of making

(F) Xanthus was, according to Strabo (49), the metropolis of all Lycia. The river, which watered it, is said by Stephanus to have borrowed its name from the city, and the city from its founder Xanthus, who was, according to some, an Egyptian, according to others, a native of Crete.

making their escape; and accordingly some of them threw themselves into the river; which ran through the city, hoping to save themselves by swimming and diving under water; but they were taken in nets let down for that purpose, with little bells fastened to them, to give present notice when any of the unfortunate wretches were intangled in them; but the greater part, despairing to hold out any longer, resolved to make a general sally; and, forcing their way through the enemy's camp, to retire to the neighbouring mountains. Brutus, suspecting their design, ordered his men to retire from before the gate; which the Xanthians supposing to have happened through the negligence of the guard, sallied out in the dead of the night; but were repulsed with great slaughter by the Romans, who lay in wait for them. The next day about noon, they made another sally; set fire to the engines of the aggressors; and retired in great haste within their walls. The Romans pursued them close, and entered the city, to the number of two thousand; with the besieged; but the port-cullis falling, either by a stratagem of the enemy; or by the breaking of the ropes from which it hung, many of the Romans were crushed to pieces; and others shut in, without any possible means of retiring, or receiving the least assistance from their friends. In this desperate condition they resolved at least to sell their lives dear, and with this view marched in good order through showers of darts, which were discharged upon them from all parts; to a temple dedicated to Sarpedon king of Lycia, who was supposed to have been killed in the Trojan war. There they fortified themselves, and sustained a siege in the very heart of the city. In the mean time, Brutus and his men exerted their utmost efforts to relieve their fellow-soldiers; but all their endeavours were to no effect, the Xanthians defending it with a bravery and resolution which surprised the Romans themselves. As they could neither move nor break down the port-cullis, which was trellised with iron-bars, they endeavoured to scale the walls, using for that purpose not scaling-ladders, (for the besieged had burnt them, together with the wooden towers when they first sallied out) but long ropes, to which they fastened iron hooks. These they threw upon the walls, and by that means attempted to get over them; but the besieged, by pushing the aggressors down with their bucklers, or cutting the ropes with their swords, rendered this attempt likewise unsuccessful. While Brutus was under the utmost concern for his men, who were, to the number of two thousand, shut up in the city, a company of Oenoandes (G), who served under him and bore an irreconcilable hatred to the Xanthians, climbing up a steep rock adjoining to the walls, threw themselves from thence into the city, and opening a postern to some Romans who followed them, they went all in a body to one of the chief gates, which they broke down, notwithstanding the opposition they met with, and let in the rest of the Roman army. But, in the mean time, some sparks of fire being carried by a violent wind from the machines, which burnt with great fierceness, to the battlements, and from thence to the adjoining houses, the flame was in a trice spread all over the city, and the conflagration became general. Brutus, fearing the whole city should be destroyed, ordered his soldiers to lay aside all thoughts of revenge, and assist the inhabitants in quenching the fire; but the Xanthians, seized with a kind of frenzy, which Plutarch calls a violent desire of dying, strove to drive away the soldiers who came to their assistance; nay, they themselves, gathering together reeds, wood, and other combustible matter, spread the fire over the whole city, feeding it with what fuel they could get. Brutus, seeing the flame blaze out in a most frightful manner, and extremely desirous of having an opportunity to shew his clemency to a gallant people, who had fought with such bravery in defence of their liberty, mounted on horseback, and riding round the walls, stretched forth his hand to the inhabitants, begging of them that they would spare their own lives and save their town. But his intreaties were not regarded; the Xanthians were immoveably determined not to outlive the loss of their liberty, and therefore repulsed with showers of arrows the Romans, whom the good-natured general sent to their assistance. Some of them cut the throats of their wives, their children, and their slaves, before the soldiers faces, and then leaped into the flames. Not only the men, but the women, nay, even the children, ran like wild beasts, on the enemy's swords, or threw themselves head-

Instances of the fury and despair of the long Xanthians.

(G) Oenoanda, or, as others write it, Oeneanda, was, according to Pliny and Stephanus, situated on the confines of Cabalia, a small province of Lycia. It was still in being in the sixth century of the christian æra, and is mentioned in the notitia of the empire of Constantinople, commonly ascribed to the grammarian Hierocles. The inhabitants of this city bore an irreconcilable hatred to the Xanthians their neighbours, and therefore readily joined Brutus against them.

long from the top of the walls. Some children were seen offering their throats, or opening their breasts to their fathers swords, and begging they would take away that life which they had given. How great is the power of education! The Xanthians had inspired their children, from their very infancy, with the most heroic sentiments of liberty, and an utter abhorrence to slavery and subjection, often relating to them, how their forefathers had suffered themselves to be buried under the ruins of their country, rather than submit either to Harpagus, Cyrus's lieutenant, or to Alexander of Macedon, the famous conqueror of Asia; for they had in the Persian and Macedonian wars set fire to their city after the same manner, and destroyed themselves. When the city was almost wholly reduced to ashes, a woman was found, who had hanged herself with her young child fastened to her neck, and the torch in her hand, with which she had set fire to her own house. When this was related to Brutus, he burst into tears, and, declining to see so tragical an object, he proclaimed a reward to any soldier who should save a Xanthian; but with all his care and good-nature he could only preserve one hundred and fifty, and those much against their wills^m. Appian tells, that only some slaves were saved, and one hundred and fifty women, who wanted husbands to kill them; and adds, that Brutus found means to preserve some of the temples from so general a conflagrationⁿ.

Brutus endeavours to gain the Patarenfes by gentle methods.

FROM Xanthus Brutus led his army against Patara (H), another city of Lycia; but, being desirous to save the place and the lives of the inhabitants, before he began hostilities, he sent deputies to them, begging they would not force him to treat them as he had done the Xanthians. With the deputies he sent the few prisoners he had taken at Xanthus, hoping, that they, by giving the Patarenfes an account of their misfortunes, might deter them from following their example. But all was to no purpose; the inhabitants seemed determined to stand a siege, and undergo any miseries, rather than submit. This gave Brutus great uneasiness; he studied all means to win them by gentle methods, fearing the same frenzy, which had driven the Xanthians to destruction, might seize them. Notwithstanding the answer they sent him, which was, That they chose rather to die like brave men, than purchase their lives at the expence of their liberty and reputation, the humane general withdrew his troops, and granted them the rest of that day to reflect more seriously on their present circumstances. In the mean time, to get the better of their obstinacy, he set at liberty such of the Xanthian captives as were any ways allied to them, sending them into the city as a present from him to their relations; but the Patarenfes still continued inflexible. Brutus therefore, finding he could not gain them by gentle methods, had recourse to severity, and causing the Xanthian captives to be brought out one by one, he ordered them to be sold to the best bidder under the very walls of Patara; but as this was contrary to the bent of his inclination, after a few of those unfortunate wretches had been sold, he set the rest at liberty, declaring, that he could not find in his heart to reduce brave men to slavery, who had fought so valiantly in defence of their liberty. While he was under the greatest concern imaginable for the Patarenfes, whose obstinacy rendered all the measures abortive, which his good-nature could suggest for their preservation, a lucky accident put him at length in the way of triumphing over their stubborn and inflexible temper. One of his parties, in scouring the country, happened to meet some of the chief women of Patara, whom they took prisoners, and carried to Brutus, who immediately dismissed them all without ransom. These returning into the city, and there crying up the politeness, justice, and temperance of Brutus, prevailed upon their husbands and relations, who were all leading men, to submit to so good-natured a general, and put the city into his hands. Brutus treated them with great humanity, pardoning even those who had been to the very last for standing a siege. Plutarch tells us, that the Roman general exacted only an hundred and fifty talents of the whole nation, a very inconsiderable sum, if compared with that of eight thousand talents, which Cassius extorted from the Rhodi-ans.

a dians. Appian writes, that Brutus, after the example of Cassius, ordered the Patarenses, on pain of death, to bring to him all their gold and silver, promising rewards to such as should discover any hidden treasures. Upon this, a slave, belonging to a rich citizen, informed against his master, and discovered to a centurion, who was sent for that purpose, the place where he had buried the greatest part of his wealth. The citizen was immediately seized, and brought, together with the treacherous informer, before Brutus. The mother of the accused followed them, declaring with many tears, that she had hid the treasure without her son's knowledge, and consequently ought to be punished. On the other hand, the slave stood to his first information, maintaining, that his master, and not his mother, had transgressed the edict. Brutus heard both parties with great patience, and being in the end convinced, that the accusation of the slave was chiefly founded on the hatred he bore to his master, he commended the tenderness and generosity of the mother, restored the whole sum to the son, and condemned the slave to be crucified. This judgment, which was immediately published all over Lycia, gained him the hearts of the inhabitants, who came in flocks to him from all quarters, offering him, of their own accord, what ready money they had by them.ⁿ

AND now Brutus, having reduced, more by the fame of his clemency than by force of arms, all Lycia, left that country, and entered Ionian, where he found the famous rhetorician Theodotus, who had the most contributed to the death of Pompey the Great, as we have related in the history of Egypt. The unhappy wretch had fled out of Egypt on the arrival of Cæsar at Alexandria, and ever since that time sculked about in Asia, wandering from town to town, hated and abhorred by all men. Brutus no sooner heard he was in Ionian, than he caused him to be seized, and sacrificed to the manes of the illustrious Roman, who, by his advice, had been inhumanly murdered, as he himself had the impudence to boast^o. This memorable act of justice was greatly applauded by every honest Roman, and all the princes of Asia, who had a great veneration for the memory of Pompey. From Ionian Brutus marched into Lydia, and stopping at Sardis, the metropolis of that country, waited there for Cassius, who, after the reduction of Rhodes, was, by agreement, to rejoin him in the neighbourhood of that city.

d As Cassius drew near, Brutus went out to meet him; and the joy, both of the generals and armies, was exceeding great on this occasion. The soldiery expressed their satisfaction in seeing each other again with joyful acclamations, and saluted both generals with the title of imperator. As several jealousies of each other and complaints had passed between the two generals, as soon as the usual compliments and civilities were over, they withdrew into a private apartment, with a design to settle all differences between them, before they entered upon any other business. What was the subject of their debate, we know not; but they disputed with great warmth, reproaching and accusing each other with hard words, and at last bursting out into tears. But, notwithstanding this prohibition, M. Favonius, a wild and frantic pretender to virtue, and one who valued himself more upon a sort of Cynical liberty of speaking what he pleased, than upon the dignity of a senator, breaking through the attendants who kept the door, entered the room, and, without knowing the subject of the dispute, pronounced with a mimical voice this verse, which Homer puts in the mouth of Nestor; Be ruled, for I am elder than you both. This made Cassius laugh; but Brutus, offended at the impertinent behaviour of the pretended Cynic, thrust him out, calling him a dog, in allusion to his sect, and a counterfeit philosopher. This, however, put an end to the dispute; Cassius provided a supper that night, and Brutus invited his friends to it. As they were sitting down, Favonius came in, and took the most honourable place, tho' Brutus, calling out aloud, told him, That he was not invited; but, after all, he diverted the company, and the entertainment was seasoned both with mirth and learned discourses^p.

solved in public two of his own friends; and continued them in their offices, tho' accused of the same crime, contenting himself only with reprimanding them in private. He did not conceal his sentiments on this head from Brutus, whom he accused in a friendly manner of too much rigor and severity; when gentleness and favour were more necessary, and would prove of greater service to their cause. In answer to this, Brutus put him in mind of the ides of March, the day on which they had killed Cæsar, who himself neither vexed nor oppressed mankind, but was the support of those who did. He desired him to consider, that if justice could be neglected under any colour or pretence, it had been better to have suffered the injustice of Cæsar's friends, than to give impunity to their own; for then, said he, we could have been accused of cowardice only; whereas now, if we connive at the injustice of others, we make ourselves liable to the same accusation, and share with them in the guilt. From this we may perceive, as Plutarch observes, what was the rule of all Brutus's actions^a.

AND now the two republican generals, being masters of all the eastern provinces from Macedon to the Euphrates, after several consultations, resolved to march from Sardis to Abydus, and, crossing the Hellepont, advance into Macedon against Antony and Octavianus, who, notwithstanding the opposition they had met with from Statius Murcus, Cassius's admiral, had transported their troops, without the loss of one single ship or man, to Dyrrachium. From thence they detached Decidius Saxa and Caius Norbanus, with eight legions, to seize on the straits leading from Thrace into Macedon, in order to prevent Brutus and Cassius from coming upon them, and ravaging the country, before they had filled their magazines, and got together the necessary provisions for the support of their two armies. Brutus and Cassius, upon the first intelligence of these motions, left Sardis, and marched in all haste to Abydus, where they had appointed the Lycian fleet to meet them, and transport their forces out of Asia into Europe. It was on this march that Brutus is reported to have seen a ghost or spectre in his tent. This memorable story is thus related by Plutarch^c, Florus^d, and Appian^e: Brutus, being used to great moderation in his diet, was much given to watching, and allowed but a very small portion of time for sleep. Plutarch tells us, that he never slept in the day-time, as was customary among the Romans, and in the night then only when he had dispatched his affairs; and when, every one else being gone to rest, he had no body left to keep him company. At this time the war being begun, and he very careful and solicitous about the event of it, used to lie down for a short while just after supper, and spend the rest of the night either in dispatching his affairs, or reading till the third watch, when the centurions and tribunes used to wait on him for their orders. According to this custom, he was one night, before he passed out of Asia, very late alone in his tent, with a dim light burning by him, there being a general silence all over the camp, especially about his tent. As he was musing with himself and very thoughtful, he heard on a sudden an unusual noise at the door of his tent, which at the same time flew open. Brutus, casting his eye towards the place whence the noise came, saw a terrible and strange figure of a huge and frightful body coming towards him without speaking; but he undauntedly addressed the spectre, asking it, What art thou? a god, or a man? or upon what business dost thou come to us? I am, said the ghost, thy evil genius, Brutus; thou shalt see me again near Philippi. Brutus, without betraying the least fear, answered boldly, Well, I will see thee there: upon which the apparition vanished. Brutus immediately called his servants, who all told him, that they had neither seen nor heard any thing. He continued watching the rest of the night, and, as soon as it was day, went to give an account of what had happened to Cassius, who, as he had been bred up in the principles of the Epicurean philosophy, ascribed the vision wholly to the weakness of his senses and the force of imagination, which easily moves and varies them into all manner of ideas. This he maintained by the example of dreams, where the fancy, forming different images, affects the organs of the body after the same manner, as they would be moved by outward objects. But that there is any such thing as spirits or demons, said he, let us never believe it, much less that spirits can have human shape or voice, or any power over us; tho' I could earnestly wish it were so, that we might not only rely on the powerful armies and fleets that attend us, but likewise on the assistance of those immortal beings, who could not but be favourable to a cause so just and sacred

a sacred as ours is (I). This discourse satisfied Brutus, who was not under the least apprehension for himself, but very solicitous about the fate of his friends and country. Both generals pursued their march to Abydus, and, crossing the Hellepont, took their rout through Thrace, with a design to dislodge Saxa and Norbanus, who had seized the passes between that country and Macedon. Plutarch tells us, that on their march two eagles flew to them; and, lighting upon the two foremost ensigns, continually attended the army, and were fed by the soldiers, till they came to Philippi, where the day before the battle they disappeared. Upon their arrival in Thrace, they were joined by Rhaseupolis, a petty king of that country, at the head of three thousand horse, and conducted by him, as he was well acquainted with the country, through by-roads to the place where the two generals of the triumvirs were encamped with their eight legions. There Brutus and Cassius thought it adviseable, before they attempted to force the passes which were guarded by so numerous a body of the enemy, to review their forces, offer a solemn sacrifice for the success of their arms, and put their soldiers in mind of the justice of the cause in which they were engaged. Accordingly both armies passed in review before the two generals, and were found to consist of eighty thousand foot and twenty thousand horse, counting Romans and auxiliaries. In the next place, a sacrifice was offered with the utmost solemnity, and innumerable victims killed. When this ceremony was over, the two generals appeared on a tribunal erected for that purpose, having on their right hand the Roman senators, and magistrates of their party, and on the left the foreign kings and princes who had joined them. Cassius, who was the elder man, took upon him to speak, and, after having enlarged on the justice of their cause, on the unheard of cruelties committed by the triumvirs in Italy, on the miserable condition to which Rome was reduced, &c. he concluded with acquainting them, that Brutus and he had agreed to give immediately two thousand five hundred drachmas to each soldier, five thousand to each centurion, and double that sum to each tribune. This caused an universal joy in the army; nothing was heard but shouts of joy and loud acclamations, the soldiers and officers striving to outdo each other in protestations of fidelity, and an inviolable attachment to the interest of their leaders, which, they said, was the same with that of their country. The money was immediately distributed, and, besides, considerable presents made to the officers and commanders of the foreign troops; so that the whole army marched with great alacrity towards the plain of Oricum, which was bounded towards Macedon by the straits we have mentioned above. Norbanus, who was encamped there, upon the first notice of the enemy's march, dispatched an express to Decidius, who guarded the coast of the Meliac gulf, entreating him to make what haste he could to join him. The two bodies thus united, posted themselves so advantageously in the narrow passes, that it seemed impossible to dislodge them. Hereupon Brutus, being greatly at a loss what to do, advised with Rhaseupolis, who, as he was by birth a Thracian and well acquainted with that country,

They review their forces.

And distribute large sums among the soldiers.

(I) As Cassius had been bred up in the principles of the Epicurean philosophy, and had often disputed with Brutus, concerning matters of this nature, he spoke to him thus, as Plutarch informs us: "It is the opinion of our sect, O Brutus, that all we feel or see is not real and true; but that our senses, being apt to receive all sorts of impressions, are very treacherous; and the imagination, which is more quick and subtle, moves and varies them into all manner of ideas which have no real existence in nature, as readily as we imprint any form upon wax; so that it is easy for the soul of man, which has in itself both that which forms, and that which is formed, to vary it into what shapes it pleases. This is evident from the sudden changes of our dreams, in which the imagination, upon very slight principles, represents to us all sorts of passions of the soul, and appearances of things; for it is the nature of the mind to be in perpetual motion, and that motion is our imagination and thought. But besides all this, in our case, the body, being tired and worn out with continual labours and cares, naturally works upon the mind, and keeps it in suspense and trouble;

but that there should be any such thing as demons or spirits, or, if there were, that they should have human shape or voice, or power that can reach us, is altogether improbable, though, I confess, I could wish there were such beings, that we might not rely upon our arms only, and our horses, and our navy, but might be likewise confident of the assistance of the gods in this our most sacred and honourable attempt (52)." 'Tis true, as Cassius observes, that our imagination, when heated, may impose upon us false objects, which we see with the same certainty as if they were real; but to say, that there are no such beings as spirits, who can appear to us, speak to us, and foretel future events, is carrying this principle too far. Cassius, after insinuating that the notion of spirits is false and groundless, makes it appear, that it were to be wished there were such spirits; for in that case, they would not come to foretel to them unfortunate, but happy, events; an effectual way of removing Brutus's apprehensions: for, by this way of reasoning, be there spirits, or be there not, the phantom which Brutus imagined to see was false, and a mere illusion of the imaginative faculty of the mind.

country, told him, that there was another passage over the mountains; but that they could not go that way in less than three days, and besides would meet with no water during their march; but, if they would take water with them, he engaged to conduct them the fourth day to the river Arpeffus, which was but one day's march from the city of Philippi, by ways unknown even to the wild beasts. The soldiers took courage, provided themselves with water, and, trusting entirely to the conduct of Rhaseupolis, set out on their march, Bibulus, son-in-law to Brutus, marching with the Thracian prince in the van, and Brutus and Cassius bringing up the rear. The hardships they underwent on their rout can hardly be expressed. The fourth day they were ready to fall upon Rhaseupolis, suspecting him of treachery, when their scouts, discovering the river, signified their joy to the harassed troops with loud shouts, which were answered by the whole army, and heard even in the camp of Norbanus and Saxa, who thereupon abandoned their post, and retired in all haste to Amphipolis, for fear of being surrounded. At the same time they dispatched an express to Antony and Octavianus, acquainting them, that the enemy had passed the straits, and were advancing towards the frontiers of Macedon. Hereupon Antony, to prevent the enemy from possessing themselves of Amphipolis on the Strymon, which the triumvirs designed to make their place of arms, quitted the neighbourhood of Dyrrachium, and by long marches reached Amphipolis. His arrival was so sudden, and his march so expeditious, that Brutus and Cassius could not believe he was come, till they saw his van-guard advancing into the plains of Philippi. This city, famous for the battle which was fought here, and for the epistle which St. Paul afterwards wrote to its inhabitants, belonged, properly speaking, to Thrace, but is placed by most geographers in Macedon, pursuant to the division which obtained ever since the time of Philip the father of Alexander, who, having reduced the country lying between the Strymon, the ancient boundary of Macedon, and the Nessus or Nestus, added it to his hereditary kingdom; whence that tract was ever after looked upon as part of Macedon, and is called in the Acts the first city of part of Macedon, that is, of that part beyond the Strymon, which was added to ancient Macedon. The city of Philippi, so called from Philip the father of Alexander, who fortified it against the incursions of the Thracians, was situated on a rising ground, which abounded with springs and had on the north several hills covered with woods, on the south a marsh, which reached to the Ægean sea, on the east the straits we have mentioned above, which some writers call the straits of Topiris, others the straits of Symbolon; and on the west a large plain extending as far as the river Strymon. In this plain, at a small distance from the city, was a rising ground, and there Brutus intrenched himself, while Cassius took possession of a post equally advantageous, about three miles from Brutus's camp, and nearer the sea. They drew lines of communication from one camp to the other, and built a strong wall, which covered the interval between the two intrenchments; so that they could not have wished for a more advantageous situation, having the plains of Philippi before them, the Strymon and the marsh on their left, the straits of Topiris on their right, and behind them the sea, by which means they could be easily supplied with all manner of provisions from Asia and Sicily, which island was in the hands of young Pompey.

Antony was informed at Amphipolis of the advantageous situation of the enemy; but nevertheless, having left in that city one legion, under the command of Pinarius, he advanced boldly into the plain, and incamped in sight of the republican generals; but did not attempt any thing till the arrival of Octavianus, who came up ten days after, having been detained at Dyrrachium by a fit of sickness, which seized him the same day he landed there. And now, the two most powerful armies Rome had ever raised being in sight of each other, the world stood with dread and terror, expecting the success of a general action, which, they foresaw, would soon ensue and decide the fate of the Roman empire. The army of Brutus and Cassius consisted of nineteen legions and twenty thousand horse, and that of the triumvirs of the same number of legions, but more complete, and thirteen thousand horse; so that the forces of both parties were pretty equal: but the troops of Brutus far excelled those of the triumvirs in the richness of their apparel and arms, which were for the most part adorned with gold and silver; for tho' Brutus in other things had accustomed his soldiers to use all frugality and moderation, yet he thought, that the riches, which they carried about them in their hands and on their bodies, would inspire them with courage, and make them a them more bold in action to preserve their arms, which were in a manner their estates: This was likewise the sentiment of *Cæsar and Sertorius†, though Mithridates and other great commanders have been of a different opinion: Antony lay incamped opposite to Cassius, and Brutus to Octavianus. The latter did nothing worth relating; but Antony was continually harassing the enemy, in order to draw them to a battle; for the triumvirs forces began very soon to be straitened for want of provisions; having only Macedon and Thrace open to them, since Pompey, Murcus, and Abenobarbus had, with their several navies, cut off all communication with Africa, Spain, and Italy. But, on the other hand, Brutus and Cassius received daily supplies from Asia and Sicily, and had amassed great store of necessaries in the neighbouring city of Neapolis, and in the island of Tbasus, whence they were conveyed without the least danger to their respective camps. Antony indeed attempted to cut off their communication with the sea, by opening a passage through the marsh, which lay between them and the shore, and completed this great and bold undertaking before the enemy had notice of his design; but Cassius no sooner saw, to his great surprize, castles and turrets appearing among the reeds, than setting all hands to work, he drew a line cross the marsh, from his camp quite to the sea, and, fortifying it with towers and castles at proper distances, maintained, in spite of Antony's utmost efforts, a free and open communication with the sea and the cities on the coast. In the mean time, Thrace and Macedon being quite exhausted, the numerous troops of the triumvirs were daily more straitened for want of necessaries, with which those countries could no longer supply them. This made Antony extremely desirous of coming to a battle; which the enemy, well acquainted with the sad condition his troops were in, and which, they knew, would become every day worse, carefully avoided. Had they continued in this resolution, the triumvirs must either have marched back to Dyrrachium, and from thence returned to Italy, or attempted to force their strong intrenchments, which, in all probability, would have proved fatal to them; but Brutus soon changed his mind, and in a council of war, which consisted of all the chief officers of the army, declared, that he was for putting the whole to the issue of a general engagement, that so he might either restore Rome to her former liberty, or else deliver from their misery so many nations, who were harassed with the expences, troubles, and dangers of the war. Cassius, on the other hand, very unwilling to put all to the hazard of a battle, enlarged on the bad posture of the enemy's affairs, on their want of provisions, on the extremities to which they must be soon reduced: Their forces, said he, must moulder away of themselves: if we can but restrain for a while that unseasonable ardour which transports us, we shall see the enemy fly before us, and leave us in possession of their camp and baggage, without striking a blow. But whither can they fly? Macedon and Thessaly are drained of provisions; the seas are beset with our fleets; so that a battle is their only resource, which, indeed, as they are somewhat superiour to us in the number of men, may retrieve their affairs, and deliver them from the miseries of their present condition. Brutus yielded to these unanswerable reasons, and both generals kept close in their intrenchments, despising the bravadoes of Antony, who advanced every day with his army in battalia to the very gates of their camp; but, in the mean time, the undiscerning soldiery began to complain, and ascribe to cowardice the prudent measures of their generals; nay, they deserted in troops to the enemy, which, together with the advantages the light-horse of the republican generals had gained in several skirmishes, inclined Brutus again to venture an engagement. Cassius still opposed it, for the reasons we have alledged above (K); but most of the officers, fearing a general desertion, changed their

(K) Some writers say, he was also deterred from fighting by the following omens: at the time of lustration, one of Cassius's officers presenting him with a garland, which he was to wear at the sacrifice, gave it him with the inside outward. Some time before, at a certain solemn procession, the person who carried, according to custom, a golden image of victory before Cassius, stumbled, and fell. Many birds of prey appeared daily about the camp, and several swarms of bees, which were looked upon as a bad omen, were seen in a place within the trenches, which the soothsayers ordered to be shut out from the camp, to remove the superstition which began to prevail among the soldiery (44). These pretended prodigies, which a man of common sense would now despise, are said to have terrified and confounded Cassius himself, in spite of his Epicurean philosophy; which is a plain proof both of human frailty, and of the insufficiency of philosophy, as to the strengthening our minds against the least terrors and apprehensions.

their opinions to that of Brutus; so that a general engagement was agreed to by a great majority, to which Cassius himself yielded at last, after having solemnly declared, that he was still of a contrary opinion. Besides Cassius, one of Brutus's friends, by name Atellius, was still for putting off the engagement; and spinning out the war till the next winter. Brutus asked him, What advantage he promised himself from such a delay! If I gain nothing else, answered Atellius, yet I shall live so much the longer. This answer offended Cassius and all the officers who were present; but they all agreed, before the council broke up, to give battle the next day. Brutus that night invited his friends to an entertainment, at which he appeared very chearful and full of hope, diverting his guests with learned discourses till he went to rest. Cassius supped privately with a few of his most intimate friends; and, during the repast, appeared thoughtful and silent, contrary to his temper and custom. Valerius Messala, a young nobleman of great wit and learning who supped with him, tells us, that as Cassius rose from the table, he took him by the hand, and pressing it close in token of his good-will and affection, Bear witness for me, Messala, said he to him in Greek, that I am forced, in the same manner as Pompey the Great was before me, to expose the liberty of the Roman people to the hazard of one battle; yet we ought to take courage, relying on fortune, which it were unjust to mistrust, though we have taken bad measures. These, Messala says, were the last words Cassius spoke before he withdrew² (L).

What passed in the interview between Brutus and Cassius before the battle.

THE next morning by break of day, a scarlet coat of armour, among the Romans the signal of battle, was exposed on the tents of the two generals, who, while the troops were putting themselves in a readiness to march out of their intrenchments, met in the middle space between the two camps. Cassius, desirous to know what Brutus intended to do in case fortune should prove their enemy, addressed him at their first meeting thus: The gods grant, O Brutus, that we may now overcome our enemies, and pass the rest of our days together in repose and prosperity; but since the greatest of human concerns are the most uncertain, and since it will be very difficult for us to see one another again, if the success of the battle should not answer our expectation, tell me, what are you determined to do, to save yourself by flight, or to die? Brutus answered, When I was young, Cassius, and unskilful in affairs, I condemned Cato for laying violent hands on himself, thinking it irreligious in itself, and unworthy of a man to quit the post in which providence has placed him, and not to take and bear patiently whatever the gods are pleased to send him. But my present situation has made me alter my opinion; so that if providence shall not dispose what we now undertake according to our wishes, I am resolved to make no further attempts nor preparations for war, but to die contented with my fortune; for I sacrificed my life to the service of my country on the ides of March, in recompense for which I have ever since lived with liberty and honour². At these words Cassius smiled, and tenderly embracing him, With these noble sentiments, said he, let us advance boldly against the enemy; for either we ourselves shall conquer, or have no cause to fear those who do. After this they consulted with their friends about the order of battle. Brutus desired of Cassius, that he might command the right wing; which was readily granted him, tho' it was thought a post more fit for Cassius, in regard both of his age and experience; nay, Cassius placed Messala in the same wing, at the head of his best legions, ordering him to assist and support Brutus. While the tribunes and centurions were drawing up their men, Brutus retired for a few minutes into his tent, and wrote a letter to his friend Atticus, telling him, That his affairs were in the best state he could wish; for that either he should overcome, and restore liberty to the people of Rome,

(L) Plutarch tells us, That, in taking his leave, he invited him to sup with him the next night, being his birth-day. The ambiguous manner in which the Greek writer expresses himself, leaves it a doubt, whether Cassius invited Messala, or Messala Cassius; whether it was the birth-day of Cassius, or of Messala. Mad. Dacier has made choice of the latter construction; for Cassius, says she, pensive and gloomy as he was, must have been but little disposed to make an invitation for the next night. It must therefore have been Messala who did it on account of his birth-day, as the custom was among friends on the like occasion. But this learned lady seems here to have forgot what she must have read in Appian, who tells us in express terms, that Cassius was killed on the very day he was born (45); so that it was the birth-day of Cassius, and not of Messala. Neither was Cassius so gloomy and pensive as Mad. Dacier imagines; he was only grieved to see himself obliged to hazard a battle, when he thought himself sure of victory without running any risks.

^a or die, and be himself free from slavery. In the same letter he blamed the conduct of Antony, who, when he might have been ranked among the Bruti, the Cassii, and the Catos, had joined Octavianus; adding, that if they were not both defeated in the ensuing battle, they would soon fall out and quarrel with one another^b; which happened accordingly, as we shall see in the sequel of this history.

THE two republican generals, having drawn up their men in battalia, marched out of their intrenchments, and advanced in good order into the plain, where the army of the triumvirs waited for them in battle-array. Antony commanded the right wing, and Octavianus the left; but the latter withdrew just before the charge was given, upon a dream, which his physician, by name Artorius, had the preceding night. ^{Octavianus retires before the battle.} He dreamt that he saw a vision, which directed Octavianus to be removed out of the camp. The vision was immediately obeyed, and he conveyed away very seasonably.

^b This Octavianus himself tells us in his memoirs quoted by Plutarch, which Dion seems not to have consulted, since he writes, that Octavianus was in the action, but, like a sick person, without his armour, not being yet recovered from his former indisposition. Brutus, before he began the charge, sent to all the commanders tickets with the parole or word of battle, which, according to some, was liberty, according to others, Apollo, and rid through the ranks, exhorting his soldiers to behave with their usual bravery. They were so animated by his speech, that few of them had patience to stay for the word or command to charge; but, before it could be given, rushed

^c with loud shouts upon the enemy. This caused a great confusion in the army, the legions being scattered and separated from one another. Messala, at the head of his legions, instead of attacking the enemy in front, took a compass about, and having put some of the ranks in Octavianus's rear in disorder, and killed a small number of his men, fell upon his camp, and entered it sword in hand, made a dreadful havoc of those he found there, and cut off among the rest two thousand Lacedæmonians, who were newly come to the assistance of Octavianus. He himself had but just before

^d been conveyed away, upon the persuasion of Artorius, as we have related above; but the soldiers pierced the litter, in which he used to be carried on account of his indisposition, in many places with their darts and pikes; whence a report was spread, and for some time believed, that he was slain. In the mean time, Brutus, charging the enemy in front, easily put them to flight, as they were in great consternation for the loss of their camp, cut three whole legions in pieces on the spot, and pursued the fugitives with great slaughter, the plain being, to a great distance, strewn with dead bodies. Thus was the enemy's left wing intirely defeated by the brave Brutus, who, as Octavianus was no-where to be found, began to believe, that the republic was delivered from the worst of her tyrants. He was confirmed in this belief by some of his soldiers, who presenting themselves to him, told him, that they had killed Octavianus, shewed him their swords all bloody, and described his age and person^e. But the coward was safe enough, either in Antony's camp, or lurking in the mire of the neighbouring marsh^d. Brutus took a great many of the enemy's ensigns and three eagles.

Brutus, by engaging too far in the pursuit, left the wing, which Cassius commanded, naked and separated from the rest of the army. Hereupon Antony, who well knew how to take advantage of this oversight, charged the enemy in front, and at the same time detached some legions with orders to cross the marsh, and fall upon their flank which was left open and unguarded. The first shock was terrible; Antony, according to some writers, retired into the marsh to avoid the fury of it, and did not appear again till the enemy began to give ground. Be that as it will, both parties fought with unparalleled bravery and resolution. Antony's men, notwithstanding their utmost efforts, could make no impression upon Cassius's front; but, in the mean time, the detached legions, having opened a passage through the marsh, fell unexpectedly upon the enemy's flank, and, after a long and vigorous resistance, put them to the rout. The run-aways fled to their camp, whither the triumvir's men pursued them, and, finding it ill guarded, made themselves easily masters of it. This occasioned so general a consternation in the rest of the army, who were still maintaining their ground in the plain with great intrepidity, that first the cavalry, and afterwards the foot, began to make their escape, and fly towards the sea. Cassius on this occasion did all that could be expected from a man of courage. He returned several several times to the charge at the head of his guards and the few men he could rally, and snatching an ensign out of the hand of the standard-bearer, who fled, carried it himself; but being no longer able to keep together even his prætorian band or guards, he was forced to retire with a small number of attendants to a rising ground near the city of Philippi ^d.

In the mean time, Brutus, believing he had gained a complete victory, was leading back his troops, loaded with the plunder of Octavianus's camp, when casting his eyes upon that of Cassius, he was surprised that he could not spy any tents standing there, not even the general's, which used to appear at a great distance above the rest. Some who were about him, and had a more quick and discerning sight, acquainted him, that they distinguished a great many arms shining about his tent, and silver targets moving to and fro, which, they thought, could not belong to those who had been left to guard the camp. On the other side, there did not appear so many dead bodies about the place, as would have been after the defeat of so many legions. However, Brutus, suspecting Cassius's misfortune, left a sufficient guard in the enemy's camp, called back his troops from the pursuit, and marched with all possible expedition to the relief of his colleague, who, from the top of the hill, whither he had retired, discovered nothing as he was short-sighted, except the destruction of his camp, and even that in a confused manner; but those who were with him, acquainted him, that they saw a great body of horse moving towards him. As Cassius knew nothing of the victory and march of Brutus, he took them to be a party of the enemy sent in pursuit of him. However, he ordered out Titinius, one of his most intimate friends, to get more certain intelligence. As soon as Brutus's horse saw him, those who were his more familiar acquaintance, shouting for joy and alighting from their horses, saluted and embraced him, while the rest who knew him to be one of Cassius's chief favourites, rid round him, as it were in triumph, asked him, What news of his general? Cassius observing this, and believing the horsemen, who dismounted to embrace Titinius, had taken him prisoner, cried out, Alas! to preserve the remains of a miserable life, I have exposed my best friend to be taken by the enemy before my face. Having thus spoke, he retired into a tent with Pindarus, one of his freed-men, whom he had reserved for such an occasion ever since the unhappy battle of Carrhæ. We have no good account of what passed there; but Cassius's head was found lying severed from his body, and Pindarus never appeared afterwards, whence some suspected he had killed his master without his command ^e. Livy ^f and Plutarch ^g, in the life of Cæsar, tell us, that Cassius dispatched himself with the same dagger with which he had killed Cæsar; but all other historians, nay, Plutarch himself in the lives of Brutus and Antony, agree in the circumstances of his death, which we have related. A few minutes after Cassius's death, his attendants perceived who the horsemen were, and saw Titinius, crowned with garlands in token of Brutus's victory, making what haste he could towards them with the cavalry: but their joy was soon turned into the deepest melancholy and affliction. Titinius especially was inconsolable, when he was informed of the unfortunate mistake and death of his general. He burst into tears, and crying out, My long stay has been the occasion of his death, he drew his sword and killed himself upon the body of his friend. Brutus, upon the first advice of the defeat of Cassius, flew to his assistance; but heard nothing of his death till he came near his camp. Then shedding many tears over his body, he called him the last of the Romans, meaning thereby, that Rome would never produce another man equal to him. He caused his body to be privately conveyed to the island of Thasus, lest the celebrating of his funeral within the camp might dishearten the troops, and occasion some disorder. He then assembled the soldiers of the deceased general, comforted them, and, to make them amends for the losses they had sustained, promised to each man two thousand drachmas. Cassius was generally esteemed one of the best commanders of his age, and had given signal proofs of an extraordinary courage and consummate knowledge of the military art, in Cassius's unhappy expedition against the Parthians. He was to the very last against engaging the triumvirs, and would, in all probability, if he had lived, brought over Brutus to his opinion; which could not but prove fatal to the enemy, who were already reduced to great straits for want of provisions, and must in a short time have inevitably perished with famine. The good opinion which Brutus entertained of his honesty and virtue, and the

the elogium, with which he honoured him after his death, are a sufficient confutation of the many ill-natured reflections, with which the mercenary flatterers of the Cæsars have endeavoured to blacken his reputation and asperse his memory. It was indeed commonly said, as Plutarch informs us, that Brutus hated the tyrannical power, and Cassius only the tyrant, on account of some private grudge (M); but that writer, tho' no friend to Cassius (N), clears him from this charge, and tells us, that from his infancy he bore an irreconcilable hatred to the whole race of tyrants, whereof he gives us the following instance: when he was but a boy, and went to the same school with Faustus the son of Sylla, hearing him one day bragging of the unlimited power of his father, he rose up, and gave him two or three boxes on the ear. The relations of Faustus complained of this affront to Pompey, who thereupon summoned the two boys to appear before him; but young Cassius was so far from yielding to the remonstrances of Pompey, or giving any satisfaction to Faustus, that he threatened to strike him again, even in Pompey's presence, if he dared to utter the words which had provoked him. He was somewhat inclined to covetousness, naturally passionate, and commanded rather by fear than love. But who is without faults? Cassius in the mean meant well, and would, in all likelihood, if he had lived a little longer, have saved his country from utter ruin.

Brutus, now the sole commander of two numerous armies, thought it advisable to withdraw his troops from the camp of Octavianus, which he had taken. Antony likewise, when informed of the total overthrow of his colleague, abandoned Cassius's camp, which he did not think himself in a condition to defend against the victorious troops of Brutus; so that both armies returned to their former posts. Brutus was under the utmost concern for the loss of Cassius, having no commander of reputation to put in his room. On the other hand, the triumvirs, not yet informed of the death of Cassius, were quite out of heart, having lost above sixteen thousand of their best legionaries: whereas on the enemy's side there were not slain eight thousand men, reckoning even the sutlers and servants of the army. Besides, provisions were become very scarce in their camp, without any possible means of receiving new supplies, either by sea or land. These melancholy reflections had almost reduced them to despair, when a servant of Cassius, by name Demetrius, coming in the evening to Antony, gave him an account of the tragical end of Cassius, and at the same time delivered to him the garment, which he had taken from his master's dead body, and his sword still bloody. Antony, overjoyed at this news, immediately imparted it to his colleague; and they both agreed to draw out their men next morning by day-break, to try whether they could bring Brutus to a battle, before his men recovered themselves.

The two armies return to their former posts.

Antony and Octavianus, upon the news of the death of Cassius, endeavour in vain to draw Brutus to a second battle.

(M) Cassius pretended to have received many injuries from Cæsar. Among the rest he complained of his having taken some lions from him; for when Cassius was designed for ædile, he had caused many lions to be taken, and conducted to Megara, in order to make use of them in the shews, which, in virtue of his office, he was to exhibit to the people. But Cæsar finding them in Megara, when that city was taken by Fufius Calenus, one of his lieutenants, after the defeat of Pompey, seized them for himself. This, some writers say, was what chiefly stirred up Cassius against Cæsar; but Plutarch clears him from this imputation, as we have observed in the text. Cassius bore a private grudge to Cæsar on another account: he and Brutus stood both for the prætura urbana, or the prætorship of the city; and Cæsar is said to have given privately each of the competitors hopes of his favouring their pretensions, with a view to foment some small differences that had arisen between them on other accounts. When they came to lay their claims before Cæsar, Brutus had only the reputation of his honour and virtue to oppose to the many gallant actions, which Cassius had performed in his youth against the Parthians. However, the dictator, having heard both parties, said, in deliberating about the matter among his friends. Cassius indeed pleads with most justice; but Brutus must have the first prætorship. Accordingly the prætorship of the city was given to Brutus, and another to Cassius; but the gaining of this did not so much oblige him, as he was incensed for the loss of the other (46). Cassius, who was of a harsh and passionate temper, was, no doubt, fired against Cæsar on account of these private injuries, which, it is not improbable, contributed in some degree to the resolution he afterwards took; but what chiefly prompted him to it was, as Plutarch himself owns, his natural rancour and hatred against the whole race of tyrants (47).

(N) Plutarch was highly prejudiced against Cassius, as must evidently appear to every impartial reader, who peruses his works. This prejudice was probably owing to the severity with which the republican general used the Rhodians, a Greek nation. Cassius having taken Rhodes, says Plutarch, behaved himself there with great cruelty. But, with his leave, we cannot look upon the punishment of fifty mutiniers as an instance of cruelty. As he took the city by storm, he might, after the example of other Roman generals, put all the inhabitants whom he found in arms to the sword, but he contented himself with punishing fifty of the ringleaders. As for the wealth of the inhabitants, it belonged to him by right of war; but, as Plutarch was a Greek, the love of his country has, on several occasions, got the better of his philosophy; a proof that no man, however philosophical, can boast an intire exemption from prejudices.

themselves from the terror and consternation, which, they were well apprised, the defeat and death of Cassius must have occasioned; but Brutus, having his own camp filled with prisoners, who required a numerous guard, and finding that of Cassius in great disorder, the soldiers, who had been defeated, burning with a secret envy and indignation against those who had conquered, kept close in his intrenchments, and despised the enemy's bravadoes. As his troops, elated with their late victory, shewed a great eagerness to venture a second engagement, he assembled the soldiers of both armies, and, after having commended their valour, and slightly reproved his own men for falling upon the enemy in disorder, without waiting either for the word, or the command of their general, he enlarged on the deplorable state to which the enemy was reduced, and assured them, that if they could but restrain their ardor for a while, they would have the pleasure of seeing the armies of Antony and Octavianus either perish with famine, or, by a shameful flight, abandon Greece and Macedon. But to hazard a second battle, said he, is to put ourselves in the power of fortune, when we are sure of victory by continuing inactive in our camp. After this he caused a thousand drachmas to be given to each soldier of both camps, and dismissed them highly satisfied with the generosity of their leader, to whose orders they promised an intire obedience and submission, whether he thought proper to engage the enemy, or continue in a state of inaction^h.

The triumvirs

tion of the triumvirs affairs.

IN the mean time, provisions growing daily more scarce in the enemy's camp, Antony and Octavianus, finding they could not bring Brutus to a battle, were greatly at a loss what measures to take. All their dependence was on a fleet which they expected hourly from Italy, having on board great store of provisions, two legions of veterans, one of which was that of Mars, a prætorian cohort, and a considerable body of cavalry; but while they were comforting themselves with the hopes of the speedy arrival of this powerful supply, news was brought them, that their fleet, under the command of Cneius Domitius Calvinus, had been intirely defeated, and most of their ships, with the soldiers on board, either sunk or taken by Cneius Domitius Abenobarbus and Lucius Staius Murcus, the two admirals of the adverse party. Some of their ships indeed found means to save themselves among the rocks of the Adriatic sea; but being there blocked up by the enemy, both the soldiers and mariners, after having consumed all their provisions, were forced by famine to feed upon the sails and tackle of their ships, which they boiled with the pitch and grease they had prepared for the careening of their vessels. This victory was gained by the admirals of the republic the same day in which the battle of Philippi was fought; and the news of so great an overthrow, which soon reached the triumvirs, so disheartened them, that they now began to look upon their affairs as quite desperate, being not only straitened for want of necessaries, but without any prospect or possible means of procuring new supplies. Besides, as they were incamped in a low ground, surrounded with marshes, and a great quantity of rain, as it usually happens in autumn, had fallen after the battle, which filled their tents with mire and water, distempers began to reign in both armies, and daily carry off great numbers of men. On the other hand, Brutus had sufficient provisions to support his army for a long time, was very advantageously posted, his camp being safe from the injuries of the weather, and inaccessible to the enemy; and, as he was absolute master of the sea, he could receive whatever he stood in need of from Asia, Africa, Sicily, and Spain. The triumvirs, finding themselves in this desperate condition, left nothing unattempted which could provoke Brutus's men, and make them mutiny against their general for declining an engagement. They drew out their troops day after day, and marched in battle array up to the very gates of the enemy's camp; but Brutus, who knew that their boldness and courage proceeded from despair, kept within his intrenchments, not doubting, but he should soon see them moulder away, and, by a shameful flight, abandon both Greece and Macedon to the mercy of his troops. The triumvirs, finding they could by no means bring Brutus to a battle, detached two legions to take possession of a rising ground, which, tho' close to Cassius's camp, Brutus had thought proper to abandon after the late battle. About six hundred paces from thence, towards the sea, they posted ten legions, and two more at a small distance from them, with a design to cut off the communication between the enemy's army and fleets. On the other hand, Brutus caused several works to be carried on from his camp quite to the shore, and by that means.

means kept, in spite of all the enemy's efforts, a free communication with the sea; but as several skirmishes happened between the soldiers of the opposite parties, who covered their workmen, in which Brutus's men had all the advantage, they were so elated with this success, that they began to mutiny, and, assembling in crowds, ask their general, What cowardice he had lately observed in them, that they must be thus, like prisoners, kept within their intrenchments, and not suffered to make use of their arms, and exert that courage, which had but a few days before proved so fatal to the enemy, who now insulted them? Brutus endeavoured to satisfy them, and restrain their unseasonable ardor, by representing to them the desperate posture of the enemy's affairs, and the happy situation of their own; but all to no purpose, tho' the triumvirs forces were reduced to the utmost extremity, and a considerable body of German troops, to avoid starving in their camp, had deserted, and given the mutineers a full account of the miseries, which the want of provisions occasioned in the enemy's army; yet, by an unaccountable obstinacy and perverseness, they still persisted in demanding to be led out against the enemy, whom they desired to conquer not by famine, but valour; nay, because the prudent general refused to comply with their request, several Romans, as well as auxiliaries, abandoned him, and went over to the enemy. Among the latter were Amyntas, commander in chief of the Galatians sent by the old king Dejotarus, and Rhaseupolis, who had proved so serviceable to Brutus and Cassius on their march through Thrace. Some writers indeed say, that Rhaseupolis did not join the enemy, but returned home with the troops he commanded. Be that as it will, this desertion gave Brutus great concern, which was increased by the disorders that happened daily in Cassius's camp, whose soldiers, become headstrong and intractable since the death of their general, refused to obey the officer whom Brutus had put in his room. In these circumstances Brutus yielded at last to the importunity of his soldiers, and resolved to put an end to his own cares and those of the Roman world, by a general and decisive action; which, all the antients tell us, he would never have done, had he been informed of the late advantage gained by his fleet; but of that important victory he received no intelligence till twenty days after, that is, till the very evening before the fight. This some writers ascribe to the negligence, others to the treachery, of his officers, but Plutarch to providence, which, as the state of Rome, says he, now necessarily required a monarchy, prevented Brutus from receiving notice of his good success, that it might remove the only man who was able to resist the person whom destiny had appointed to be the sole governor of the Roman state (O). However that be, the evening before the battle, when it was too late for Brutus to alter his measures, one Caius Clodius, a deserter from the enemy, came to acquaint the republican general, that the triumvirs had received advice of the loss of their fleet, and for that reason were in such haste to come to a battle. But the intelligence he brought met with no credit; nay, Brutus would not so much as admit him to his presence, taking it for granted, that he had invented the news to please him, and bring himself into favour.

Brutus's troops begin to mutiny, and demand to be led out against the enemy.

Brutus yields to the importunity of the soldiery.

AND now Brutus, determined to put the whole to the issue of a general action, found himself obliged to use violence to his good-nature, and take a precaution, which, tho' necessary, may seem not altogether free from the reproach of cruelty. He had taken in the late battle a great number of prisoners, partly slaves and partly freemen, who required a numerous guard, which he could not well spare. As Antony therefore and Octavianus had ordered all their prisoners, without distinction, to be inhumanly massacred, Brutus, having reason to suspect that the slaves he had taken were tampering with his soldiers, commanded them all to be slain. Though they deserved to die, and their death was but a kind of retaliation upon the enemy, yet

(O) For the empire, says Mad. Dacier, was no longer able to support itself. It was necessary for it to come under the dominion of a single person. So long as there were so many competitors on foot, so many pretenders either to the empire or the royalty, that competition would have been an inexhaustible source of civil war and dissention; and nothing was more incompatible with monarchy than Brutus. Brutus therefore was to be removed. All this, adds this learned writer, strongly proves the truth of Plato's sentiments, who maintains, that of all governments monarchy is the most perfect; but then the monarch must govern according to law. So far we agree with Mad. Dacier. But is it to be left to the monarch to govern, or not to govern, by law, as he thinks fit? Is he to have nothing but his own will and inclination to restrain him? Is mankind to depend for security and happiness upon uncertain inclinations? This surely is wide of the opinion of so wise a philosopher as Plato, who, in preferring monarchy to all other governments, could not mean by monarchy a power without controul.

yet the flatterers of the Cæsars have, with great partiality and injustice, made long descants on this pretended act of cruelty, without taking notice of his clemency towards the freemen and Roman citizens. Of these he openly dismissed great numbers, telling them, That with the enemy they were captives and slaves; but with him freemen and citizens of Rome. Others he concealed himself, and helped to escape privately, perceiving that some of his commanders and friends were implacably bent upon their destruction. Among the captives was one Volumnius a mimic, and Sacculio a buffoon, who, by their unseasonable jests, of which Brutus took no manner of notice, provoked some of the chief officers of his army. These brought them before their general, and accused them of not being able, even in their present situation, to refrain from their abusive jests and scurrilous language. Brutus, having his mind taken up with other affairs, returned no answer to the accusation; but Messala Corvinus was of opinion, that they should be whipt publicly upon a scaffold, and, after that ignominious punishment, be sent back naked to Antony and Octavianus, which, he thought, would reflect no small dishonour on those two generals, who were not ashamed to chuse such scoundrels for their bottle-companions. At this some who were present laughed; but Publius Casca, who gave the first wound to Cæsar, It does not become us, said he with a serious air, to be thus merry after the loss of Cassius. And as for you, O Brutus, you will shew what respect you bear to the memory of your fellow commander, by punishing or pardoning those who cannot forbear scoffing and speaking abusively of him. Why then, Casca, replied Brutus, do you tell me of this, and not do yourself what you think proper? This answer was taken for his consent to the death of those unhappy wretches, who were accordingly carried away and slain^k.

Brutus, having got rid of most of his prisoners, assembled his soldiers the day before the battle, and, in order to rouse their courage, promised them the pillage of Theffalonica and Lacedamon, two cities which had sided with the triumvirs. This, in the opinion of Plutarch, is the only inexcusable fault which Brutus was ever guilty of; for, if in the end Antony and Octavianus, says that writer, were much more cruel in the rewards they gave their soldiers after victory; if they drove out almost all the antient inhabitants of Italy, to put their soldiers in possession of their lands and cities; it is well known, that their only design and end in undertaking the war was, to obtain dominion and empire: but the great opinion the world had conceived of Brutus on account of his virtue, would not allow him either to conquer the enemy, or save himself, but by means truly just and honourable, especially after the death of Cassius, who was generally accused of putting Brutus upon several actions, not intirely agreeable to his mild and generous temper. But after all, Plutarch entertained so great an opinion of Brutus's virtue, good-nature, and integrity, that he could not prevail upon himself to believe, that he made this promise of his own motion; but thinks he was in a manner forced to it by his officers, according to whose advice he both did and said many things, contrary to the bent of his own inclination, especially in whatever he thought might conduce to the bringing of Cassius's soldiers into better order, who were become bold and insolent in the camp after the death of their general, but in the field cowardly and fearful, remembering, that they had suffered themselves to be shamefully overcome^l.

Brutus, having encouraged his men with promises of ample rewards after the victory, and made the necessary preparations for the next day's engagement, retired late in the night to his tent, when the spectre, which had promised to meet him at Philippi, is said to have appeared to him again, in the same shape as it had done before, but to have vanished in an instant, without one single word being uttered on either side; but Publius Volumnius, a man given to the study of philosophy, who was then in Brutus's camp, and wrote an account of several other prodigies, which he supposed to have happened before this great battle (P), makes no mention of this appa-apparition^m. Be that as it will, Brutus, without taking the least notice of this or any other prodigies, drew out his men the next morning, with a firm resolution of restoring liberty to his country, or dying in the attempt. He chose his ground like an able general, forming his lines at a small distance from his camp, that he might have a safe retreat, in case of any misfortune. Then riding through the ranks, Fellow-soldiers, said he, you have desired to engage the enemy in the open field, when you might have obtained a complete victory, by continuing inactive within your intrenchments; but this kind of victory you despised, as not honourable enough for men of your bravery; you are for purchasing glory at the expence of your blood. It is therefore now incumbent upon you to summon all that boldness, with which you demanded battle, to maintain the honour of your first victory, and to answer the trust which I have reposed in your valour. Whether Rome is to enjoy an uninterrupted happiness and liberty, or be condemned to eternal slavery and endless calamities, this day will decide. As for Antony and Octavianus, they could scarce believe their own eyes; when they first observed a coat of arms, the usual signal of battle, exposed on Brutus's tent. Overjoyed at this unexpected resolution, they ordered their men to prepare for battle; but did not quit their intrenchments before three in the afternoon, when they marched out like famished lions, as Appian expresses it, against their prey. Their generals, the more to encourage them, promised to each soldier five hundred drachmas after the victory, painting to them at the same time in most lively colours the inexpressible miseries and calamities, which they must unavoidably endure, if overcome. You have but two things to chuse, said they, to conquer, or perish by the most miserable of all deaths, famine. Having thus spoke, they ordered their men to advance with a slow pace against the enemy, who kept their ground ready to receive them. When the two armies were in presence of each other, Brutus had the mortification to see a brave knight, by name Cumulatus, whom he highly esteemed for his valour, abandon his post, and riding close by him, go over to the enemy. Hereupon Brutus, fearing others might follow the example of the treacherous knight, caused the signal of battle to be given immediately, and charged the enemy's left wing, commanded by Octavianus, with such intrepidity, vigor, and resolution, that all gave way before him. As Octavianus's cavalry was put into the utmost disorder at the very first onset, Brutus's horse broke in among the enemy's foot, and made a most dreadful havock of the legionaries. But while the brave Brutus was thus signalising himself in the right wing, his left, commanded by the lieutenants of Cassius, men no-ways equal to that charge, was hard pressed by Antony. Cassius's cavalry immediately gave way, leaving the flank of the wing, in which they were posted, naked and unguarded. Hereupon the foot, fearing to be incompassed, widened their ranks to the right and left, that they might make head every way; but as this weakened them, they were at the first onset broken and disordered by the close battalions of Antony. The plain was in an instant covered with the runaways scattered up and down, some of them making towards the camp, others flying to the sea-side, but most of them repairing to the right wing to take shelter among the victorious troops of Brutus. Antony did not pursue the fugitives; but, like an experienced general, marched directly against Brutus, and fell upon his rear with incredible fury. That brave commander performed on this occasion all that could be expected from an expert general and valiant soldier, giving proofs in the greatest danger of a courage and conduct, which well deserved to be crowned with victory; but Cassius's troops, which were overthrown in the left wing, crouding in among his ranks, and carrying with them, where-ever they came, despair and confusion, turned the scale in favour of the enemy, after Brutus had, for a long time, maintained his ground, with unparalleled bravery, against all the forces of their united armies. His lines were at length broke and put into disorder, notwithstanding all he could do to rally them. He attempted several times to bring them back to the charge; but all his endeavours proved unsuccessful, Cassius's men, who were terrified with their own defeat, communicating their fear to the rest of the army. Brutus stood his ground with the few men he could rally; but, being furrounded on all sides and overpowered by the numerous forces of Antony and Octavianus, was in imminent danger of being either cut in pieces, or falling alive into the hands of his most inveterate enemies. And on this occasion it was, that most of Brutus's best officers were killed in endeavouring to save their general, who, with their assistance, breaking through the enemy's battalions, that surrounded them; withdrew, when abandoned by his men, from the field of battle. Among the few who attended him was one Lucilius Lacinus, an intimate friend of his, who observing a body of Thracian horse, under the command of Rhaseus, the brother of Rhaseupolis, taking no notice of any other in the pursuit, but making directly towards Brutus, resolved to stop them, and save the life of his general, at the hazard of his own. Accordingly, without acquainting Brutus with his design, he halted, till the Thracians came up and surrounded him. Then he cried out that he was Brutus, and, begging quarters, desired they would carry him to Antony, pretending that he feared Octavianus, but durst trust him. The Thracians, overjoyed with their prey, and thinking themselves wonderfully happy, immediately detached some of their own body to acquaint Antony with their good fortune; and in the mean time giving over the pursuit, returned to the field of battle with their prisoner. The report being spread in an instant all over the army, that Brutus was taken, and that the Thracians were bringing him alive to Antony, both soldiers and officers flocked together from all parts to see him. Some pitied his misfortune, others accused him of a meanness unbecoming his former glory, for suffering himself, out of too much love of life, to be a prey to barbarians. As for Antony, he was not a little concerned at this adventure, being quite at a loss in what manner he should receive, and how he should treat, his illustrious captive: but he was soon delivered from his uneasiness; for as the Thracians drew near, he knew the prisoner, who had passed himself upon the Thracians for Brutus, and now addressing the triumvir with a generous confidence; Be assured, Antony, said he, that no enemy either has, or ever shall take Marcus Brutus alive. Forbid it ye gods, that fortune should ever prevail so much above virtue! But let him be found dead or alive, he will certainly be found in such a state as is worthy of him. As for me, I have delivered myself up to save him, and am now ready to suffer whatever torments you think proper to inflict upon me, without demanding or expecting any quarter. Antony, wonderfully taken with the fidelity, virtue, and generosity of Lucilius, turned to the Thracians, now sensible of, and enraged at, their disappointment, and addressed them thus: I perceive, my fellow-soldiers, that you are concerned, and full of resentment, for having been thus imposed upon by Lucilius; but be assured, that you have met with a booty better than that which you sought for; you were in search of an enemy, and have brought me a friend. I was truly at a loss how I should have used Brutus, if you had brought him to me alive; but of this I am sure, that it is better to have such a man as Lucilius our friend than our enemy. Having thus spoke, he embraced Lucilius, and commended him to the care of one of his friends. Such a generous behaviour won the heart of Lucilius, who ever after continued inviolably attached to the interest of his friend and benefactor. After this both Antony and Octavianus marched with their victorious legions in pursuit of the enemy's broken and dispersed forces, making a dreadful slaughter of the fugitives, and strewing the whole plain with dead bodies. Some of Brutus's officers, not caring to outlive the liberty of their country, would neither fly nor give ground; but died sword in hand in the posts assigned them. Among these were Marcus, the son of the great Cato; L. Cassius, nephew to the deceased general; C. Flavius, one of Brutus's best friends; Marcus, the son of Lucullus who conquered Mithridates the Great; Demetrius, Apollonides, and several other commanders of great distinction. Young Cato distinguished himself on this occasion in a very eminent manner; for after the body he commanded was put to the rout, he returned several times to the charge with the few forces he could rally, overthrew all who opposed him, and declaring who he was, and often repeating his father's name, fell at last upon a heap of dead bodies of the enemy, whom he sacrificed to the manes of his father and the expiring republic. Such a behaviour was very surprising in a man of young Cato's character; for, degenerating from the virtue of his father, he had, to that time, led an idle, indolent, and debauched life; but the glory he acquired by his death has recommended him to posterity, as a worthy son of so great a father.

ed to Brutus
after the loss of the battle.

As for Brutus, the contrivance of Lucilius gave him an opportunity of passing a little brook, encompassed with rocks, and shaded with trees. Being there overtaken by the night, he stopped in a hollow place at the foot of a great rock, being attended with a small number of his friends and officers. There lifting up his eyes to heaven, he repeated two Greek verses, one of which Volumnius, who attended him, forgot, but rememremembered the other, which was the following out of the Medea of Euripides; Punish, great Jove, the author of these ills; by which it was thought he meant Antony, who remembered and repeated it, when, after the battle of Actium, he was reduced to the necessity of laying violent hands on himself. Afterwards Brutus named severally all his friends, who had been slain in the battle before his face, and fetched a deep sigh, especially at the mentioning of Flavius and Labeo, whereof one was his lieutenant, and the other master of his workmen. In the mean time, one of his followers, who was very thirsty, and saw Brutus in the same condition, ran to the brook, and brought him some water in his helmet. While he was drinking, a noise being heard from the other side of the rivulet, Volumnius, taking Dardanus, Brutus's armour-bearer, with him, went out to discover what had occasioned it. They both returned soon after; but finding no water, asked what was become of it; It is all drank, replied Brutus smiling; but you shall have some more fetched immediately. But he, who had brought the first water, being sent again, narrowly escaped falling into the enemy's hands, by whom he was dangerously wounded. Brutus, understanding by this that he was invested, exhorted those who were with him to make some attempt to get to their camp before day-light; for he conjectured, that he had not lost many of his men, and that those who had escaped had taken refuge there. Statilius undertook to pass through the enemy, and go by himself to the camp, promising, if it was not taken, to hold up a lighted torch for a signal, and return immediately. Statilius got safe to the camp, and held up the torch, which gave Brutus some hopes of retrieving his affairs. He waited a long time for the return of Statilius, saying, If Statilius be alive, he will come back; but he was slain on his return by the enemy. At length Brutus, tired with waiting, and day now beginning to dawn, whispered something in the ear to one of his domestics, by name Clytus, who returned him no answer, but burst into tears. Hereupon, Brutus, taking aside Dardanus his armour-bearer, had some discourse with him in private, and afterwards addressed himself to Volumnius in Greek, conjuring him, by their common studies and antient friendship, to draw his sword and put an end to his life. Volumnius, and after him several others, answered him only with their tears. One of them, to divert Brutus from the thoughts of laying violent hands on himself, starting up, There is no staying here any longer, said he; we must all fly. Yes, answered Brutus, we must fly indeed, not with our feet, but with our hands. Then taking each of them by the hand, told them with a cheerful countenance, That it was an infinite satisfaction to him to find, that none of his friends had proved false to him; that he did not complain of fortune for his own, but for his country's sake; that as for himself, he thought he was much more happy than those who had conquered, not only in regard of what was passed, but even in his present condition, since he should enjoy that reputation, which always follows virtue, and which tyranny and injustice could never deserve (Q). Having thus spoke, he beseeched his friends to provide for their own safety, telling them, That he hoped Antony and Octavianus, satisfied with his death, would pursue their revenge no further. He then withdrew, with two or three only of his peculiar friends. Among these was an Epirote, by name Strato, with whom he had contracted an acquaintance when they studied rhetoric together. To him Brutus had recourse, conjuring him, by their antient friendship, to give him the last proof of his affection, by performing that friendly office which the others had declined. As Strato could not by any means be prevailed upon to imbrue his hands in the blood of his friend, Brutus called one of his slaves; and then the faithful Epirote, crying out, Forbid, ye gods, it should ever be said, that Brutus died by the hand of a slave for want of a friend, covered his eyes with his left arm, and presented the point of his sword to Brutus, who threw himself upon it with such violence, that it pierced him through, and he expired immediately. Some historians relate the circumstances of his death otherwise, and tell us, that taking his sword by the hilt with both his hands, he fell upon the point of it, and ran himself through, without the assistance of his faithful friend Strato. But all authors agree in this, that Messala, having some time after made his peace with Cæsar Octavianus, presented Strato to him, saying with tears in his eyes, This, O Cæsar, is the man who paid the last friendly office to my beloved Brutus.

(Q) Some writers tell us, that when Brutus in the morning saw no way of escaping, he cried out, O unhappy virtue! I followed thee as a solid good, but thou art only a mere notion, a vain empty name, or at best a slave of fortune (49). But Volumnius, who was present, and from whose memoirs Plutarch copied the particulars of his death which we have related, makes no mention of such a speech, no-ways suitable to the character of Brutus.

Thus fell Brutus in the forty-third year of his age (R), and with him fell the liberty of Rome and of the Roman people. He was a man, in whom the malice of his enemies could discern no fault (S); in whom the virtues of humanity were eminent; in whom the constant, firm, and inviolable attachment to the public good (T) formed the principal and most distinguishable part of his character, and the uninterrupted business of his life, ever in view, ever pursued; but from the inherent equity of his mind, for he was, as his historian well observes, by nature exactly framed for virtue (U), without one breach of that never to be omitted distinction of fas and nefas, right and wrong. And here it may not be altogether foreign to our purpose

(R) Brutus died, according to Velleius Paterculus, in the thirty-seventh year of his age; but to the authority of Velleius we prefer that of Cicero, who tells us, that Brutus was born ten years after Hortensius appeared first at the bar; and that celebrated orator made his first public essay of eloquence in the consulate of Lucius Crassus and Quintus Scævola, in the year of Rome 658; so that Brutus was born in the year of the city 668, and consequently was, at the time of his death, which happened in 711, in the forty-third year of his age (49).

(S) Those who were most his enemies, says Plutarch (50), on account of his conspiracy against Cæsar, if in that whole affair there was any honourable and generous action done, refer it wholly to Brutus, and lay whatever was barbarous and cruel to the charge of Cassius, Brutus's most intimate and familiar friend; but not at all like him in honesty and virtue. Upon which words Madam Dacier comments thus: It appears from this passage, that even in the days of Plutarch, there were some remaining, who hated the memory of Brutus, for the share he had in the murder of Cæsar; and I am of opinion, that the same hatred continues, and will do so to the end of the world. Among slaves, she ought to have added, and persons brought up in slavish principles, who are taught to look upon the disarming of a tyrant, and the saving of their country from havock and oppression, as an heinous crime; but the memory of that truly virtuous and generous patriot will be, to the end of the world, revered by all, who have any spark of zeal for the welfare of their country and the good of mankind.

(T) The public good was, as Plutarch observes, the only end and standard, which he proposed for his hatred and friendship. This of an enemy made him a friend to Pompey, and of a friend made him an enemy to Cæsar. When Cæsar and Pompey took up arms against each other, it was generally believed that he would have taken Cæsar's side; for his father not long before had been put to death by Pompey: but he, thinking it his duty to prefer the interest of the public to his private resentment, and judging Pompey's to be the better cause, took part with him, tho' formerly he used not so much as to salute him, or take any notice of him, deeming it a great crime to have the least conversation with the murderer of his father. But afterwards, looking upon him as the general of his country, he listed himself under his command, and set sail to Sicily, in quality of lieutenant to Sestius, whom Pompey had appointed governor of that island; but finding no opportunity there of exerting his zeal for the good of his country, and hearing that Cæsar and Pompey were incamped near one another and would come to a battle, upon which the whole empire depended, he hastened into Macedon to share in the danger. Pompey was so surprised at his arrival, and at the same time so pleased, that rising from his tribunal, in the sight of all his guards, he saluted and embraced him, as one of the chiefest men of his party. Thus Brutus embraced the party even of his father's murderer, because he thought it more just than that of Cæsar, and considered Pompey as the head of the state, of which Cæsar was the declared enemy. The same consideration of the public good, which reconciled him to Pompey, estranged him from Cæsar, notwithstanding the innumerable favours he had received at his hands. And what can be more generous, more heroic, for a man, than to sacrifice his highest obligations, as well as his greatest injuries, to the welfare of his country?

(U) "Brutus, says the author of his life, for the sake of his virtue, was esteemed by the people, beloved by his friends, admired by all good men, and hated by none, no, not even by his enemies; for he was of an extraordinary mild nature, great magnanimity, insensible of the passions of anger, pleasure, or covetousness; steady and inflexible in his opinion, and zealous for whatever he thought just and honest. That which gained him the greatest credit and reputation among the people was, their inviolable opinion of his uprightness and integrity in all his undertakings; whereas no man ever imagined, that Pompey, even Pompey the Great himself, if he had overcome Cæsar, would have submitted his power to the laws, but would have retained the sovereign authority in his own hands, under the specious name of consul or dictator, or some other mild and more popular title, with which he would have soothed the people. As for Cassius, a man inclined to passion, and carried often by his covetous humour beyond the bounds of justice, they well knew, that he endured all these hardships rather to obtain dominion to himself, than liberty to the people. As to the former disturbers of the peace of Rome, whether a Cinna, a Marius, or a Garbo, it is manifest, that they, having set their country as a stake for him who should win, did almost own, in express terms, that they fought for empire. But even the enemies of Brutus cannot lay this accusation to his charge; nay, many have heard Antony himself say, That Brutus was the only man who conspired against Cæsar out of a sense of the glory of the action; but that all the rest rose up against the man, and not the tyrant, from their own private malice and envy (51)." In this passage Plutarch does justice to Brutus's virtue; but at the same time betrays his prejudice against Cassius, the motives of which we have assigned elsewhere (52). What a high opinion Cicero had of Brutus's virtue, the orator sufficiently declares in the following word: Bruto certe meo nullo loco deero, idque etiam si mihi cum illo nihil fuisset, facerem propter ejus singularem incredibilemque virtutem.

to illustrate this transcendent rectitude of his mind, by instancing his refusal, contrary to the opinion of Cicero and his other friends, to employ the arts of oratory in gilding even the fairest cause, when, after the death of Cæsar, he addressed himself to the Roman people. It cannot be supposed, that Brutus, who had long been famed for eloquence (W), could be ignorant of speaking to the passions of men, an art too successfully made use of by Antony on the same occasion. Such then was the integrity of Brutus's mind, that he could not stoop to employ any indecent means even in the pursuit of virtue. The death of Cæsar was undoubtedly justifiable under the government which then prevailed in Rome (X), notwithstanding all the dirt that has been thrown

(W) Plutarch tells us in his life, that in Latin he was a good speaker, and had, by constant exercise, attained a sufficient excellence in making public orations and pleading causes; but in Greek he was remarkable for affecting the sentiments and short Laconic way of speaking, especially in his epistles, a collection of which has been published by Aldus in Greek, and by Ranutius Florentius in Latin. Plutarch instances three of them, the first whereof he wrote in the beginning of the war to the Pergamenses, or inhabitants of Pergamus, thus: I hear you have given Dolabella money; if you gave it willingly; you must own you have injured me; if unwillingly; shew it by giving willingly to me. The second inscribed in the Greek copy to the Bithynians; in the Latin to the Galatians, and in Plutarch to the Samiens, is couched in the following terms: Your deliberations are tedious, your actions slow; what do you think will be the end? The third was to the Rhodiens, thus: The Xanthians, suspecting my kindness, have made their country their grave of despair. The Patarense, who have submitted to me, have lost nothing of their former liberty. It is in your power to chuse the opinions of the Patarense, or the fortune of the Xanthians (53). This epistle is likewise exhibited by Velleius Paterculus, but in a more diffused style (54). The speech which Brutus made before Cæsar at Nice, the capital of Bithynia, in behalf of Deiotarus king of Galatia, is commended by Cicero (55), and the author of the dialogue on the Latin orators, which is commonly ascribed to Tacitus. Tho' the king was charged with crimes of a high and dangerous nature, yet the eloquence of Brutus was so prevalent, that he preserved to him great part of his kingdom. The liberty and vehemence with which he spoke on this occasion, gave rise to that memorable saying of Cæsar concerning him, as Cicero relates it in the first letter of his fourth book to Atticus: De quo quidem ille ad quem divertit, Cæsarem solitum dicere, Magni refert hic quid velit, sed quidquid volt, valde volt. Idque cum animadvertisse cum pro Deiotaro Niceæ dicere, valde eum vehementer & libere dicere. And truly the natural firmness of his mind, as his historian observes (56); when once set on foot by the motives of right reason, and the principles of honesty, which way soever it turned itself, moved with great vigor and impetuosity, and generally effected its designs.

Brutus was, as we have observed above, a good orator; but, as he had made choice of the concise and grave style (57), he judged Cicero's eloquence to want strength (58); and Cicero on the other hand thought his style negligent and unconnected (59). Brutus's style had another fault; it was often crouded with verses. Versus hi fere excidunt, says Quintilian, quos Brutus ipso componendi ductus studio sæpiissime facit (60). Cicero acknowledges, that Brutus very freely found fault with his taste in point of style (61); but nevertheless that orator was highly pleased with the harangue which Brutus made on the death of Cæsar; Est autem oratio, says he, speaking of this piece, after he had perused it with great attention, scripta elegantissime, sententiis, verbis, ut nihil possit ultra (62).

Brutus was not only a good orator, but an excellent philosopher. Of all the sects of the Greek philosophers, there was not one of which he had not been a hearer; and in which he had not made some proficiency; but he chiefly esteemed the Platonists; and applied himself wholly to the study of the ancient academy (63). He was likewise well acquainted with all the branches of polite literature, and wrote several books, viz. one de officiis, cited by Charisius and Priscian, without all doubt the same which Seneca calls περί καθήκοντος (64); another de virtute, mentioned by Cicero (65) and Seneca (66); and a third de patientia, quoted by Dionmedes. He abridged the Roman history of Fannius (67), and that of Antipater (68); but whether he finished the abridgment of Polybius's history, which he had undertaken, we know not; for Plutarch (69) only tells us, that the day before the great battle of Pharsalia, while the others were taken up with the thoughts of the next day's action, Brutus spent his whole time, till the evening, in writing that epitome. He likewise composed a panegyric on Cato, which Cæsar did not think extraordinary well penned (70).

(X) By the laws of Rome, the dominion of one, and consequently the dominion of Cæsar, was tyranny; and any man was warranted to kill the tyrant: eum jus fasque esset occidi, neve ea cædes capitalis noxa haberetur. The only reason that can be alledged against killing Cæsar is, that the state was irretrievable, and a usurper become a necessary evil. This argument Seneca urges against the enterprize of Brutus and his followers (71). But Brutus, Cicero, and the senate, that is, the greatest and wisest men in Rome, judged otherwise, and who was better qualified to judge? Nay, liberty was for some time actually restored; why it subsisted no longer, was owing to casualties, and to the treachery of Octavianus, who, after he was emperor, thought it possible to resettle the old free state, and proposed once or twice to resign. Drusus, his wife's son, was of the same opinion, and declared his resolution to effect it. Cæsar himself might, by his dictatorial power, have suppressed the insolence of particulars, revived the force of the laws, and reduced the commonwealth to her first principles. This would have been true glory, the only right use of his absolute power, and the only amends for having assumed it; but, instead of this, he continued more and more to debauch the people, and trample upon the most sacred laws of his country. Liberty and the republic were a jest to him; he treated the very name with contempt; nihil esse rempublicam; appellationem modo sine corpore ac specie (72). He ridiculed Sylla for resigning his usurped power; he had nothing thrown at this transaction by the mean and grovelling abettors of arbitrary power. We may see what the Romans, and Tully, the least adventurous of men, thought of this action, by a passage in one of his letters to his friend Atticus, bemoaning the misfortunes of the times; where he says, But notwithstanding the cloud that hangs over us, I console myself in the ides of March. Our heroes have done every thing within their power, and with a resolution by which they have acquired immortal glory. Nor was the putting the destroyer of their constitution and liberties to death, by violent hands, without precedent in the Roman history (Y). And as to the method they made choice of, it appears adequate to the dignity of the action; for who more proper to compass such an event, than a number of senators distinguished by their attachment to liberty? or what place could be more justly fixed on for the tyrant of Rome to expire in, than that dictatorial chair, which he possessed in violation of the laws of his country? We often see the love of one's country the bent and inclination of very different men, influenced either by passion, acrimony of temper, vanity, resentment, a lust of power, or any other inducement: nor were all those, who joined in that glorious cause, altogether free from such suspicions; for an uniform, steady, constant attachment to the public good was to be met with in Brutus alone. Men generally differ from themselves as much as from one another; Brutus was always the same. If we have dwelt too long in considering the virtues of this great man, the mighty excellence of his character and his inviolable attachment to the public cause may plead our excuse. We are not only indebted to history for the enlargement of our minds, but likewise for the improvement of our moral virtues; and to an Englishman the foremost of the rank in the pursuit of liberty. Who then more properly can become the object of our contemplation than Brutus, the genius of liberty?

The generosity of Antony, and cowardly spite of Octavianus.

LET us now return to the plains of Philippi. Antony, being informed the next day of the death of Brutus, flew to the place where the body still lay, beheld it with grief and tears, cast his purple mantle of a great value over it, and charged one of his freedmen to take care of the funeral of the illustrious deceased. Some time after, being told that the servant had not burnt the mantle with the corpse, and had detained part of the money which was to be expended in the funeral, he ordered him to be put to death. Octavianus, who had not greatness of soul enough for such generous humanity, could not forbear shewing a cowardly spite to the dead body of Brutus, before whom he had a little before fled for his life. He caused the head of that excellent person nothing in his head or heart but absolute rule, a diadem, the title of king, and controuling the world according to his lust; nullos non honores ad libidinem cepit & dedit, spreto patriæ more; nay, he would have his very words to go for laws, debere homines pro legibus habere quæ dicat (73). He was therefore lawfully slain, tho' not by the forms of law, which his usurped power had rendered impossible. Abusus dominatione & jure cæsus existimaretur, says Suetonius (74).

(Y) Nor in Brutus's family; for his mother Servilia was of the family of Servilius Ahala, who slew Spurius Manlius, as we have related elsewhere, for stirring the people up to a rebellion, and aspiring at the sovereign power. The famous dictator Quintus Cincinnatus, whose general of the horse he was, commended the zeal of Servilius, and approved of the action (75). Whether Brutus was descended from the celebrated Junius Brutus, who expelled Tarquin the Proud, is uncertain. Dionysius of Halicarnassus maintains, not out of any prejudice to Brutus, that he was not descended from him. This, says he, is the opinion of those historians, who have examined the affairs of the Romans with the greatest exactness (76). Dion positively affirms, that none of the race of Junius Brutus was left after the execution of his two sons (77). On the other hand, Plutarch tells us, that Junius Brutus had a great many children by a sister of the Vitellii (78); and adds, upon the authority of the philosopher Pseudo-manius, that two indeed of Brutus's sons, who had attained to man's estate, were, by their father's order, put to death; but that a third, yet an infant, was left alive, from whom the family was propagated down to Marcus Brutus. The same philosopher writes, that in his time there were several famous persons of the family of M. Brutus, and of his own acquaintance, who very much resembled the statue of Junius Brutus (79). Cicero likewise in his Philippians speaks of our Brutus as descended from L. Brutus; L. Brutus was the man, says he, who both himself freed the commonwealth from the sovereignty of kings, and has now, almost five hundred years after, propagated descendants, famed for the like virtue and the like achievement (80). And elsewhere (81): If leaders were wanting to free our country, I would stir up the Brutuses, who both daily behold the image of L. Brutus, and one of them that of Ahala also. Should these men therefore, descended from such ancestors, ask counsel of strangers, rather than of their own family, abroad rather than at home? But after all, Cicero, who speaks here as an orator, and not as an historian, is not a proper evidence to invalidate the testimony of Dionysius of Halicarnassus and Dion. An orator little cares whether such facts be certain or not; it is enough for him, if the facts he relates be believed by the greater part of the people. Nothing can be with any certainty determined on this head; but, all things well considered, we are inclined to prefer the authority of Dion, and of Dionysius, a most accurate writer, to that of Cicero and Plutarch.

a person to be cut off, and charged one of his friends to carry it to Rome, and there lay it ignominiously at the feet of Cæsar's statue^p; but in the passage from Dyrrachium, a violent storm arising, it was, probably out of superstition, thrown into the sea^q. The rest of the body was burnt by Antony's orders, and the ashes conveyed in an urn to Servilia, Brutus's mother. As for Porcia his wife, Valerius Maximus and Nicolaus, the Peripatetic philosopher, tell us, that being resolved not to outlive her husband, but so narrowly watched by her friends, that she could neither make use of poison or a dagger, she snatched some burning coals out of the fire, and shutting them close in her mouth, stifled herself; and expired in the arms of the women who watched her^r. But we have a great deal of reason to look upon this account as fabulous, since Plutarch assures us^t, that, in his time, was still extant a letter of Brutus to his friends, wherein he lamented the death of Porcia, and complained of them for suffering her to die of melancholy; so that the history of the live-coals, which has been the subject of a fine epigram^u. is no better than a fable.

The death of Porcia.

THE death of Brutus was no sooner known in his camp, than those who had retired thither, to the number of fourteen thousand men, submitted upon honourable terms to the two victorious generals. Others fled into the island of Thasus, and from thence escaped into Asia. Antony and Octavianus found in Brutus's camp great store of arms and provisions, and immense sums of money, which enabled them to satisfy immediately some of their veterans, whom they disbanded soon after the battle, being glad to get rid of men, who, proud of their victory, began to usurp an authority even over their generals. By this famous overthrow the triumvirs established, on the ruins of the republic, the authority they had usurped, and became masters of the whole Roman empire, Sicily alone excepted, which was still held by Sextus, the son of Pompey the Great; but the opposition they met with from him was not very considerable, as we shall see in the following chapter.

Many of Brutus's men submit to the conquerors.

C H A P. XVI.

The history of Rome, from the death of Brutus and Cassius to the perfect settling of the empire by Octavianus.

d THE first days after the battle were spent by the triumvirs, in punishing such of their enemies, as had the misfortune to fall into their hands. Antony, after having reproached Hortensius with the death of his brother Caius, of whom we have spoken above, caused him to be slain on his tomb. He likewise put Varro, an illustrious senator, to death, who had on all occasions betrayed an irreconcilable hatred to him, and could not forbear reproaching the triumvir, even when he was in his power, with his debauched and scandalous life, which, he said, he would one day end with an unhappy and tragical death. Livius Drusus, the father of that Livia who was afterwards married to Augustus, not caring to outlive the liberty of his country, laid violent hands on himself in his tent. Quintilius Varus, after having adorned himself with all the ensigns of the honours and dignities he had borne, chose rather to die by the hands of his freedmen, than to be exposed to the insults of a merciless enemy. Octavianus on this occasion betrayed a cruelty unworthy of a Roman, which some of his flatterers endeavour to excuse, by ascribing it, not to the natural bent of his temper, but

but to the long and tedious indisposition, which had soured his humour. However that be, it is certain, that he shewed as much cruelty and insolence after the battle, as he wanted courage in it. We have seen above what cowardly spite he shewed to the body of his deceased enemy, which Antony treated with great respect and tenderness. The mean soul of Octavianus was not capable of such generous humanity: he insulted every illustrious captive with bitter words and outrageous invectives, putting them to death without mercy. To one, who earnestly begged as a particular favour, that he would suffer his body to be buried after his death, he answered, that the ravens would soon regulate that matter. When a father implored mercy for his son, and the son for the father, he commanded, with an excess of cruelty hardly to be met with in the history of the most barbarous nations, the father and son to fight for their lives; this barbarous fight he beheld; beheld unconcerned the son to stab his father, and then himself for having done it. Others tell us, that he obliged the father and son to draw lots for their lives, and that the father gave himself voluntarily up to execution to save his son, who, disdaining to owe his life to the murderer of his father, stabbed himself in the presence of the tyrant. Had not therefore the remaining prisoners reason, when they were brought before Antony and him, loaded with chains, to salute the former with the honourable title of emperor, and the latter with bitter invectives, curses, and reproaches? Among these were the famous M. Favonius, who with the sword at his throat reproached the merciless Octavianus, with all the freedom of a Cynic philosopher ^w (Z).

THE triumvirs, having thus glutted their revenge with the blood of many illustrious citizens, who on that fatal day fell into their hands, began now to deliberate about the proper measures for the establishing of their authority, and the utter suppression of those who still stood up in defence of their ancient laws and liberties. For Pompey was still in possession of Sicily; Domitius Abenobarbus and Statius Murcus, Brutus's admirals, commanded two powerful fleets, the former on the coasts of Macedon, the latter in the Ionian sea; Cassius Parmensis (A), one of the conspirators, having been left in Asia by Brutus and Cassius, with a considerable fleet and a competent number of forces, to keep the eastern provinces in awe, upon the news of Brutus's overthrow and death, reinforced his fleet with thirty Rhodian ships, which he manned with Romans, and being joined by Clodius, governor of Rhodes, at the head of three thousand men, by Lepidus governor of Crete with the garison which Brutus had left there, by Clodius, Torulus, young Cicero, and many other persons of distinction, who had fled into Asia, he gave no small umbrage to the triumvirs. In a private conference therefore between them, it was agreed, that Antony should march into the east and settle those provinces, and that Octavianus should lead the old troops into Italy, put them there in possession of the lands which had been promised them, and to force young Pompey out of a retreat, which served for an asylum to all the zealous republicans. Before they parted they disbanded all their veterans, except eight thousand, after having.

(Z) M. Favonius had been always very intimate with Brutus, but nevertheless by him left out of the conspiracy for the following reason. As Brutus was discoursing one day with him and Statilius, who was by sect an Epicurean, and proposing some questions to be disputed, with a design to discover their sentiments, Favonius declared his judgment to be, that a civil war was worse than the most unjust tyranny. Though he had no share in the death of Cæsar, nor approved of the action, yet he joined Brutus, served him with the utmost fidelity to the last, and died with a constancy worthy of a Roman senator and philosopher (81).

(A) Cassius Parmensis was one of the conspirators, but some time after the battle of Philippi he joined Antony, and served under him at the battle of Actium. Upon his defeat he returned to Athens, where he was murdered by Octavianus's orders. He was a native of Parma, and thence called Parmensis. As that city stood within the bounds of ancient Hetruria, which extended, as Cluverius shews, to the banks of the Po, no wonder that Horace calls him an Hetruscan (82). He was, in the opinion of that inimitable writer, a great versifier, but no extraordinary poet. He left such a vast heap of writings behind him, that it was pleasantly said he wanted no other materials for his funeral pile.

Quintilius Varus, by whom he was assassinated, is said to have found a tragedy among his papers, intitled Thyestes, which he published as his own. It is at least certain, that Quintilius, having put him to death, seized all his writings, among which were several tragedies, he having a particular talent at that sort of composition. The verses upon Orpheus, which Achilles Tatius published under his name, are by the best judges thought to be of a later date.

having satisfied them in part with the money they had left, and what they found in Brutus's camp. Of the remaining forces Octavianus took with him into Italy four legions and four thousand horse; Antony keeping with him six legions and ten thousand horse. It was also agreed, that Octavianus should yield two of his legions to his colleague, and receive two others in their stead belonging to Antony, which had been left in Italy under the command of Calenus, one of Antony's lieutenants*. Though the forty-three legions they had in the beginning of the war were by this time reduced to twenty-eight, yet they wanted vast sums to pay five thousand drachmas to each private man, and reward all the officers in proportion: this was the principle motive of Antony's expedition into Asia, whither he carried with him for his guard four thousand veterans, besides the above-mentioned forces, who were prevailed upon, though the time of their service was expired, to attend him in quality of volunteers, the like number remaining with Octavianus in the same quality and post†.

AND now the two conquerors parted, Octavianus taking his rout towards Dyrrachium, in order to return to Italy, and Antony marching into Greece, with a design to pass over from thence into Asia. Octavianus arrived in a few days march at Dyrrachium, where we shall leave him for a while to follow Antony in his memorable, but to him fatal, expedition into the east. After so remarkable a victory, which was entirely owing to him (for Octavianus was not present in the first engagement, and in the second was driven out of the field by the brave Brutus), he must needs visit Greece, as being the country where flattery was managed with most delicacy. There laying aside all majesty, he took pleasure in assisting, like a private citizen, at the disputes of the philosophers in the schools and academies of Athens, in seeing the public sports, and frequenting the religious ceremonies of the Greeks. As he was fond of being styled, the Lover of Greece, but above all, the Lover of Athens, he administered justice there with a great deal of equity, and made very considerable presents to the city, though he was himself in great want of money, his military chest being almost quite drained by the vast sums he and his colleague had distributed among the veterans after the battle. Before he left Attica he caused an exact survey to be made of the temple of Apollo Pythius, as if he designed to repair it; but he dropt that project on his arrival in Asia, whither he marched with all his forces, leaving Lucius Censorinus, one of his lieutenants to govern Greece in his absence. In Asia all the kings and princes, who acknowledged the Roman power, came to make their court to him, many of them bringing with them their wives and daughters, to gain the triumvir's favour by their charms. The queens rivalled one another, who should make him the most magnificent present, or appear most charming in his eyes. This croud of sovereigns, who daily attended his levee and waited upon him where-ever he went, with their praises and submissions, most agreeably soothed his ambitious and voluptuous temper; but nothing pleased him so much as the reception he met with at Ephesus. There the women went out to meet him in the habit they used to wear when they solemnized the feasts of Bacchus, and the men and boys drest like satyrs and fauns. Nothing was to be seen throughout the town but spears wreathed with ivy, harps, flutes, and hautboys, while they styled Antony in their songs, Bacchus the Gracious and the Gentle; and so indeed he was to some, but others he treated with great inhumanity. He pardoned all those of Brutus's party, who surrendered themselves to him, except Petronius, who was one of the conspirators, and Quintus, who was charged with betraying Dolabella to Cassius in Laodicea. But then he stript several rich citizens of their estates to gratify his flatterers and buffoons, who often begged and obtained the estates of men yet living and in perfect health, making Antony, to whom they alone had access, believe they were dead. Thus one of his cooks, having dressed him a supper to his taste, begged and obtained as his reward the fine house of a wealthy citizen of Magnesia. But as the chief business, which had brought him into Asia, was the raising of the necessary sums for the satisfying of the victorious legions, he summoned the deputies of all the subjects and allies of Rome in those parts to meet at Ephesus, and there, after having reproached them with assisting Brutus and Cassius, notwithstanding the kindness Cæsar had shewn them, he acquainted them with the great promises he and his colleague had made to their twenty-eight conquering legions, amounting in all to a hundred and fifty thousand men and upwards, and then concluded thus: You may judge of the sums we want from the number of our soldiers, and the promises we have made them. This has obliged my colleague to go into Italy, where he has taken upon him to reward them with lands and houses, from which he will be obliged to drive out the antient proprietors. But as for you, I will treat you with more humanity, being unwilling to deprive you of your inheritances; or drive you from your temples and sepulchres of your forefathers. As you would needs run the fortune of our enemies in war; now that the gods have been pleased to grant the victory, not according to your wishes, but their own justice, we ought to treat you as the allies, or rather as the accomplices, of our foes; and inflict upon you some exemplary punishment. But, as the laws of humanity will not always allow the punishments to be proportionable to the crimes, instead of other penalties, we shall content ourselves with a sum of money, the same you gave our enemies, ten years tribute: but as you paid it to them in two years time, we require it in one. This is the only punishment we intend to inflict upon you, which we should very readily forgive, were not our exigencies very pressing. At these words the deputies threw themselves at Antony's feet, remonstrating with tears in their eyes, that their assisting Brutus and Cassius could not be laid to their charge as a crime, since they had been forced to it by such cruel usage, as made them rather objects of pity than punishment; and that as to the sums which were demanded of them, it was not in their power to raise them, since Brutus and Cassius had stripped them, not only of all their gold and silver in specie, but likewise of their plate, the furniture of their houses, and of all the ornaments of their cities and temples. As Antony continued inflexible, Hybreas, an orator and agent for some of the Asiatic cities, rising up, Since you are determined, said he, to double our taxes, pray take care that our summers and autumns be doubled too; otherwise we shall never be able to satisfy your demands. This liberty of speech did not displease Antony (B), who, as Plutarch tells us, was as well contented to be handsomely rallied, as he was delighted in rallying others. The deputies prevailed at length, but with much ado, upon the triumvir, to be contented with the tribute of nine years to be paid in two²: so that all the princes, kings, and free states of Asia, were obliged to lay heavy taxes on their subjects for the payment of this sum, which reduced them, after the exorbitant taxes with which Cassius had loaded them, almost to a state of beggary³. After this, Antony took a progress through the provinces of Asia, giving every-where extraordinary demonstrations of generosity and good-nature. He pardoned Lucius, brother to Cassius, and several others of the adverse party, who upon the fame of his clemency flocked to him from all quarters: but he continued implacable to those who had any hand in the death of Cæsar. The Xanthians he freed from all tribute, and persuaded them to rebuild their city. To the Rhodians, whom Cassius had treated with great severity, he gave the islands of Andros, Tenos, Naxos, and Myndus. The inhabitants of Tarsus and Laodicea he likewise exempted from all taxes. Neither was he unmindful of the Athenians, to whom he granted the islands of Ægina, Teos, Cea, Sciathus, and Peparethus⁴: so that the whole weight of the exorbitant contributions, amounting to two hundred thousand talents, fell upon the inhabitants of Asia, properly so called, of Syria, Phrygia, Mysia, Galatia, Cappadocia, Cilicia, and Palestine. As he wanted ready money to pay his soldiers, while the tax was raising, he sent all his horse to Palmyra or Tadmor to take the plunder of that rich city, instead of their pay; but the inhabitants, having timely notice of the design, removed before their arrival, their families and effects to the other side of the Euphrates; so that the triumvir's

(B) The same Hybreas some time after told Antony, when he required more money; Asia has already furnished two hundred thousand talents for your service; if the money did not come to your hands, call those to an account who levied it; but if it did, and you have already spent that sum, we are all undone. These words, says Plutarch, touched Antony to the quick; for many things were done in his name, of which he was quite ignorant; not that he was by nature easily imposed upon, but because he reposed too great confidence in the integrity of those he employed. He was naturally very sincere, but somewhat slow of apprehension; but as soon as he was made sensible of his faults, he was much troubled, and ready to ask pardon of those he had offended. He loved raillery, but was as well contented to be handsomely rallied, as he was pleased to rally others. This freedom had; as Plutarch observes, its inconvenience; for he imagined, that those friends, who used so much liberty in their mirth, would never flatter or deceive him in any business of consequence, not perceiving, that these subtle parasites disguised their flattery to make it go down the better. Upon examining any difficulty, they contrived matters so as not to seem to yield to him out of complaisance; but because his understanding was superior to theirs (84).

triumvir's cavalry returned empty. On their retreat the Palmyrenians returned to their habitations; but, being exasperated by this cruel usage, put themselves under the protection of the Parthians, which gave occasion to the second Parthian war. ^c

Antony arriving in Cilicia, dispatched from thence Dellius into Egypt, to summon Cleopatra to appear before him, and give him an account of her conduct during the war. For though she had assisted Dolabella, yet Serapion, her lieutenant in Cyprus, had joined Brutus and Cassius, which the triumvirs had taken much amiss, considering what she owed to the memory of Cæsar: Dellius, who was sent on this message; was a famous historian and a man of great wit and learning; but of no principles, being one of those who have always a base compliance for the inclinations of their masters (C). As he was well acquainted with Antony's temper, after a short conversation with the queen, he easily judged with what sentiments a woman of her beauty, wit, address, and sprightly conversation would inspire him; and therefore encouraged her to go in person into Cilicia, assuring her, that Antony, who was a brave and amorous soldier, would receive her with all the respect due to persons of her high station, extraordinary merit, and wonderful qualifications. She had great faith in the words of Dellius; but her chief dependance was in her own beauty; and indeed never had beauty been signalized by more illustrious conquests: she had captivated the heart of Julius Cæsar, of Pompey's eldest son, and formerly of Antony himself, when he served under Gabinus, governor of Syria; and this when she was young and ignorant in the arts of love; whereas she was now to meet him in the flower of her age, with all the charms of beauty, and all the artifice of riper years. But what above all inspired her with certain confidence of rekindling the flame in Antony's heart was, the quickness of her wit; for though there were some at Rome who rivalled her in beauty, none was to compare to her in the agreeableness of her conversation, and in a certain natural grace and sweetness, which appeared in every thing she said or did, and made a deep impression on all who heard her. In short, the charms of her conversation were irresistible, and the very tone of her voice so harmonious, that no instrument was capable of a greater variety of sounds, and of equally soothing the ears of the hearers. Besides, she expressed herself with so much ease, and in so many different languages, that she was looked upon by all as a prodigy. The most barbarous nations heard her with astonishment answer their ambassadors without an interpreter. She understood, besides many others, the Æthiopian, the Troglodite, the Hebrew, the Arabian, Syrian, Median, and Parthian tongues; which was the more wonderful in her, considering, that most of the kings, her predecessors, had not been able to learn the Egyptian tongue, and several of them had forgot the Macedonian, their original language ^d. The confidence she placed in these extraordinary accomplishments encouraged her more than the words of Dellius, or her own beauty, to appear before Antony. She made great preparations for her journey, taking with her vast sums of money, and all the jewels, plate, and rich ornaments of the Egyptian kings. Many were the letters she received from Antony, hastening her coming; but she seemed to make no account of his orders. At length she set out, and arriving at the mouth of the river Cydnus, she embarked on a small galley, and appeared before Antony at Tarsus in Cilicia, in the fantastical manner which we have described at length in our history of Egypt ^e. The triumvir was so taken with the charms of her person, the quickness of her wit, and the agreeableness of her conversation, that from the first day he conceived a passion for her, which occasioned all the future misfortunes of his life. He was never after the same man, but wholly taken up with the

(C) Quintus Dellius wrote in Greek an account of Antony's unsuccessful expedition against the Parthians, in which he attended him and had a chief command. He was one of Horace's most intimate friends, who addressed to him the third ode of his second book, containing the soundest principles of the Epicurean philosophy. He was a man of great wit and learning, but of a very bad character. Mesala Corvinus used to call him desultorem bellorum civilium, that is, the vaulter of the civil wars. For he left Dolabella to side with Cassius, then quitted Cassius to join Antony, and at last abandoned Antony to take party with Octavianus. During his stay at the court of Egypt, the fair queen captivated his heart, and is said not to have been displeased with the addresses of a man of his fine genius. In the time of Seneca several letters of his to that queen were handed about, written with too much familiarity (85).

WHILE Antony was thus wallowing in pleasures with his beloved Cleopatra in Egypt, his colleague was wholly taken up in settling the affairs of Italy, and dividing the promised lands among the veterans. Having imbarqued his troops at Dyrrachium, he crossed the Adriatic gulf, without meeting with any of the enemy's fleets, and landed at Brundisium; where he was taken so ill, that his physicians gave him over, and the news of his death was immediately spread all over Italy, and differently received according to the different inclinations of the people. Most of the senators looked upon this report as one of his usual tricks to discover their intentions and real sentiments; and therefore by a decree of the senate prayers and sacrifices were offered up to the gods for his recovery, which soon followed by the favour of his native air and the vigor of his youth. As soon as he was in a condition to bear the fatigues of the journey, he set out for Rome, where he was received with loud acclamations; especially by the populace. Some time before his arrival the fasces had been transferred from Lepidus and L. Munatius Plancus to L. Antonius, the brother of the triumvir, and P. Servilius Vatia Isauricus; but Fulvia, Antony's wife, a woman of a manly spirit and an unbounded ambition, had gained the ascendant over the new consuls, and governed

Rome with an absolute sway. This Octavianus could not bear; and hence the mutual jealousies and distrusts between her and the young triumvir, which at length kindled a war in the very bowels of Italy. Octavianus met with many, almost insurmountable, difficulties in the distribution of the promised lands. As the public treasury was quite exhausted, he could not content the soldiery without giving up to them the several towns which he had promised them by way of reward after the victory; and this he was well apprised would provoke the people. Most of the inhabitants of those unhappy towns flocked daily in great multitudes to Rome: vast numbers of women with children in their arms, whose tender years and innocence moved even the triumvir's friends to compassion, daily filled the temples and public places with their cries and lamentations. The people, on this occasion talked with a great deal of freedom and boldness; This war, said they, has been undertaken not for the public good, but for the private views of the triumvirs, who, since they have reaped the advantage of it, ought to bear all the charges, and not satisfy their soldiers at the expence of so many distressed families. Octavianus heard and patiently bore these complaints, with a dissimulation peculiar to himself. Unwilling to give occasion to fresh disturbances, he borrowed what money he could; but finding he could not raise the sufficient sums to satisfy his soldiers, he broke through all difficulties, and, pursuant to his first design, allotted them the lands for their inheritance, which he had promised in the beginning of the war. Cremona a city greatly attached to the interest of Brutus, suffered most in this iniquitous distribution, and Mantua, which was but too near to a place abandoned to the mercy of the ungovernable soldiery, had more than her share in these misfortunes. The prince of the Latin poets had like to have perished on this occasion, by the hand of a centurion, named Arrius, who pursued him with his drawn sword, for daring to dispute with him the possession of his small estate on the banks of the Mincius; and would have deprived the world of the greatest poet Italy ever produced, had he not happily escaped the fury of the enraged centurion by swimming cross the river. This very adventure seems to have most of all contributed to the reputation and good fortune of that divine and inimitable writer; for it put him upon going to Rome, where his extraordinary talents being known to Mænas and Asinius Pollio, he obtained by their interest the restitution of his farm, which is the subject of that excellent eclogue, the first of his Bucolics, he being then about twenty-eight years of age.

Octavianus himself was exposed to great dangers in this extremely nice and difficult undertaking, the soldiery and people being equally exasperated against him. Few of the veterans were satisfied with the portion of the lands allotted to them; Antony's soldiers taxed Octavianus with partiality, as if he assigned the best lands to his own men and the worst to them. Fulvia did not fail to improve these discontents; and being seconded by the consul Lucius, her brother-in-law, whom she easily gained over to her interest, she left nothing unattempted to fire both the soldiers and people against one,

a one, who, she well saw, was engrossing all the power to himself. And indeed she was attended therein with good success, as plainly appeared from the two following accidents. A private soldier having taken place among the knights at a public shew, Octavianus ordered an officer to drive him from thence; hereupon a report being spread, by the triumvir's enemies, that the soldier had been assassinated by his orders, as soon as the sports were over, they all crowded round him, demanding with threatenings to see their comrade. Octavianus caused him immediately to be sought for and brought before them; when the soldier declared, that he had not received the least hurt or ill usage: the mutinous troops were not easily prevailed upon to believe him, as if they had been incensed against him for depriving them of so specious a pretence to murder their general. The other accident shews still more plainly, to what a degree Fulvia and Lucius had estranged the minds of the soldiers from their general. He had appointed a day for his soldiers to meet in the field of Mars, in order to proceed to the distribution of the lands. The legionaries assembled accordingly at the time agreed on, but Octavianus not coming so soon as they expected, they began to mutiny, and speak of their general with great disrespect; upon which Nonnius, one of the tribunes, ventured to remind them of their duty, and chide them for the indecency of their carriage. But the insolent soldiery first rallied the zealous officer as a mercenary sycophant, and then insulted him in a most outrageous manner; insomuch, that he was forced to save himself by flight from their fury, and throw himself, finding no other means to escape, into the Tiber, where he was drowned. The mutineers drew the body out of the river, and exposed it on the way which led to the field of Mars, that Octavianus might see it, and learn what might be his own fate, if he provoked their resentment. Octavianus, though acquainted with this disorder, went, contrary to the advice of his friends, to the field of Mars, and, only turning away his eyes from the dead body as he passed by it, appeared in the midst of the assembly with an affected calmness and tranquillity. He artfully pretended to believe, that Nonnius had been killed in a quarrel by some private enemy, and, after having exhorted his soldiers not to carry their resentment another time to such extremities, without taking any further notice of such a notorious breach of the military laws, he proceeded to the distribution of the lands, extending his liberality even to those who had lost their lives in the battle of Philippi, on whose wives and children he bestowed that portion, which would have fallen to their lot. This false and iniquitous generosity, for he gave nothing of his own, but only what he had with the utmost injustice taken from the lawful owners, had so good an effect on the minds of the undiscerning multitude, that they demanded the authors of Nonnius's death might be brought to condign punishment. The crafty general answered, that they would be sufficiently punished by the reproaches of their own conscience, and the remorse which ever attends wicked actions.

Octavianus, having thus regained the affections of his soldiers, and being no longer able to bear the haughty and imperious behaviour of Fulvia, divorced her daughter Clodia, after having solemnly declared upon oath, that for him she was still a virgin. This was touching the proud Fulvia in the most sensible part: she resolved thenceforth to keep no measures with Octavianus, and accordingly began openly to encourage the veterans, who had served under her husband, to take arms against his ungrateful colleague, who, though he had no ways contributed to the victory, was now reaping all the advantage of it, with a view to ingross the whole power to himself, and exclude Antony, to whose valour the victory was entirely owing, from any share in the administration. She appeared in all the assemblies of the people with the children she had by Antony, and there made bitter complaints of the cruel usage she pretended they had received from one, who ought, with all the tenderness of a father, to have protected them against the insults of their enemies. Lucius, her brother-in-law, joined her, giving out every-where, that Octavianus had nothing else in view but to enslave Italy, deprive his colleague of all power, and make both the senate and people of Rome subservient to his will. He pretended to act by the direction of, and in concert with, his brother, whose chief and main concern, he said, was to preserve the republic from the tyranny of the proud, crafty, and ambitious Octavianus. This disagreement between the young triumvir on one side, and Lucius and Fulvia on the other, gave rise to two different factions, and rent the republic anew into parties.

The veterans, who had served under Antony, and such of the Italians, as had been driven from their ancient inheritances, sided with Fulvia and Lucius. The friends of the late dictator; and those legionaries, who were satisfied with the lands fallen to their share, took party with Octavianus: so that all Italy was in a flame, and threatened with a new war ready to break out within the very walls of Rome, where horrible disorders and cruel murders were daily committed, by the insolent populace and ungovernable soldiery of the two opposite factions. To complete the misfortunes of Rome and Italy, a famine began to be felt all over the country, great part of the lands lying uncultivated ever since the beginning of the civil war, the seas being beset with the enemy's fleets, and Sextus Pompeius holding Sicily, whence the continent, and especially the capital, was supplied with corn. In this distress Octavianus would fain have made up matters with Fulvia in an amicable manner; but she would hearken only to the dictates of her own resentment and the insinuations of Manius, her husband's agent, who assured her, that nothing but a war could force Antony from the arms of Cleopatra, and bring him into Italy. Fulvia followed the pernicious advice of Manius, and, abandoning Rome, retired to Præneste, a city which had declared for her. There, forgetting her sex, she appeared with an helmet on her head and a sword by her side, assembled some legions, harangued them, gave the parole, and performed all functions of a general. Octavianus, fearing young Pompey might take advantage of the misunderstanding between him and Fulvia, sent a deputation to the camp of Præneste, exhorting the female general and her brother-in-law, who, tho' consul, served in a manner as her subaltern, to lay aside all animosities, and act in concert against their common enemies. The deputies, who were all of the senatorial order and common friends to the triumvirs, would have prevailed on Lucius to hearken to an accommodation, had he not been diverted from it by the implacable Fulvia and by Manius, whom Antony had appointed to manage his affairs in Rome, during his absence. He in a studied speech accused Octavianus of unfair dealing with respect to Antony, as if he designed to ingross the whole power of the triumvirate to himself, and reduce his colleague to the state of a private man, tho' the victory they had gained in the plains of Philippi was entirely owing to his valour: And what other view, said he, can the ambitious youth have in rewarding, as he has done, with lands and possessions thirty-four legions instead of twenty-eight? His only aim is to form a strong party for himself, at the expence of innumerable unhappy wretches, who have been driven from their inheritances to make room for his private friends and partisans, who had no share in the late war, and consequently no claim to rewards of any kind: for their sake he has over-run and plundered all Italy, not sparing even the temples of the gods. He is now raising troops under pretence of making war upon Pompey; but it is manifest, he has something else in view, which ought to give us umbrage, since, in the present situation of affairs, that expedition cannot so much as be thought of for want of provisions and shipping. His real purpose is, without all doubt, to make himself formidable, and usurp a tyrannical power, not only over the people and senate, but even over his colleagues. If therefore he is sincerely disposed to peace, let him disband his troops, give an account of the immense sums which have passed through his hands, and for the future act in concert with those who have nothing in view but the public good."

Octavianus, upon the report of his deputies finding a war unavoidable, began to draw together his legions, as did likewise Lucius and Fulvia. In the mean time, several manifestos and declarations were published by the opposite parties, and some very sharp letters passed between Lucius and Octavianus. The latter, seeing many of the veterans take party with his enemies, dispatched an express to Salvidienus, whom he had appointed his lieutenant in Spain, ordering him to hasten into Italy with the six legions under his command. Salvidienus, who had not yet reached his province, immediately turned back, repassed the Alps, and advanced with incredible expedition into Cisalpine Gaul to join Octavianus, who have left the capital and was assembling his forces in that province. Caius Asinius Pollio and Publius Ventidius, two of Lucius's lieutenants, who were incamped at the foot of the Alps, followed Salvidienus, harassing him on his march, and cutting off his convoys, by which means they reduced him to great straits. At the same time, Lucius, having assembled a considerable body of troops, advanced to meet Salvidienus and attack him in front, while his two lieutenants fell upon his rear. By this means, Octavianus's lieutenant must inevitably have been

been cut off with all his men, had not Vipsanius Agrippa with a choice body of veterans come seasonably to his relief, and, posting himself between him and Lucius, attacked the city of Sutrium. As the inhabitants of that place had signalized their attachment to the interest of Lucius, he flew to their assistance, which gave Salvidienus an opportunity of joining Agrippa, and seizing with him, after he had taken Sutrium by assault, all the passes and defiles leading to the two camps of Pollio and Ventidius. Lucius, after having attempted in vain to open himself a way sword in hand, resolved to retire into the city of Perusia, and wait there, as in a place of safety, for the arrival of his two lieutenants. But Agrippa and Salvidienus, following him close, invested the place, before he had time to reflect on the danger, to which he exposed himself and his troops. Octavianus was no sooner informed of the bad situation of Lucius, than he flew to Perusia, and in concert with his two lieutenants carried on the siege with great vigor; but as he found it impossible to take by assault so strong a place, garisoned by a whole army, he resolved to reduce it by famine; and with this view surrounded it with a line of circumvallation fifty six furlongs in compass. From his camp he drew lines quite to the Tiber, which he strengthened with ramparts, and flanked with towers at equal distances, that is, about sixty foot from one another. These towers he filled with archers, slingers, and all sorts of engines to prevent the enemy from receiving any convoys by water. Lucius on his side was continually harassing the workmen and the legions that covered them with brisk sallies, in which his men, who were for the most part gladiators, had all the advantage. In one of these sallies Octavianus himself narrowly escaped falling into the enemy's hands. In the mean time, Fulvia detached from her camp at Præneste L. Munatius Plancus with a numerous body of chosen troops, ordering him to join Ventidius and Pollio, and with their united forces oblige the enemy either to venture a battle, or raise the siege. Plancus, in spite of Agrippa and Salvidienus, whom Octavianus detached against him, joined Ventidius and Pollio, and together with them advanced as far as Fulginium, within a hundred and sixty furlongs of Perusia. Lucius was overjoyed at their approach, which they took care to signify to him by fires in the night and other signals. He did not in the least doubt, but they would exert their utmost endeavours, and make some great push for his relief. And such indeed was their design; but Plancus, after having viewed the advantageous situation of the enemy, declared, that they could not attempt the relief of the place without exposing their troops, for which they were responsible to Antony, to the greatest dangers. His opinion prevailed, and as none of them approved of Lucius's conduct, who had thus rashly engaged in a war without his brother's knowledge, they retired, leaving their general and his troops in the utmost despair. As the besieged were already reduced to the greatest extremity for want of provisions, they made a desperate sally, but were driven back into the city, after having fought with unparalleled bravery from nine at night till the next morning. Lucius, being determined to hold out to the last, took an inventory of all the provisions in the place, which he daily measured out sparingly to the soldiers and inhabitants of free condition, but allowed none to the slaves and servants of the army, though he kept them at the same time within the city, and had them narrowly watched, lest they should acquaint the enemy with the miserable condition to which the garison was reduced. This was sentencing an infinite number of innocent men to a most cruel death; a piece of inhumanity hardly to be matched in history! The unhappy wretches, reduced to this desperate condition, wandered about the works in quest of herbs, grass, and roots, some of them even feeding upon their own ordure and the flesh of their dead companions. At length the soldiers themselves, no longer able to bear the famine, with which they were daily more and more pinched, begged leave of Lucius to make a general sally, chusing rather to die, like brave men sword in hand, than to live under the miseries they endured. The general approved of their choice; telling them, that they had nothing to depend upon but their own valour, and that in their present circumstances they must either conquer or die. They resolved therefore to make a desperate push, and sally out by break of day, to avoid the disorders that might happen in the dark. Accordingly, having first provided a great number of spades, hooks, scaling ladders, and all sorts of necessary tools to break down the wall, with which Octavianus had inclosed the city, as soon as day began to appear, they rushed out like famished tygers, cut in pieces the enemy's advanced guards, filled the ditch in an instant, plucked up the palisades, and began to undermine the wall, while the rolling towers, which they had prepared for that purpose, and filled with archers and dart-men, discharged showers of darts and arrows upon the enemy. The ground was immediately covered with dead bodies, and nothing was heard but groans and cries of dying men. Octavianus's soldiers made a dreadful havock of the aggressors, their machines playing incessantly upon them from the ramparts, and overwhelming them with showers of arrows, darts, stones, &c. But though many of them fell, the rest, not so much afraid of death as of famine, continued fighting with an amazing resolution, and climbing up the wall, in spite of all opposition, drove the enemy from their posts. The dispute continued many hours with an obstinacy and fury hardly to be expressed, and Lucius's men, though they fought with all the disadvantage imaginable, would have gained a complete victory, had the forces been equal; but Octavianus's troops being far more numerous, and constantly relieved with fresh supplies, the besieged, weakened with hunger, overpowered with numbers, and quite spent with the length of the combat, were in the end driven from off the wall. These gallant men, though stunned with their fall, still strove to climb up again, encouraging with their words and gestures their companions, who had not yet given ground. At length Lucius, surpris'd at such extraordinary valour and fidelity, and knowing that their courage only served to destroy them, commanded a retreat to be sounded. Hereupon Octavianus's men gave loud shouts of joy, striking, according to the custom of the Romans, when they had gained a victory, their swords against their bucklers. This those brave men looked upon as an insult, and therefore getting together the few ladders that remained, they returned to the charge with new fury; and it was with the utmost difficulty, and not without tears, that Lucius prevailed upon them to retreat. Octavianus that night doubled his guards, and disposed several bodies of troops on the ramparts in such manner, that they could easily relieve each other in case of a sudden attack, which he apprehended.

Lucius, finding himself reduced to the utmost extremity without any hopes of relief, resolved at length to capitulate, and by that means save the lives of so many brave men. Accordingly he dispatched three of the chief officers of his army to treat with Octavianus in his name. The crafty general received the deputies in a very polite and obliging manner, and returned this answer to their proposals, that he willingly pardoned all those who had served under Antony against the murderers of his father; but as for the others, he insisted upon their surrendering at discretion. Thus he spoke to the deputies in common, but afterwards taking Furnius, one of them, aside, he told him, that he intended to extend his mercy to the whole army, a few only excepted, who out of hatred to him had been the occasion of all these disorders. Upon the report of the deputies many illustrious Romans, who had been always declared enemies to the triumvirate, fearing to fall into the hands of Octavianus, with whose cruel and inhuman temper they were well acquainted, exhorted Lucius to insist on the safety of all, and not to surrender upon any other terms, Lucius touched with compassion for so many brave men, whom he well knew Octavianus, if it were left to him, would sacrifice to his revenge, resolved to go out in person, and putting himself into the young conqueror's hands, intercede for his unhappy followers. Octavianus received him with great marks of esteem and affection, and promised, out of the regard he owed to him and his brother, impunity to all who had taken part with him, on condition they surrendered without further resistance, and put him in possession of the city. Lucius, depending on Octavianus's promise, ordered his men to march out the next day, and acknowledge the young conqueror for their general; which they did accordingly, and were incorporated into his troops. As for the inhabitants of Perusia, who had shewn an inviolable attachment to Lucius, he ordered those who composed the senate or council of the city, to be brought before him in chains, and sentenced them all to die, contrary to the articles of agreement and the promise he had made. Some of those unhappy men pleaded innocence, others begged mercy; but they had all one and the same answer, Moriendum est, You must all die. Accordingly, they were, to the number of three hundred, by his orders carried in chains to an altar raised to Julius Cæsar, and there inhumanly butchered, as victims to his manes, on the ides of March, the anniversary of his death. With them were sacrificed by the barbarous tyrant, Caius Flavius, Clodius Bithynicus, and Canutius, three illustrious senators of Rome, and zealous defenders of their antient liberties. The city a city itself he delivered up to the lust and plunder of his soldiers; but one Cestius, surnamed Macedonicus from his having served a long time in Macedon, not caring to outlive the ruin of his country and the miseries of his fellow-citizens, by setting fire to his own house, occasioned the total destruction of that ancient and once powerful city. For, a high wind arising, the flames spread from house to house, and burnt with such violence, that in a very short time the whole city was laid in ashes. Such was the end of this unhappy war, commonly called the war of Perusia. As for Pollio, Ventidius, Plancus, and the other commanders of Antony, tho' they had still thirteen legions and fifteen hundred horse, they all withdrew, and took refuge in the maritime cities, waiting there for succours from Antony; but Octavianus pursuing them, Afinius Pollio went on board the fleet commanded by Domitius Ahenobarbus, Brutus's admiral, carrying with him seven legions. Plancus, being pursued close by Agrippa, abandoned the two legions he commanded, and went to join Fulvia at Præneste. The legions went over to Agrippa, but Plancus together with Fulvia fled from Præneste to Puteoli, and from thence to Brundisium, where they both imbarqued and passed over into Macedon. The other commanders made their escape into Sicily, where they were kindly received by Sextus Pompeius, who, had he not been of a slothful and indolent temper, might have improved these divisions to his advantage, and with great ease made himself master of all Italy. For Statius Murcus, falling out with Domitius Ahenobarbus, the other republican admiral, had joined him with two complete legions and twenty-four ships, carrying with him immense sums, which he had extorted from the maritime cities of Asia. Besides, he had received a strong reinforcement from Cephalenia, consisting of veterans who had escaped from the battle of Philippi. But the indolent Pompey, though in condition to invade Italy and crush the party of the triumvirs there, contented himself with ravaging the coasts, acting therein more like a pirate than a general^k.

Lucius's generals dispersed.

AND now the other officers, who had served under Lucius, being driven with their forces out of Italy, Tiberius Claudius Nero, at the head of a few veterans and a great number of slaves, whom he had drawn together by promising them their liberty, undertook to maintain the interest, and support the ruined party, of Lucius in the neighbourhood of Naples. Tiberius was descended from one of the most illustrious families of Rome, and had been honoured with great employments by Julius Cæsar, who had a particular esteem for him. He had been his quæstor, and commanded his fleet in the war of Alexandria, when he distinguished himself on many occasions in a very eminent manner. He was afterwards created prætor, and raised to the high station of pontifex maximus. But notwithstanding all the favours he had received at Cæsar's hands, after his death he was not only for granting a general pardon to the conspirators, but exhorted the consuls to reward them, as the deliverers of their country and the avengers of their oppressed liberty. He had by a timely flight avoided the fury of the proscription, and, siding with Lucius at the beginning of this war, had shut himself up with him in the city of Perusia, whence he found means to make his escape into Campania, where he raised the army we mentioned above. But his raw and undisciplined troops being frightened at the approach of Octavianus's victorious army, they immediately dispersed, abandoning their general to the mercy of his cruel and implacable enemy. Tiberius, thus deserted by his forces, fled in disguise with his wife Livia and his son Tiberius, not yet two years old, to the sea-side, hoping he should find there some vessel to convey him over to Sicily. Livia was the daughter of Livius Drusus Claudianus, who was killed in the battle of Philippi, fighting for Brutus and Cassius. Livius was descended from the Claudian family, whence he had the name of Claudianus; but his branch had been long since adopted into the Livian family. The only person of distinction, who followed Tiberius and Livia in their flight, was Caius Velleius, the grand-father of the famous historian Velleius Paterculus, who had served with great reputation in the armies of Pompey and Brutus. But his great age and infirmities not suffering him to attend them over into Sicily, partly out of grief in parting with them, and partly through fear of falling into the hands of the merciless Octavianus, he put an end to his life with his own sword, and by that means prevented the vengeance of the bloody tyrant. As for Tiberius and Livia, Octavianus pursued them close; but they, after having escaped a thousand dangers, attended only by one domestic, found a small boat, which conveyed them over into Sicily.

Sicily. And here we cannot help reflecting with Velleius Paterculus on the strange turns of fortune, which ought to teach us, that as to future events our fears are often as groundless as our hopes. Livia was flying from an enemy, whose affections she was one day to gain and maintain to the hour of his death; and the infant she carried in her arms was to succeed Octavianus, and after him rule the Roman empire with an absolute sway. Tiberius's troops being dispersed, and he fled, Octavianus returned to Rome, which he entered in triumphant robes, and crowned with laurel. Public feasts were celebrated for several days together, and it was enacted by a decree of the senate and people, that *whenever any general should for the future merit a triumph, Octavianus should have a share in his honour*¹.

WHILE Cæsar Octavianus was making war in Italy with Lucius, and settling his affairs there with all the skill and address of an able politician, Antony was passing his time ingloriously at Alexandria; thinking of nothing but the enjoyment of those pleasures and diversions with which the queen entertained him, every day heightening the relish of them by the charms of novelty (D). But, in the mean time, all Syria and Palestine being grievously oppressed with the taxes that were imposed upon them, the

(D) The poets have not given to Omphale, queen of Lydia, a greater ascendant over Hercules, than history gives to the fair Egyptian queen over Antony. Like a second Hercules, from the rough soldier and formidable conqueror, he became the slave of a bewitching woman, and the laughing-stock not of Egypt only, but of all the nations who had any knowledge of the Roman name. Out of complaisance to his admired idol, he exchanged the Roman for the Greek dress, piquing himself upon appearing among the effeminate Asiatics, who composed the queen's court, as one of them. Laying aside all other business, he was solely intent on pleasing and diverting Cleopatra, who never left him night nor day: she played at dice with him, drank with him, hunted with him, and when he thought fit to exercise the few troops he had with him, which he did more for her diversion than their improvement, she was always by him. Nothing was talked of at court but feasts, shews, revels, &c. Mirth, jollity and pleasures had banished all business, all serious thoughts. They gave their way of living a particular name, calling it the inimitable life. They treated one another by turns, on which occasion their expences were beyond all measure. Plutarch gives us two instances of Antony's extravagance, which he learnt of his grandfather Lamprias, who had them from one Philotas, a physician of Amphyssa. Philotas, being acquainted with one of Antony's cooks, was invited by him to see what sumptuous preparations he was making for supper. Coming into the kitchen, he was surprised at the prodigious variety of the most scarce and expensive things; but nothing struck him so much as the sight of eight wild boars roasting intire; Surely, said he, You have a great number of guests: but the cook, laughing at his simplicity, There are not above twelve guests, replied he,; but every dish must be served up just roasted to a turn, and if any thing is but one minute ill-timed, it is spoilt: for, added he, may be Antony will sup just now, may be not this hour, may be not these two hours, because he may perhaps have a mind to spend some time in drinking or talking; so that not one but many suppers must be had in readiness, it not being easy to guess at his hour. The same Philotas related, that being afterwards in the service of Antony's eldest son by Fulvia, and admitted with other domestics of a better rank to his table, when the young man did not dine with his father, it happened, that another physician, full of argument and noise, disturbed and tired the company with the impertinence of his talk. Philotas, no longer able to bear the empiric, put this sophi-stical syllogism to him: There is some kind of fever, wherein cold water is good; everyone who has a fever has some kind of fever; therefore cold water is good for all those who have fevers. This sophism quite silenced the quack; at which young Antony was so pleased, that addressing himself to Philotas, and pointing to a side-board covered with rich plate, Philotas, said he, all that is yours. Philotas thanked him for his good-will, but could not conceive that the young man had a power of disposing of things to that value. He therefore went home without so much as thinking of the present. But he was very much surprised, when soon after his departure he saw all the plate brought home to his house by slaves followed by an officer of young Antony, who desired him to put his mark upon them. Philotas excused himself, fearing to accept from a young man a present of so great a value. But the officer, who brought it, What ails the man? said he, don't you know that he, who makes you this present, is Antony's son, who could very well spare it, were it all gold? But if you will be advised by me, I would counsel you to accept of the value in money; for among the plate there may be some pieces of antiquity, or the work of some famous master, for which Antony may have a particular esteem.

But to return to Cleopatra; she was daily contriving new diversions for Antony's entertainment; and the most inconsiderable trifles, when managed by her, received such an air as made them agreeable diversions. They often rambled about the streets in the night, hand in hand, Cleopatra dressed like an ordinary woman, and Antony like a slave, and in that disguise entering the public houses mixed with the mob. Cleopatra took great delight in these expeditions, as they gave her room to display her wit and humour in retorting the coarse raillery of the vulgar, and relating her adventures, which she did with an unparalleled grace. They frequently met with rough treatment, and sometimes with blows. This kind of behaviour, highly unbecoming a queen and a Roman magistrate, a general and a conqueror, who was at this time forty and upwards, seemed very strange to the graver and better sort of people; but the populace were highly pleased with their frolics, saying of Antony, that they had great obligations to him, for shewing them his comical countenance, and reserving his tragical one for the Romans. Of Antony's other follies, especially of the pleasant adventure that happened to him, while he was angling with Cleopatra, we have spoke in our history of Egypt (86).

a the Aradians killed those who were sent to gather them; and, thereupon, joining the Palmyrenians and several petty princes of Syria, called in the Parthians, which put the whole country into the utmost confusion. For the Parthians on this invitation passing the Euphrates under the command of Pacorus, their king's son, and Labienus a Roman general (E), overcame in a pitched battle Saxa, Antony's lieutenant in Syria, and forced him to take refuge in Cilicia. After this victory the two generals divided their army: Labienus with one part of it pursued Saxa into Cilicia, where he slew him, defeated his army, over-ran all Asia-Minor, and, forcing Antony's lieutenants to make their escape into the islands, brought all places under him as far as the Helle-spont and the Ægean sea. At the same time, Pacorus, with the other part of the army, reduced all Syria and Phœnice as far as Tyre, which city alone held out against him, the remains of the Roman forces in that country having got thither before him. An account of these successes was brought to Antony at Alexandria, and at the same time news of the ill state of his affairs in Italy, and of the unsuccessful war which his brother Lucius had waged there with Octavianus. Hereupon recovering, as it were, from a drunken fit, he resolved at length to leave Cleopatra, and march forthwith against the Parthians. With this view having got together two hundred ships, he sailed to Tyre; but finding, on his putting in there, all the country round in the hands of the enemy, and receiving at the same time most lamentable letters from Fulvia, he changed his mind, and resolved to postpone the war with the Parthians, and sail directly to Italy. Accordingly, he left Tyre, after having reinforced the garrison of that place; and, sailing by the islands of Cyprus and Rhodes, arrived at Athens, where he met Fulvia, whom he highly blamed as the chief cause of the late disorders. In this city he received certain advice, that Octavianus had made himself master of Transalpine Gaul, and forced the son of Calenus after the death of his father to deliver up to him eleven legions, which he commanded in that province. As Transalpine Gaul had been, by a private agreement between the two triumvirs after the battle of Philippi, yielded to Antony, he looked upon such a proceeding as an open declaration of war; and therefore putting to sea without loss of time, set sail for Italy, without shewing the least concern for Fulvia, whom he left sick at Sicyon. This neglect and scorn completed what his infidelity had begun; for she died in that city soon after her husband's departure. Antony in crossing the Ionian sea was met by Domitius Ahenobarbus, the republican admiral, who, instead of opposing him, came on board his galley, and delivered up to him the command of his fleet, being induced thereunto by Asinius Pollio, who had fled from Italy, as we have related above, after the surrender of Perusia, and taken refuge on board Domitius's fleet (F). The two fleets thus joined came to an anchor on the coast of Epirus, and from thence set sail for Brundisium. In this city Octavianus had five legions, which shut the gates against Antony, refusing admittance, not to him, they said, but to Domitius, who was Octavianus's rival in Italy, and lays siege to Brundisium.

(E) This Labienus was the son of Titus Labienus, who had been Cæsar's lieutenant in Gaul, and one of his most intimate friends; but afterwards going over to Pompey, he became one of his most inveterate enemies, and was slain fighting against him in the battle of Munda (87). His son, pursuing the same interest, was sent by Brutus and Cassius, a little before the battle of Philippi, in quality of ambassador to the Parthian king to solicit his assistance for that war; and was at the Parthian court, when the battle happened; by the ill success of which being discouraged from returning, he continued in that country, and having prevailed with king Orodes to undertake this war, he was sent with Pacorus, the king's son, to command under him (88).

(F) Appian tells us, that Antony, meeting Domitius in the Ionian sea, drew up his fleet in line of battle, and advanced in person against him with five galleys only. Plancus, who was then with Antony, did not approve of his conduct, telling him, that Domitius, who had a fleet much more powerful than his, would neither submit, nor ever be reconciled, to him. Antony, without hearkening to his reasons, advanced boldly, and, as he drew near, one of his guards, who stood on the prow of his galley, cried out to Domitius to strike his flag to the triumvir, who was of a higher rank than he. At these words the republican admiral, as if he had been thunder-struck, submitted to the summons, saluted Antony as his general, and, coming on board his galley, delivered up to him the command of his fleet. This event is thus related by Appian, but we have chose to follow Velleius, who tells us with more appearance of truth, that Pollio had before-hand engaged Domitius to take party with Antony, by which signal piece of service he acquitted himself of the many obligations he owed him. To perpetuate the memory of this remarkable event, Antony caused a medal to be struck, or rather a piece of money to be coined, which is still to be seen, with the triumvir's head, and on the reverse the prow of a ship with the names of the two generals.

Octavianus's declared enemy. Upon this refusal Antony immediately blocked up the place, and at the same time dispatched one of his officers to Pompey in Sicily, inviting that general to join interest with him against Octavianus and invade Italy. Pompey came readily into the proposal; made a descent, and took several cities on the coast, while Antony pursued the siege of Brundisium with great vigor. Hereupon Octavianus, having drawn together his legions, and detached Agrippa with a considerable body against Pompey, marched with the rest to the relief of the besieged city. But his veterans refusing to draw their swords against Antony, he was obliged to hearken to an accommodation, which at length was brought about by the interposition and management of Cocceius, Pollio, and the famous Mecænas (G). This dangerous breach being made up, and all past offences and affronts mutually forgiven, the soldiers of the two armies, to make the friendship of their generals more lasting, desired it might be cemented with the ties of blood, and proposed a match between Antony and Octavianus's sister Octavia, who was lately become a widow by the death of Marcellus. Octavianus had a great veneration and tenderness for his sister; and to do her justice, none of her sex ever had a better claim to the esteem and veneration of mankind. For though she excelled all the women of her age, Cleopatra herself not excepted, in beauty, yet the charms of her person were far inferior to those of her mind. Though the queen of Egypt had so large a share in Antony's heart, yet the match was no sooner proposed to him, than he agreed to it with unexpressible satisfaction, at least in appearance. After this the two triumvirs had an interview, in which, after mutual embraces and promises of lasting friendship, they came to a new partition of the Roman empire; by virtue whereof Codropolis (H), a town of Illyricum, was to be the boundary of their dominions; all from that place westward was allotted to Octavianus, and all eastward to Antony: so that the former had Dalmatia, the two Gauls, Spain, and Sardinia, and the latter all the eastern provinces quite to the Euphrates. Africa was left to Lepidus, who had been sent by Octavianus with six legions into that province some time before the arrival of Antony. It was agreed, that Antony should make war upon the Parthians, and Octavianus upon Pompey, if he refused to submit to reasonable conditions. Italy was left common to both the triumvirs for the raising of forces wherewithal to carry on these wars. To these conditions Antony added, that Octavianus should pardon Domitius Abenobarbus, and likewise all those who had borne arms against him in the war of Perusia. The two generals thus reconciled marched together to Rome, where the marriage between Antony and the incomparable

(G) Caius Cilnius Mecænas, well known from the verses of Virgil and Horace, was descended from the ancient kings of Hebruria, but contented himself with the degree of a Roman knight. The Cilnian family was, according to Livy (89), one of the most illustrious of Hebruria. As for the surname of Mecænas, it was probably borrowed from some place belonging to the family; at least Varro tells us, that all the Latin names ending in as denote some place. Pliny speaks of the wines of Mecænatium, and ranks them among the best of Italy: Cæsenatia vina, says he, & Mecænatia (90). This illustrious Roman was a man of great politeness and generosity, which towards men of letters knew no bounds, whence those, who ever since his time have set up for encouragers of learning, have in all ages been honoured with his name. Sint Mecænates, non deerunt, Flacce, Marones, says Martial. But Mecænas was not only a generous patron to the learned; he was himself thoroughly acquainted with all the branches of polite literature, and would have proved an excellent orator, had he not been given too much to his pleasures. Ingeniosus vir ille fuit, says Seneca of him (91), magnum exemplum Romanæ eloquentiæ daturus, nisi illum enervasset felicitas, imo castrasset; and elsewhere (92), Habuit Mecænas grande & virile ingenium, nisi ipse illud discinxisset. After the battle of Philippi he interceded with Octavianus in favour of Horace, and obtained his pardon, though he had served under Brutus in quality of legionary tribune. He protected Virgil, and by his interest got his farm restored to him, which Octavianus's soldiers had seized. He was one of Augustus's chief favourites, and served him to the last with the utmost fidelity. He was a man of great penetration and address in managing the most difficult affairs; but liked his pleasures too much to engage in business, when he could decline it without disgusting his master, the gaining of whose favour was the height of his ambition. Several writers, especially Juvenal and Seneca, reproach him, and not undeservedly, with luxury, indolence, and effeminacy. But of this truly generous and bountiful patron of learning, Meibomius has wrote an intricate volume under the title of Mecænas, to which we refer our readers.

(H) This city is called by Appian Scodra, the situation whereof agrees with that of Codropolis. Scodra, now known to the Turks by the name of Escodar, and to the Italians by that of Scutari, was anciently the capital of the country of the Labeates, a people of Illyricum, and is at present the chief city of Albania. It stands on the river Drilo, now the Drino, about sixty miles east of Ragusa. This city, which was the bulwark of Illyricum on the side of Macedon, and looked upon as one of the best fortified and most inaccessible cities in the world, is often mentioned by Livy, and the other Roman writers, who give an account of the war between the republic and Gentius king of Illyricum. Florus was certainly mistaken, when he placed Scodra in Macedon, and styled it the metropolis of that kingdom.

able Octavia was solemnized with the utmost pomp and magnificence. When the ceremony was over, Antony, to give Octavianus an undeniable proof of the sincerity of his intentions, discovered to him, that Salvidienus (I), one of his lieutenants, had offered him his troops and his service, when Octavianus sent him into Spain, and that he had repeated the same offer at Brundisium. Hereupon Octavianus accused him of treachery before the senate, who declared him an enemy to the people of Rome, sentenced him to death, and ordered thanks to be publicly returned to the gods for the discovery of the treason. At the same time, Manius, of whom we have spoke above, was by Antony's orders put to death, as having been the chief author of the late disturbances ^m.

In the mean time, Pompey, who was master at sea, keeping all the ports of Italy, blocked up with his numerous fleets, Rome was reduced to the utmost extremity for want of provisions, especially of corn, which was become so dear, that the people were ready to starve. Hereupon Antony pressed his colleague either to come to an accommodation with Pompey, or oblige him by a vigorous war to recall his fleet, and leave the sea open for trade and navigation. Octavianus was more inclined to war, Pompey having lately taken from him the islands of Sardinia and Corfica; but as he wanted money to carry it on, with Antony's approbation he laid two taxes on all the inhabitants of Rome and Italy, the one of four drachmas and a half for every slave, the other on all legacies. This so provoked the populace, already pinched with hunger, that they rose in opposition to these edicts, assaulted Octavianus in the forum, and would have torn him to pieces, had not Antony hastened to his assistance with a body of troops, which was incamped at the gates of the city. The rabble was soon dispersed, and several of them killed, and their bodies thrown into the Tiber; but, as the famine still continued, the populace, notwithstanding the punishment of a few, grew daily more outrageous. Antony therefore, fearing a general insurrection, wrote to Lucius Scribonius Libo, who was then in Sicily with Pompey his son-in-law, inviting him to Rome to treat there of an accommodation between Octavianus, Pompey, and himself. Pompey was overjoyed at this proposal, as was also Staius Murcus; but Menas, whom some writers call Menodorus, one of Pompey's enfranchised slaves and a sea officer of great experience and bravery, not only opposed it, but with groundless insinuations intirely estranged Pompey from Murcus, who pressed him with great earnestness to make up all differences with the triumvirs, and restore Italy to its former tranquillity. Hereupon Murcus retired to Syracuse, where he was murdered by some slaves, whom Pompey afterwards caused to be executed to clear himself from the murder. It was, however, commonly believed, that Menas had put him to death by Pompey's orders. But, notwithstanding Menas's opposition, Pompey allowed Libo to go to Rome, in compliance with Antony's invitation, where he persuaded Octavianus and Antony to come to an interview with Pompey, that they might, in person and face to face, discuss their pretensions, and put an end to their differences. To this Pompey consented at the earnest request of his officers, and advanced with his fleet to the promontory formed by mount Misenus, where he and Libo in a galley, and the two triumvirs on a kind of mole made for that purpose, exposed their mutual claims and pretensions. Pompey demanded to be admitted into the triumvirate instead of Lepidus, whose authority declined daily. This demand seemed very reasonable to Pompey, but quite otherwise to Antony and Octavianus; so that, after a warm and long dispute, they parted without coming to any resolution. Pompey, who knew he had it in his power to reduce Rome and all Italy to the utmost extremity, and force the inhabitants to take up arms against the triumvirs, was for breaking off the conference and returning to Sicily. But Libo advised him to stay and continue the negotiations, at least

(I) Salvidienus was the son of a poor peasant, and spent his youth in looking after cattle. While he was thus meanly employed, his head one day appeared to his companions, as if in a flame. This he looked upon as a prognostic of some extraordinary good fortune, and therefore soon after lifted himself in the army, where by his valour he rose to the highest posts. He attended Cæsar in most of his wars, and as he had on all occasions distinguished himself in a very eminent manner, the dictator had named him one of his consuls, who were to govern the republic in his absence, though Salvidienus had not yet been admitted into the senate. Upon the dictator's death, he out of gratitude sided with his son Octavianus, and had a great share in all his victories. But afterwards, thinking Octavianus did not reward him according to his deserts, he offered his service to Antony, who, by basely betraying him, was the occasion of his death.

least by deputies, which he did accordingly. The second day he dropped his pretension to a place in the triumvirate, but proposed the following preliminaries : 1. That those, who had been concerned in the death of Cæsar should only be banished, and be at liberty to chuse for their exile what place they pleased. 2. That such, as had been proscribed on any other account whatsoever, should be allowed to return to Rome. 3. That the latter should be restored to the possession of their lands and fortunes. Antony and Octavianus absolutely rejected the two first articles, and only consented that those, who were not in the number of the conspirators, should be allowed to purchase their estates. Most part of those who were about Pompey, tired with so long and destructive a war, and dreading the fate of Murcus, declared, that they were willing to return to Rome, even upon the conditions proposed by the triumvirs; which so displeased Pompey, that in the transport of his passion he tore his robe, calling those, who submitted to such shameful conditions, vile traitors and cowardly deserters. Menas, said he, is the only true friend I have in the world; Menas alone has given me wholesome and disinterested advice. However, at the earnest intreaties of his mother Mutia, of Julia, Antony's mother, and of Libo, his father-in-law, he consented to a second interview, in which, after three days debate, the following articles were agreed to by the contending parties.

“ 1. That Pompey should be left in possession of Sicily, Sardinia, Corfica, and the adjacent islands, and should over and above have Peloponnesus yielded up to him. 2. That he should have the privilege of demanding the consulate, though absent, and of discharging that office by any of his friends. 3. That the dignity of pontifex maximus should be conferred upon him, and seventy thousand great sesterces restored to him out of his father's confiscated estate. 4. That such as had taken refuge with him merely out of fear, should be allowed to return and enjoy their whole estate; and that the proscribed persons, who were not guilty of Cæsar's death, should have only the fourth part of their estates restored to them. 5. That trade and navigation should be free; that Pompey should withdraw his troops from Italy; that he should suffer no inroads or descents to be made upon the coasts, nor build more ships. 6. That he should not for the future receive the slaves who fled to him; that those who had bore arms under him should be declared free, and that his legionaries, when the time of their service was expired, should have their share in the division of lands with those of Antony and Octavianus. 7. That he should immediately send to Rome the corn he had retained, oblige the Sicilians to pay annually what corn was due to the republic out of their island, and clear the seas of all pirates.” This treaty was signed by the three chiefs, and sent to Rome to be deposited there in the hands of the vestalsⁿ. They then agreed to treat each other in token of their sincere reconciliation; and it fell to Pompey's lot to make the first entertainment.

The triumvirs and Pompey treat each other.

Antony asked him where he designed to receive them? In Carinis, answered Pompey pleasantly: for the word carinæ in Latin signifies ships, and was likewise the name of a ward or part of the city, where Pompey the Great had a stately palace, which Antony had seized. Antony understood the raillery, but was not very quick at repartees. On the day appointed for the entertainment, Pompey, having brought his galley near the shore, and made a bridge to it from the promontory, received his two guests with great civility and politeness. And here Octavianus seemed to have forgot his usual wariness and circumspection; and this entertainment would have cost both him and his colleague dear, had not Pompey been endowed with a truly great and generous soul. For while they were at table, and Pompey and Cæsar, growing warm with wine, began to rally Antony upon his amours and fondness for the fair Egyptian queen, Menas approaching Pompey, You have now a fair opportunity, he whispered him in the ear, of revenging the death of your father and brother, and making yourself master of the whole Roman empire; 'tis but cutting the cable, leave the rest to me. The blow was sure, and the temptation violent, Pompey's fleet being drawn up in order of battle, and all the triumvirs forces ashore. However, the generous Roman scorning to purchase the empire of the world at the expence of his honour, after a short pause, Menas, said he, may forfeit his word and reputation, but that is not becoming the son of Pompey. 'Tis a great pity we have the characters of illustrious men only from historians, who, either out of fear or flattery, cry down the enemies of the princes, whose favour they courted. Velleius Paterculus, who wrote in the time of Augustus, and has in his history

a history miserably perverted truth, or utterly suppressed it, paints Pompey in the worst colours. But the greatness of mind which he displayed on this occasion against his own interest, is sufficient to bely that mercenary sycophant, and the other flatterers of the Cæsars, who ought to have had some regard to his memory in consideration of this generous action, which, in spite of all their disguises, and false representations, will recommend his name to the latest posterity. Plutarch relates this matter somewhat differently; for according to him Pompey returned this answer to the proposal of Menas; This you might have done without imparting it to me; but now let us make the best of our present condition, for I cannot prevail upon myself to violate my faith once given. From this answer it appears, that so great an advantage, joined to the pleasure of revenge, was a kind of surprise upon his generosity; but it served only to make it break out with greater lustre in rejecting a perfidious action, what profit soever might accrue from it^o. Antony and Octavianus treated Pompey in their turns with great demonstrations of seeming friendship; for the confirming of which, and cementing it with new ties, Pompey, who was sincere, proposed a match between his daughter and M. Marcellus, the son of Octavia by her former husband; which Octavianus con- Pompey's daughter betrothed to M. Marcellus Octavianus's nephew. fessing to, they both entered into the usual engagements, Pompey for his daughter, and Octavianus for his nephew, who was at that time but an infant. This is the famous M. Marcellus, whom Octavianus had appointed his heir in case he had no issue male of his own, and whose virtues are so highly commended by the prince of the Latin poets^p. Before the three chiefs parted, they named consuls for the four following years, viz. Antony and Libo for the first, Octavianus and Pompey for the second, Domitius and Sofius for the third, and Antony and Cæsar for the fourth. The consuls of this year, in which the treaty was concluded, were Cn. Domitius Calvinus and C. Asinius Pollio, who had succeeded L. Antonius and P. Servilius Vatia Isauricus; but before their year expired, others, namely L. Cornelius Balbus and P. Canidius Crassus, on what account we know not, were substituted in their room^q.

AND now all differences being composed, and for a while an end put to the civil wars, Pompey, taking his leave of Antony and Octavianus, returned to Sicily, and the other two to Rome, where they were welcomed with loud acclamations of the people, overjoyed to see themselves at length delivered from a cruel famine, which had begun to rage with great fury in the capital, and all the provinces of Italy. The joy of the people was doubled upon the return of many illustrious citizens, who had been proscribed by the triumvirs, or forced to fly their country through fear of falling into Octavianus's hands after the surrender of Perusia. Among these were L. Aruntius, M. Junius Silanus, C. Sentius Saturninus, M. Titius, M. Claudius Tiberius Nero, M. Cicero, the son of the orator, and many other citizens of great distinction; who after having assured Pompey of their eternal acknowledgments, returned to their native country, where they were received with those marks of esteem and affection which were due to their merit. The praises of Pompey, who had the glory of saving so many worthy men, and restoring them to their former rank, were in the mouth of every true Roman. And now Antony and Octavianus, after a short stay at Rome (K), Octavianus took leave of each other, and quitting the capital, set out, the former for Greece, and the latter for Gaul. Some nations beyond the Alps having attempted to shake off the yoke, Octavianus, to whose share Gaul was fallen, marched against them in person, and having easily reduced them, repassed the Alps, and stopped in Hetruria. As for Antony, he dispatched Ventidius into Asia to put a stop to the inroads of the Parthians, but went himself no farther than Athens, where he spent the winter with his new wife Octavia in the same excesses of luxury, folly, and childish diversions,

(K) While Antony and Octavianus staid together at Rome after the conclusion of the peace, they frequently diverted themselves with drawing lots, playing at dice, &c. when Antony was constantly the loser. As this gave him a great deal of uneasiness, one day, while he was quite out of patience, an Egyptian, who was with him, and was deemed very skilful in the calculation of nativities, told him, that though the fortune that attended him was bright and glorious, yet it was overshadowed by that of Octavianus; he therefore advised him to keep himself at a distance from that young man: For your genius, said he, dreads his. Yours is proud and brave, when absent from him, but in the presence of his unmanly and dejected. This, no doubt, the impostor said to make his court to Cleopatra by forcing Antony to leave Rome, and return to Egypt; wherein he succeeded; for Antony, who put great confidence in the skill of the Egyptian astrologer, left Rome soon after (93).

as he had done the former with Cleopatra at Alexandria. Laying aside the ensigns of his authority, he appeared at all the public games and exercises in the Grecian habit, like a private citizen of Athens. He often visited the academy, and the Lyceum, spending sometimes whole days in hearing the disputes and conferences of the philosophers. While he thus led an idle life at Athens, Ventidius his lieutenant was signalizing himself in the war, which he had been appointed to carry on against the Parthians. We have given elsewhere^r a distinct account of the remarkable victories gained over that warlike nation by the brave Ventidius, and therefore shall not trouble the reader here with a tedious repetition of the same transactions. When news was brought to Antony of the signal advantages gained by his lieutenant, he gave a public entertainment to all the Greeks of any rank, exhibited sports and shews, and presided at them in person as moderator. As he loved wine, he was wonderfully pleased with the title of Bacchus, which divinity he took upon him to personate in a procession he made upon the joyful tidings of the success of his arms in the east. During these public rejoycings the Greeks set no bounds to their flattery; they fell prostrate before the pretended Bacchus, beseeching him to marry Minerva the tutelar deity of their city. Antony, displeased with this gross flattery, consented to the match, but asked a thousand talents for the portion of the goddess. Your father Jupiter, answered one of the Athenians, required no fortune with your mother Semele. 'Tis true, replied Antony; but Jupiter was rich, and I want money. Antony would abate nothing of the sum, which was levied upon all the inhabitants, who revenged themselves, according to their custom, with satires and lampoons, of which his amours with Cleopatra were the chief subject. But he laughed at their jests, and took their money, though Dellius, to mortify them the more, gravely represented to him, that he acted therein against the Roman laws, which allowed three years for the payment of a portion^s.

In the mean time news was brought to Antony of a second victory gained by Ventidius over the Parthians, for which he made great rejoycings; but being informed at the same time, that Pacorus was making vast preparations with a design to invade Syria anew, and thinking it no ways consistent with his reputation to continue idle at Athens, and suffer his lieutenant to rob him of the whole glory of this war, he assembled his troops early in the spring, and reassumed with the marks of his dignity all the majesty of a Roman general. When his army was ready to march, he made himself a garland of the olive-tree consecrated to Minerva, and filled a vessel with the water of the Clepsydra to carry along with him (L). At length he left Athens after having made a grand entertainment for all the inhabitants of that populous city, and marched with all his forces into the east. But before he got thither, Ventidius gained a third victory far more glorious than the other two; whereby he fully revenged the death of Crassus, and redeemed the honour of the Roman name, which had suffered much ever since the battle of Carrhæ: for Pacorus himself, with above twenty thousand of his best men, was slain in this battle, of which we have given a particular account in our history of the Parthians^t. Had Ventidius pursued all the advantages of this victory, he might have extended the bounds of the Roman empire to the banks of the Tigris; but not thinking it prudent to push his good fortune any further, for fear of giving Antony umbrage, he turned his arms against those who had revolted in Syria and Phœnice during the late war. Pursuant to this design, when Antony arrived, he was besieging Samosata, the capital of Commagene, whither Antiochus, king of that country, had retired. Antony on his coming thither dismissed this brave commander, and sent him to Rome to demand of the senate and people the honours of a triumph, being glad to get rid of a subaltern, whose glory eclipsed that of his general. Antiochus from the beginning of the siege had offered to Ventidius a thousand talents for his pardon, and promised an intire obedience and submission to all Antony's commands. But as Antony was then on his march, Ventidius ordered him to send his proposals to him; which he did accordingly; but Antony rejecting them, the besieged dreading his resentment, defended the place with such vigour and intrepidity, that the

a the Roman general began to repent his not accepting the first offer, and was in the end glad to come to an accommodation with Antiochus for three hundred talents, that he might raise the siege with honour, which otherwise he feared he should be forced to do in a shameful manner, his soldiers being highly displeased with his dismissing Ventidius, under whose conduct they had gained so many signal victories^u. After this, Antony, having appointed Sofius his lieutenant in Cilicia, Syria, and Palestine, left the army under his command, and returned to Ostavia at Athens. He returns to Athens.

In the mean time new disputes arising between Pompey and Ostavianus, the latter was wholly intent on making the necessary preparations for war, being determined to lay hold of the first opportunity that offered to invade Sicily. The late treaty of peace had regulated their pretensions, but not their ambition; and that animosity between Julius Cæsar and Pompey the Great, which had laid waste the Roman world, was still subsisting in the minds of their children. The apparent subject of their quarrel was Peloponnesus, which had been yielded to Pompey, as we have observed above, in virtue of the treaty. Ostavianus pretended that the tributes, owing from that province to the republic before the treaty, were due to the triumvirs, and that Pompey ought to be responsible for them. On the other hand Pompey maintained, that they had yielded him that country free from all charges. As a breach was likely to ensue, Pompey caused his old galleys to be refitted, and several new ones to be built. This was contrary to the late treaty, and therefore a plausible pretence for Ostavianus to invade Sicily. With this view he reinforced his army with new levies, and assembled what ships he could on the coasts of the Adriatic and Tyrrhenian seas. Pompey, informed of these preparations, blocked up the ports of Italy anew, and in a short time reduced the populous capital to its former condition. The people, threatened again with a famine, began to complain, and seemed disposed to rise, if their grievances were not soon redressed. A fine peace indeed! said they, what have we gained by it but to have four tyrants instead of three? But Ostavianus, who had a numerous army on foot, continued his preparations for war both by sea and land, without hearkening to the complaints of the discontented populace. He wrote to Antony, desiring him to leave Athens for a while, and pass over into Italy, that they might confer together about the most proper measures for the crushing of Pompey, their common rival. He likewise acquainted Lepidus with his design, who was then in Africa, which had fallen to his share in the last division of the Roman dominions, exhorting him to get ready his fleet with all possible expedition, that they might act in concert, and both invade Sicily at the same time. Antony in compliance with his request came to Brundisium, but not finding him there at the time appointed, he returned to Athens; whether out of some distrust he had of Ostavianus, or because he was frightened by certain prodigies, is uncertain (M). Whatever his reasons were, he reimbarqued and returned to Athens, leaving a letter for Ostavianus, wherein he exhorted him to stand to the conditions of the last treaty. As for Lepidus, who was a man of a lazy and indolent disposition, he spent the whole summer in making preparations, and did not leave Africa till the following year; so that the whole burden of the war fell upon Ostavianus, whose boundless ambition would allow him no rest, till he had got rid of so powerful a rival, and made himself master of the wealthy island he possessed. However, in the height of his cares, and warlike preparations, he found no small relief in the agreeable conversation of Livia, with whose charms and refined wit he was so taken, that in the end he divorced his own wife Scribonia (N), and married her, though then big with child, her husband Claudius Tiberius Nero not daring to withstand the inclinations of so powerful a lover. Livia had one son by Tiberius, who bore his father's name, and was, three months after her marriage with Ostavianus, New disputes between Pompey and Ostavianus.

(M) One of his centries was devoured by wolves, no part of his body being left intire, except his face, which was a very bad omen. The inhabitants of Brundisium told him, that at break of day they had seen a wolf come out of his tent.

(N) Scribonia was the sister of Scribonius Libo father-in-law to Pompey. Ostavianus married her with a political view, which was to divert Pompey by that alliance from siding with Antony, who seemed inclined to espouse the quarrel of his brother Lucius, and his wife Fulvia; Libo with Saturninus and some other senators had already attempted to conclude a league between Antony and Pompey. Ostavianus therefore, to gain Libo, who had a great ascendant over his son-in-law, married his sister, and had by her the famous Julia, of whom we shall have occasion to speak in the sequel of this history. But as in that marriage he had consulted his interest, and not his inclination, he divorced her to marry Livia, who was accounted the most agreeable woman of her age.

Octavianus, brought to bed of another, named Drusus. But of these two children, ^a and their mother Livia, we shall have frequent occasion to speak in the sequel of this history. The charms of Livia, however powerful, were not able to divert Octavianus from the pursuit of his ambitious views. He continued with the same ardor his war-like preparations, recalled the legions he had left in Transalpine Gaul, and assembled a great number of vessels in the ports of Hebruria, and at Ravenna on the Adriatic sea. But as his fleet was not yet in a condition to cope with that of Pompey, he must have put off his Sicilian expedition till the return of Antonv, and the arrival of Le-

This Pompey looked upon as a declaration of war, and therefore immediately sent out Menecrates, another freedman, and a mortal enemy to Menas, with a numerous squadron, to ravage the coasts of Italy, which he did accordingly; but being met on his return by ^c a squadron of Octavianus's fleet, commanded by C. Calvisius, and his antient rival Menas, a bloody engagement ensued, in which Menecrates and Menas distinguished themselves above the other commanders, the hatred, which they bore each other, animating them more than glory did others. They were both men of great courage and intrepidity, and therefore, regardless of all dangers, fought with a fury hardly to be expressed. At length, after a long and most obstinate dispute between the two rivals, Menecrates being dangerously wounded, Menas boarded his galley, and made himself master of it. Hereupon Menecrates, chusing rather to die, than fall into the hands of his mortal enemy, threw himself into the sea, and perished in the waves. Upon his death Demochares, another freedman, taking upon him the command of the fleet, ^d attacked Calvisius's squadron so warmly, that he forced him to give way, took several of his galleys, sunk others, and drove the rest against the rocks near the shore, where most of them were dashed to pieces; so that Calvisius escaped by the favour of the night only with a few galleys, and took refuge with Menas in the bay of Cumæ^w.

Octavianus, who was then at Tarentum, where he had assembled a numerous fleet, upon the first news of this engagement, resolved to pass the straits of Messana, and join Calvisius and Menas, for whom he was in great pain. But being attacked in that narrow passage by Pompey and Demochares, who was returned to Messana, most of his ships were either sunk, or dashed to pieces against the rocks. Octavianus himself gained the shore with the utmost difficulty, where he narrowly escaped falling into ^e the enemy's hands, who having landed and surrounded him, thought themselves sure of their prey. But the knowledge he had of the country saved him; for being well acquainted with the defiles of a neighbouring mountain, by by-ways he reached the top of it, and there with a few attendants lay concealed. Having avoided one danger, he fell into another. A slave of Æmilius Paulus, whose father had been proscribed by Octavianus, seeing the triumvir without his usual guards, thought this a favourable opportunity of being revenged on him for his cruelty towards his old master; and therefore accosting him with a dagger, attempted to stab him; but missing his blow, as it was then very dark, he was immediately cut in pieces by the triumvir's attendants^z. While Octavianus lay concealed on the top of the mountain, far from all danger, Cor- ^f nificius, who commanded under him, still maintained the combat with great bravery; and having sunk Demochares's ship, continued fighting, notwithstanding the great loss he had sustained, till sun-set, when Calvisius and Menas appearing unexpectedly with their squadrons, Pompey thought it adviseable to sound a retreat. The next morning Octavianus from the top of his mountain had the mortification to see most of his vessels stranded upon the coast, some of them half burnt, others still in a flame, and the sea to a great distance covered with the wreck. But what gave him the greatest uneasiness was to see the enemy's fleet advancing full sail against Menas and Calvisius, who a who were no ways in a condition to withstand them. However, they drew up, but as they were ready to engage, a violent storm arose, and the sea began to run very high. Hereupon Pompey retired into the port of Messana; but Octavianus's ships were for the most part either sunk with all the men on board, or dashed to pieces against the rocks and the shore. As the storm lasted all night, Octavianus, to avoid so dismal a sight, went early next morning to Vibonium, or Vibo, a city of Brutium, fleet ship-wrecked. whence he sent orders to his lieutenants to guard with great care the coasts of Italy, lest Pompey should attempt an invasion. But he was so far from improving the advantages he had gained, by attacking his rival on the continent, that by an unpardonable negligence he suffered the poor remains of his shattered fleet to retire unmolested to Vibonium ^x.

b AND now Octavianus, finding himself without ships or money, and at the same time the people at Rome being ready to rise for want of corn, he dispatched Mecenas to Antony, soliciting his assistance against their common enemy. Antony, who was then in Syria, as we read in Dio, or at Athens, as Appian has it, promised to assist his colleague to the utmost of his power; and accordingly, having with all possible diligence assembled his fleet, he sailed for Italy with three hundred ships. But in the mean time Octavianus, receiving news of a complete victory gained by Agrippa over the Antony arrives in Italy. revolted Gauls, he began to think that he stood no more in need of Antony's assistance, and would willingly have dispensed with his civility. He thought him already too powerful, and therefore under various pretences would fain have declined going to meet him. These proceedings highly displeased Antony, who had for a long time been jealous of his colleague. However, as he designed to exchange with Octavianus part of his fleet, which would be of no use to him in his intended expedition against the Parthians, for land-forces, he waited a long time for him at Tarentum, though he had been refused admittance at Brundisium. At length he began to grow very uneasy, and to complain of Octavianus in most bitter and reproachful terms. Whereupon Octavia, who had attended him from Greece, though then big with child, prevailed upon him to send her to her brother, not doubting, but she should easily clear up all their jealousies and suspicions. As she was on her journey to Rome, she met her brother, and had a conference with him in the presence of his two friends Mecenas and Agrippa, whom she was willing to have for witnesses of what passed between them. After she had with great prudence and address answered the complaints of her brother against her husband, she conjured both him and his two favourites with tears in her eyes, to consider her circumstances, and not suffer her, instead of the most fortunate of women, to become the most miserable; for at present, said she, the eyes of the whole Roman people are fixed upon me, on account of the ties, which bind me to two of the greatest men in the world, being wife to the one, and sister to the other. If rash counsels prevail; and war ensues, I shall be miserable without redress; for on what side soever victory falls I shall be sure to be the loser. Octavianus, softened by the intreaties of a sister, whom he loved with the greatest tenderness, consented to an interview with Antony, for which a place was chosen between Metapontum and Tarentum upon a river bearing the name of the latter. Antony came thither the first, and as soon as he saw Octavianus advancing, he leaped into a boat, in order to go and receive him on the other side the river. Octavianus, not to be overcome by him in civility, did the same, so that the two boats met in the midst of the river. After they had embraced each other, they had a friendly contest on which side they should land. Antony was for landing on Octavianus's side, and Octavianus on Antony's; but Octavianus at length prevailed, under pretence of waiting on his sister, who was returned to Tarentum. They walked together to the town, where Octavianus spent the night without any other guards about his person, but those of Antony, who likewise went the next day without guards, and passed the night in Octavianus's camp. All little differences between them being made up in an amicable manner, it was agreed, that Octavianus should give Antony two of his legions to be employed against the Parthians, and that Antony in return should leave with him an hundred armed galleys. Appian says, that Antony yielded to Octavianus an hundred and fifty ships, and Octavianus to Antony twenty thousand men. Besides this, Octavia obtained for her husband twenty small ships, or, as Appian has it, ten triremes, of her brother, and of her brother a thousand foot for her husband. That their friendship and union might be more lasting, Octavianus betrothed his daughter Julia, whom he had by Scribonia, to Antyllus, Antony's

Antony's son; and they both agreed, the five years of the triumvirate being now expired, to prolong their authority for five years more, without consulting either the senate or people. After this Antony departed once more for Syria. Octavia accompanied him as far as Corcyra, whence, that she might not be exposed to the dangers of that expedition, he sent her back into Italy, to remain there till he had ended that war, committing her, and his children, both by her and his former wife Fulvia, to the care of Octavianus ^v. It is not unlikely, that Antony had already proposed returning to Egypt, and therefore was glad to get rid of Octavia, that she might not disturb him in the enjoyment of his beloved Cleopatra.

Octavianus, upon the departure of his colleague, began to make vast preparations both by sea and land for his intended expedition against Pompey. He appointed Agrippa commander in chief of his navy, and that brave officer in a few months assembled with indefatigable industry a fleet able to cope with Pompey's. And now both the sea and land-forces being ready to enter upon action, Octavianus resolved to invade the island in three different places at the same time: Lepidus, whom he had sent for from Africa, was to land at Lilybæum on the south of the island; Statilius Taurus, who was at Tarentum, on the east side at cape Pachynum; and Octavianus himself on the western coast at cape Pelorum. As for Agrippa, he was with a numerous squadron to cruise off Mylæ, a city on the northern coast of the island, where Pompey was said to have assembled all his naval forces. Menas had already, out of his natural levity, abandoned the party of Octavianus, and returned to Pompey with his squadron, not thinking himself considered, as he deserved, by his new master. Calvisius, though an officer of great experience in maritime affairs, was not employed in this expedition, he having incurred the displeasure of Octavianus, for suffering himself to be over-reached by Menas, when he deserted to Pompey. And now all things being ready, Octavianus's fleets, though in different ports, set sail on the day agreed on, which was that of the new moon in the month of July, both that day and month being sacred to the memory of Julius Cæsar. But they had scarce put to sea, when a violent storm arising, defeated all Octavianus's measures. Statilius Taurus, foreseeing it, returned to Tarentum with the hundred and two ships he commanded; but the squadrons of Octavianus, Lepidus, and Agrippa, suffered much, that especially of Octavianus, who on this occasion lost six of the ships, which Octavia had given him, twenty-six others, and a great number of light vessels, called by the Latins Liburnicæ. His own ship with much ado made the bay of Velia, where, as in all dangers he had a particular care of his own person, he went ashore, leaving his friends and mariners to struggle all night with the winds and waves. When he reached the shore, and found himself out of danger, rage succeeded fear, and transported him to such a degree, that he could not forbear venting it upon Neptune himself, crying out, I shall conquer at length; yes, I shall conquer, Neptune, in spite of thee. Lepidus, who was come from Africa with twelve legions, and five thousand Numidian horse, on board eighty ships of war and a thousand transports, after having lost some of his vessels, landed at Lilybæum in spite of the opposition he met with from Plennius, whom Pompey had posted there with some legions and a great number of slingers and archers. All the other squadrons were driven back, and forced to make what ports they could. Pompey, looking upon these repeated shipwrecks in summer, when the sea is commonly calm, as visible tokens of the favour and protection of Neptune, returned him solemn thanks for his assistance, and was so elated with this unexpected success, as to style himself the son of Neptune. On the other hand, Octavianus thinking himself ill used by that deity, never forgave him; but caused his statue several years after to be removed from the circus, where the public games were celebrated. But his chief care at present was, to refit his fleet, recruit his forces, and prevent the disturbances which the news of this disaster might raise in Rome. Thither he dispatched Mecænas, who with his usual address soon calmed the minds of the people. At the same time, he went in person to the several ports, where his ships had taken shelter, and, by encouraging and amply rewarding the workmen, got his fleet refitted, and ready to put to sea again before the end of the summer. In this second attempt he was attended with better success than in the former; for Messala Corvinus landed safe with three legions, and encamped near Taurominium at a small distance from Lepidus; several other legions were set ashore, without meeting with any considerable opposition in a in other places of the island, and Statilius Taurus made himself master of cape Scylaceum on the continent, which Pompey had seized. But on the other hand Papias, one of Pompey's admirals, falling in with a squadron, which was conveying four legions to Lepidus, attacked the transports, took some of them, sunk others, and obliged the rest to return to Africa. In this encounter two of Lepidus's legions were either taken, drowned, or cut in pieces. In the mean time, Octavianus, who was then with his fleet in the port of Strongyle, one of the Æolian islands, observing all the coast of Sicily on that side lined with Pompey's forces, left the command of the fleet to Agrippa, and returned to Vibonium to hasten the departure of the rest of his ships. Upon his departure, Agrippa, who longed for an opportunity of signalizing his valour, made himself master of Hiera, one of the Æolian islands, a place of the utmost importance. From thence he steered his course towards Mylæ, with a design to surprise Demochares, who had in that port a fleet of forty sail under his command. But being informed that Papias was advancing to the relief of Demochares, he thought it adviseable first to engage the former; which he did accordingly, and gained a complete victory, Papias, who behaved on this occasion with unparalleled bravery, having lost thirty galleys, and Agrippa only five. Upon the news of this victory, Octavianus, who was then at Scylaceum, thinking Pompey was blocked up by Agrippa, imbarqued the flower of his army, and landed in the neighbourhood of Taurominium, with a design to besiege that place. But, in the mean time, Pompey appearing unexpectedly on the coast with his fleet, both Octavianus and his troops were struck with such terror, that Pompey might have easily cut them in pieces. But he, as the day was already far spent, instead of attacking them without loss of time, retired with his land-forces to a neighbouring mountain, and there spent the night, which the enemy employed in fortifying their camp. Next morning by break of day Octavianus, not doubting but Pompey would attack his camp, left the defence of it to his lieutenants, L. Cornificius, Titinius, and Carcus, and went on board his fleet. But flying from one danger, he fell into another; for Pompey, not thinking it adviseable to attack his camp, which was well fortified, fell upon his fleet, and soon convinced his rival, that if he wanted conduct, he did not want courage. Octavianus's fleet was put to flight at the first onset, several of his ships were taken, and the rest, a small number only excepted, either sunk or burnt. As the battle was fought near the shore, such of Octavianus's men as could swim took refuge in the camp of Cornificius, but the rest were for the most part either drowned or taken. As for Octavianus himself, he made his escape in a boat, and leaving his troops ashore to shift for themselves, made Abala, a city on the coast of Italy, being attended only by one domestic. As he was quite spent with the fatigue he had undergone, and overwhelmed with grief and chagrin on account of his defeat, he lay down on the open shore, and fell into so sound a sleep, that he was carried without waking by some officers, who knew him, to a camp, which Messala had formed in that neighbourhood for the defence of the coast (O). His first care after he awaked was, to provide for the safety of the troops he had left in Sicily under the command of Cornificius. With this view he immediately dispatched a messenger to Agrippa, enjoining him to send forthwith a strong body of legionaries under the command of Laronius to their assistance. And indeed Cornificius was reduced to the utmost extremity. He could receive no provisions by sea, which was beset by the enemy's victorious fleet, and all convoys by land were intercepted by Pompey's Numidian cavalry. In this extremity he was forced to abandon his camp, without knowing what rout to take. At length he resolved to march towards Mylæ, which Agrippa had seized, but was so harassed all the way by the enemy's parties, that his men began to despair, and give themselves up for lost. Cornificius with his words and example supported their drooping courage, till they found themselves shut up by the enemy's troops in a narrow valley, called the fiery brook. As the ground was here covered all over with dust and ashes thrown out by mount Ætna, without any springs or rivulets, they must inevitably have perished with thirst, or surrendered at discretion, had not the succours sent by Agrippa, coming very seasonably, disengaged them from the desperate condition to which they were reduced. At the approach of the Roman legions, the Numidians retired, leaving Cornificius to pursue his march without

In the mean time, Octavianus returning to Sicily, had joined Agrippa in the neighbourhood of Tyndaris, where he was incamped with twenty-one legions, two thousand horse, and five thousand light-armed foot. From thence they both marched towards Messana, with a design to besiege that place, hoping thereby to draw Pompey to a battle, who had lodged all his military stores, provisions, and treasures, in that city. As they approached the place, Lepidus, whom Octavianus had acquainted with his design, joined them with all his sea and land forces. This triumvir, ever since his first landing in the island, had given Octavianus just reasons to suspect his intentions. He took indeed, upon his arrival, some small places on the coast, and besieged Plennius in Lilybæum; but afterwards acting only defensively, he suffered Octavianus to carry on the war by himself, without offering him the least assistance, as if he had maintained a private correspondence with Pompey. However, upon motives, which he discovered soon after, he approved of Octavianus's plan, and came to join him with all his forces before Messana, which city was closely invested both by sea and land. Pompey, having assembled into one body all the troops he had dispersed up and down the island, posted himself at a small distance from Octavianus's camp, and at the same time drew together his several squadrons, ordering them to watch the motions of the enemy's fleet, which blocked up the mouth of the harbour. After several motions and slight engagements between the fleets as well as the land-forces, Pompey challenged Octavianus to put an end to their differences by a sea fight with three hundred ships on a side. This proposal was no-ways agreeable to Octavianus, who had not hitherto been attended with any great success by sea. However, depending upon the valour and experience of Agrippa on one side, and on the other suspecting the fidelity of Lepidus, who had according to some twelve, according to others twenty, legions under his command, he accepted the challenge; and a day was appointed for the decisive action. Great preparations were made on both sides for an event, which was to decide the fate of the contending parties. When the day agreed on, and impatiently wished for, by the two generals, came, both fleets appeared early in the morning drawn up in battalia between Mylæ and Naulocus; upon which the two armies ran to the shore, there being then a kind of truce between them, to behold from thence the action, on which their fate in great measure depended. The signal was given, and the engagement began with that fury, which is peculiar to men, who are more animated by private hatred and party-rage, as happens in civil wars, than by motives of glory and conquest. Agrippa behaved with his usual bravery, and Pompey, knowing all lay at stake, distinguished himself from the beginning of the action to the end in a very eminent manner. Never was victory disputed with more obstinacy, the soldiers as well as officers of both parties fighting, after the example of their generals, with incredible resolution and intrepidity. The sea was covered to a great distance with dead bodies, and nothing was heard but shouts of the soldiers and mariners encouraging each other, or cries of men perishing in the waves. The victory continued long doubtful, but at length all yielded to the valour and superior conduct of Agrippa, Pompey's fleet was put to flight, and that unfortunate Roman obliged, in spite of his utmost efforts, to own himself conquered. Of his numerous fleet only seventeen vessels escaped, the rest being taken, burnt, or sunk ³. Demochares, one of his admirals, was taken prisoner, but laid violent hands on himself, to avoid the disgrace of being led in triumph. Apollophanes, his other admiral, yielded up himself and his galley to Agrippa in the very beginning of the action. What became of Papias, another of his freedmen, in whom he placed great trust, we know not, none of the ancients making any mention of him in the account they give us of this great action. As for Menas, he had long before the battle with his usual inconstancy and perfidiousness abandoned Pompey the second time, and gone over with his squadron to Octavianus, who received him, rather to weaken the enemy's party, than to strengthen his own; for knowing he was not a man to be trusted, he gave him no command, and displaced all the officers of the squadron he brought with him. This treacherous wretch, whose courage and experience were worthy of a more noble

a noble mind; retired, if we believe Horace, with great wealth, and served afterwards in the post of a military tribune. The glory of this victory was intirely owing to Agrippa; for Octavianus, if Antony is to be credited, had not the courage even to look at the two navies drawn up in battalia, but in a great fright lay down in his galley with his eyes lifted up to heaven, like one beside himself, and continued in that posture, till Agrippa had put the enemy to flight. Some writers, to clear their hero from the reproach of cowardice, pretend, that at the time of the engagement he was overcome with so profound a sleep, that his friends with much ado waked him to give the word, and the signal for the charge. Be that as it will, it would seem very strange now-a-days, if the commander in chief of a fleet or army should say, by way of excuse for not discharging his duty during any memorable action, that he was asleep, and did not awake till the battle was over. Octavianus, however, did, in some degree, justice to the valour of Agrippa, honouring him with a blue standard, and a rostral crown, that is, a crown, whereof the flower-work represented the beaks of galleys. He deserved indeed a more substantial reward, having utterly destroyed the enemy's numerous fleet with the loss of three ships only of his own; but we shall soon see him raised to the greatest honours of the state, and distinguished by Octavianus, when absolute master of Rome, above all the subjects of the Roman empire. As for the unhappy Pompey, instead of repairing to his land-forces, and encouraging them with his presence, he left them at the discretion of the conqueror, and taking on board his daughter and some of his friends who were in Messana, together with the treasures he had lodged in that city, he passed the streights in the night, and steered his course towards Asia with seventeen galleys, the poor remains of a fleet of three hundred and fifty sail. His design was to throw himself upon the mercy of Antony, whose mother Julia he had formerly received and entertained with great civility, when she abandoned Rome, during the war of Perusia. Upon his retreat, Tisienus Gallus, one of his lieutenants, immediately submitted to the conqueror with all the forces under his command. As for Plennius, who commanded eight legions in Lilybæum, upon the first news of Pompey's defeat, he marched with incredible expedition to Messana, and threw himself into the place, before Octavianus or Agrippa had any intelligence of his design. But seeing there were no hopes of relief, he took the advantage of Octavianus's absence to capitulate with Lepidus, who granted him honourable conditions, and incorporated the troops he commanded among his own legions. Agrippa, whom Octavianus had left to carry on the siege with Lepidus, exclaiming against this unfair conduct, intreating him to wait till the arrival of his colleague, which at farthest would be, he said, next morning. But Lepidus, without hearkening either to his remonstrances or intreaties, received Plennius into his camp, and gave up the city to be plundered by his soldiers. Octavianus, arriving at break of day, sent some of his friends to his colleague's camp to complain in his name of these proceedings. Lepidus, who had now twenty-two legions under his command, answered with great haughtiness, that he would not suffer Octavianus to take upon him all the authority of the triumvirate, when he had an equal right to it. Upon this reply Octavianus, having first gained over by his emissaries the greatest part of Lepidus's officers, repaired to his camp attended with a strong body of horse, under pretence of making up matters with him in an amicable manner. He no sooner appeared, than Plennius's legions, whom he had already found means to debauch, flocked to him, offering him their service. Lepidus, alarmed at this unexpected attempt, fell upon Octavianus at the head of his guards, killed his shield-bearer close by him, wounded him, and obliged him to retire in some confusion. However, the next day Lepidus had the mortification to see himself abandoned by all his troops, who with their ensigns displayed marched out of their camp, in good order, to join his rival (P). The unhappy triumvir being thus left alone, quitted all the marks of his authority, and putting on a mourning robe, after having remained some time unregarded in the throng of those who made their submissions to Octavianus, threw himself at the feet of his colleague, and with great meanness begged his life, which was granted him with his estate, Octavianus who, notwithstanding the wound he received, went to the place, where the eagles of the legions were kept, and taking one of them, exhorted the legionaries to follow him, which they did accordingly, abandoning their own general.

(P.) Appian tells us, that Octavianus went alone to the camp of Lepidus, depending on his own merit, and the authority he had gained by his victories, Pompey's soldiers looking upon him with respect and drawing round him. Hereupon Lepidus ordered his guards to disperse them, and fall upon Octavianus,

Octavianus despising him too much to take it from him. Suetonius is the only writer, who ^a says, that Octavianus banished him to Circeii, a small town on the coast of Latium. That he attained to be one of the supreme governors of the Roman empire was entirely owing to fortune, he being a man without any wisdom, valour, or activity; and therefore, after he had thus fallen from the high station, to which fortune had raised him, he was no more regarded, but ended his life in obscurity and contempt. Thus the whole authority of the triumvirate devolved upon Antony and Octavianus, who held the Roman empire divided between them, the former having all the east from the borders of Illyricum and the Adriatic gulph, and the latter all the rest ^b.

No Roman general was ever at the head of so powerful an army as Octavianus was ^b at this time in Sicily. He had under his command forty-five legions, twenty-five thousand horse, one hundred and sixty thousand light-armed foot, and besides six hundred ships of war, without counting the smaller vessels, which were without number. His power was now almost equal to his ambition; but they were both ^c checked by the insolence of his soldiers, who scarce ever failed to allay the joy which his victories gave him, and to put a stop to his further conquests. The war in Sicily being now at an end, the legionaries, reflecting on their great numbers and strength, began to mutiny, and demand in a tumultuous manner their discharge, and the same rewards which had been bestowed on those who had overcome Brutus and Cassius in the plains of Philippi. Octavianus endeavoured to appease the mutineers, by telling them ^d that he deferred giving them the rewards which were due to their valour, till the return of Antony from the east: adding, that the Illyrians, who had declared war, were to be conquered before any thing else could be done. But the mutinous legionaries refused to march, till he had satisfied their demands. Hereupon the general, being at a loss what to do, caused several crowns, bracelets, spears, &c. to be brought out for such of the soldiers as had distinguished themselves in the war, and scarlet robes for the officers; but a tribune, by name Ofilius, told him with a great deal of insolence, That he might keep those bawbles for children; but as for his soldiers, nothing would satisfy them but money or land. At these words the whole army shouted, and Octavianus in a great passion came down from his tribunal, and withdrew. The audacious tribune disappeared that night, and was never after seen or heard of, no-body ^e doubting, but he had been privately dispatched by Octavianus's orders. This made the others more cautious, but not more tractable; for whenever Octavianus appeared, they cried out all with one voice, Money, or our discharge; insomuch, that he was at length obliged to dismiss those, whose time of service was expired, to the number of twenty thousand. The others he pacified with large promises, and a donative of five hundred drachmas a man, which he levied upon the Sicilians. After this, having settled the affairs of Sicily, he returned to Rome, where he was received with all possible demonstrations of joy: the senate in a body met him at the gates, and conducted him to the capitol, followed by all the people crowned with garlands; from the capitol, after he had returned thanks to the gods for the success of his arms, they attended him to his palace. The next day he assembled the senate, according to custom, in the temple of Bellona, where in a studied speech, which he caused afterward to be published, he gave the conscript fathers an account of his expedition, and assured them, that he had undergone so many toils and dangers with no other view, but to restore peace and tranquillity to Rome. When he had ended his speech, he withdrew; and the senators, who were no more swayed with the love of liberty, but a spirit of slavery, and the meanest flattery, decreed him such honours as he himself ^f was ashamed to assume. However, he gave them leave to erect a statue of gold to his honour in the forum with this inscription; To Cæsar, for having restored peace by sea and land, and to appoint an annual feast to be celebrated on the day he had overcome Pompey. A triumph was decreed him, but he was satisfied with an ovation, which honour he enjoyed on the ides of November ^c. After his ovation, he assembled the people, and having returned them thanks for the honour they had bestowed on him, he lessened the taxes, and forgave those who had hired houses of the public all the rents they owed to the treasury. Thus he began to court the favour of the people at the expence of the public, being determined to lay hold of the first opportunity that offered of crushing Antony, as he had done Pompey and Lepidus, and assuming the whole

a whole power to himself. As the city as well as the country had been greatly infested; during the late troubles, with thieves and robbers, he charged Sabinus, one of his lieutenants, to pursue them with fire and sword, and established at Rome several companies for the guard of the city under the command of an officer, whom he styled præfetus vigilum. By this means peace and tranquillity were restored, not to Rome only, but to all Italy; which together with the plenty he procured, being now master of Sicily, gained the affections of the people to such a degree, that some cities went even so far as to erect altars to their benefactor, especially after one generous action, which inspired them with a high opinion of his prudence and good-nature. He had found among Pompey's papers a great many letters to him from some of the chief men in the senate. These he brought into the forum, and before all the people threw them unopened into the fire, protesting, that he sacrificed his private resentments to the good of the public. At the same time he solemnly declared, that his intention was to resign his authority as soon as Antony should return from the Parthian war. This declaration, however insincere, absolutely gained him the hearts and affections of the undiscerning multitude, who immediately chose him tribune of the people for his life, hoping this new dignity might induce him to lay down the more odious title of triumvir. He readily accepted the perpetual tribuneship, which rendered his person sacred and inviolable; but put off the suppression of the triumvirate till the return of Antony, dispatching in the mean time Bibulus to impart to him his resolution. After this Octavianus left Rome, and marched at the head of his army against the Illyrians, who had shaken off the Roman yoke.

He courts and gains the affections of the people.

He is chosen perpetual tribune of the people.

dURING these transactions at Rome, Pompey occasioned great disturbances in the east. From Sicily he sailed to the island of Lesbos, where he was informed of the bad success which had attended Antony in his expedition against the Parthians. Hereupon he began to entertain thoughts of taking Antony's post in the east, or at least of sharing with him the empire. With this view he sent ambassadors to the kings of Pontus, Thrace, and Parthia, soliciting their friendship, and offering them very advantageous terms. At the same time, he drew together what troops he could, giving out that he had no other design but to assist Antony, and defend himself against Octavianus. Antony, informed of these proceedings, commanded Marcus Titius to take upon him the command of the army that was quartered in Sicily, and watch the motions of Pompey. Titius was ordered to receive him with all possible marks of honour, if he yielded up himself and his troops; but to cut both him and his army in pieces, if he refused to submit. But Pompey, before the arrival of Titius, had pulled off the mask, and taken several cities of Asia Minor, among the rest Nicæa and Nicomedia. Hereupon Titius, taking with him Furnius, Antony's lieutenant in Asia, marched against him, and, having defeated his small army, obliged him to surrender at discretion. As soon as Antony had notice of his being taken, he wrote to Titius to put him to death; but soon after changing his mind, he sent a second letter, ordering his lieutenant to save him. But the second messenger arriving before the first, Titius perversely interpreting the last order he received to be the last that was sent him, put the unfortunate captive to death, being afraid, as he had formerly served under him, but abandoned him to side with Antony, lest he should be once in a condition, if his life were spared, to be revenged on him for his treachery. This rendered Titius so odious to the Roman people, who still retained a great regard for Pompey and his family, that they could never after bear the sight of him, but drove him out of the circus with hisses and curses; even while he was exhibiting to them games and shews at his own expence.

But is defeated, taken prisoner, and put to death.

It was believed, that the death of Pompey would have put an end to all civil wars. But the unbounded ambition of Octavianus and Antony soon involved the Roman state in new troubles. The passion Antony had for Cleopatra, and the extravagant presents of whole provinces, which he bestowed on her, served Octavianus for a spacious pretence to make war upon him, though his real motive was to get rid of a competitor so formidable, both for his valour and the high reputation he had gained among the soldiery. Antony had left Octavia in Italy, as we have related above, and passed into Syria, whither he invited Cleopatra, and gave her all Phænice, Cæle-Syria, Cyprus, and a great part of Arabia and Judæa. These profuse gifts much displeased the Roman people, who daily published scurrilous lampoons, censuring his conduct, and turning him him into ridicule on account of the scandalous life he led with Cleopatra. Soon after he marched against the Parthians with thirteen legions, ten thousand Gaulish or Spanish horse, and above thirty thousand light-armed foot. But this mighty army, which made all the east tremble, served only to render his retreat more shameful, as we have related at length in our history of the Parthians^e. As all the misfortunes he met with in that fatal expedition were owing to his passion for Cleopatra, which made him neglect the more proper measures, to follow those only, which might hasten his return to that bewitching woman, the Romans were highly incensed against him. But what most of all provoked them was his taking Artabazes, king of Armenia, in a most treacherous manner, as we have related elsewhere^f, and leading him in triumph into Alexandria, the Romans looking upon the ceremony of triumphing as appropriated wholly to their city. Octavianus took advantage of Antony's impolitic conduct, to estrange more and more the minds of the people from him; and when he found their spirits sufficiently exasperated, he resolved to send his sister Octavia to her husband, that he might have a plausible pretence to declare war, if he should offer her the affront of sending her back without seeing her. Antony was then returned from his Parthian expedition, and waited at Leucopolis, or, as Plutarch calls it, Leucocome, for the arrival of Cleopatra, whom he had sent for. The queen arrived at last, bringing with her cloaths for the soldiers, and vast sums of money to be distributed among them. Almost at the same time Niger, one of Antony's particular friends, arrived from Octavia, who was already come as far as Athens, with letters from her to her husband; wherein she acquainted him, that she had brought with her cloaths for his soldiers, a great many horses, and rich presents for his friends and officers, with two thousand chosen men well armed to recruit the prætorian cohorts. This was very unwelcome news to the queen, who knowing Octavia came only to dispute with her, and lay in her claim to, Antony's affections, and dreading the presence of so virtuous a rival, feigned a deep melancholy, and pretended to be dying for love of him. When she was near him, she beheld him with languishing eyes and a despairing countenance, like one beside herself with love. She let fall tears in his presence, and at the same time pretended to dry them up in haste, and unobserved, as if she were ashamed to have him a witness of her weakness. By these artifices the crafty queen gained the ascendant over Antony, and prevailed upon him to send word to Octavia, that she should not pursue her journey into Syria, but to return to Rome. After this he waited on Cleopatra back to Alexandria, where he passed the winter with that lewd woman in all manner of luxury, pomp, and voluptuousness.

Octavia being returned to Rome, her brother ordered her to quit her husband's house, since he had treated her so contemptuously: but the virtuous Octavia refused to obey him, saying, that though she had a great respect for her brother, yet she could not prevail upon herself to comply with his orders; and therefore conjured him not to force her to leave the house of a person, whom she would always honour as her husband in spite of his inconstancy: she intreated him to abandon her interest, and not make war upon Antony for an affront, which regarded her alone, since it would be a shameful thing to have it reported, that two of the greatest commanders in the world had involved the Roman people in a war, the one to justify his mistress, the other in resentment for his sister's ill usage. Octavianus could not help indulging her virtuous inclinations; he allowed her to continue in her husband's house, where she brought up his children with extraordinary care, without making any distinction between her own and those he had by Fulvia. She took under her protection all those whom her husband sent to Rome to sue for offices, assisted their pretensions with the authority her virtue gave her, and never left importuning her brother, till she had obtained for them what they desired. But nothing proved more prejudicial to Antony's interest than this deportment of Octavia; his injurious treatment of a woman of her rank, merit, and virtue drew on him the resentment of all the Romans, who were still more provoked at what he did about this time at Alexandria. For having feasted the whole people of that great metropolis, he assembled them in the gymnasium, and causing a throne of silver to be erected there with two seats of gold, the one for himself, the other for Cleopatra, and lower seats at their feet for his children, he proclaimed Cleopatra queen of Egypt, Cyprus, Africa, and Cæle-Syria, and joined with her as her colleague Cæsarion, whom she had by Julius Cæsar. As for his own children

a dren by Cleopatra, he gave to Alexander Armenia, Media, Parthia, and the rest of the eastern provinces from the Euphrates to the Indus; to Cleopatra, the twin sister of Alexander, Libya and Cyrene; and to Ptolemy, whom he surnamed Philadelphus, Phœnice, Syria, Cilicia, and all the countries of the Lesser Asia from the Euphrates to the Hellepont; and he conferred on each of them the title of king of kings. What seemed most remarkable in this solemnity was, that Cleopatra appeared drest like the goddess Isis, and Antony like the god Osiris; and from that time both frequently gave audience to the people, in the attire which was thought peculiar to those deities ^P.

b Octavianus, taking advantage of the general resentment against Antony, which this division of provinces occasioned at Rome, accused him before the senate and people of this and several other attempts highly injurious to the majesty of the Roman empire; which Antony being informed of, sent some of his friends to Rome to plead his cause, and accuse Octavianus in his turn. The chief articles he preferred against him were,

1. That he had not shared with him the island of Sicily, which was lately taken from Pompey: 2. That he had not made restitution of the ships he had lent him: 3. That having abrogated the power of Lepidus his colleague, he had appropriated to himself his army, his government, and his revenues: Lastly, that he had divided almost all Italy among his own soldiers, and reserved nothing for his. To these accusations Octavianus answered, that he had not dismissed Lepidus from his government, till he had made it appear that he was unfit to govern; that as to what he had got by the war, he would divide it with Antony, when he gave him his share of Armenia; and as for Antony's soldiers, they could not surely value or claim a few acres of land in Italy, after they had conquered all Media, and reduced the wealthy empire of the Parthians by the mighty exploits they had performed, under the conduct of their invincible general. Antony was so provoked at this biting jest, that though he had already marched as far as the river Araxes with a design to invade Parthia, he dropt that expedition, and ordered Canidius, one of his lieutenants, to march forthwith at the head of sixteen legions down to the coasts of the Ionian sea, and there keep himself in a readiness to pass over into Europe at a day's warning. As for Antony himself, he hastened with Cleopatra to Ephesus, where his lieutenants had got together eight hundred vessels, of which the queen furnished two hundred with twenty thousand talents and provisions for the whole army. Antony was advised by his friends to send back Cleopatra into Egypt, there to expect the event of the war; but she, dreading a peace might be made in her absence, upon condition of Antony's receiving again Octavia and excluding her, prevailed upon Canidius with a large sum of money to represent to Antony, that it was not just to drive away a princess with disgrace, who bore so great a part in the charge of the war; that it would be highly impolitic to disoblige the Egyptians, who made up so considerable a part of his naval forces; and finally, that Cleopatra was not inferior to any of the kings who attended him, in prudence and good sense, as was manifest from her governing so mighty a kingdom by herself. It was owing to Octavianus's good fortune and Antony's evil destiny, that this counsel took place. Cleopatra was allowed to stay, and they both left Ephesus, and set sail for Samos, the place of the general rendezvous. Thither all the kings, princes, and nations from Egypt to the Euxine sea, and from Armenia to Illyricum, were ordered to send men, arms, and provisions. It was at the same time proclaimed, that all stage-players, dancers, singers, buffoons, &c. should repair to the same island; so that sometimes a ship, which was thought to be laden with soldiers and warlike stores, proved fraught with scenes, machines for the stage, musicians, and players. Thus, while the rest of the world was in tears, and great dread of the approaching war, joy, and all kind of pleasures reigned at Samos, as if they had abandoned all other places to reside there. Thither each city, within the limits of Antony's government, was ordered to send an ox to be offered in sacrifice; and the kings, who attended him, were in a perpetual dispute, who should make the most magnificent feasts: insomuch, that it became a common question among the spectators, What will they do by way of triumph after the victory, since they make such rejoycings at the opening of a dangerous war?

FROM Samos, Antony sailed for Athens, where he lived after his usual manner, spending his whole time in luxury and voluptuousness. Cleopatra, who accompanied him, being jealous of the honours Octavia had received at Athens, insinuated herself, with all the civilities imaginable, into the favour of the Athenians, who in requital decreed her honours

honours beyond the condition of mortals, and deputed several of the citizens to wait upon her at her house with the decree. At the head of this deputation was Antony himself, he being free of Athens: and, as he was chosen their speaker, he harangued the queen in the name of the people. While he was at Athens, C. Sotius and Domitius Ahenobarbus, the consuls of this year, were obliged to leave Rome, not thinking themselves safe there, after they had taken upon them to defend Antony. They both took refuge in Athens, and incensed Antony to such a degree against Octavianus, that he solemnly divorced Octavia, and sent proper officers to Rome to drive her out of his house. The virtuous Octavia obeyed without complaining, and retired to her own house with all his children, except Antyllus, his eldest son by Fulvia, who was with his father. She only lamented her hard fate, in seeing herself looked upon as one of the causes of a civil war. But men of penetration well knew, that there was only one true cause of the present breach, viz. Octavianus's unbounded ambition, which, not satisfied with one-half of the Roman empire, aspired at the whole. But he had certainly been disappointed, had not Antony, according to his custom, spent so much time in idleness and debauchery, at Samos and Athens, with that bewitching woman, who at length was the occasion of his ruin. Had Antony come immediately to a final decision, he must unavoidably have carried the day, he having then with him a powerful fleet and a numerous army, whereas his rival had not yet made any preparations for a war; and besides all Italy was in a ferment, on account of the extraordinary taxes which he was forced to lay on the people, for the raising of the necessary sums; insomuch, that it was looked upon as one of the greatest of Antony's oversights, that he put off the war till the next summer, by which time Octavianus, having quieted the people, put himself in a condition of disputing the empire, with forces equal to those of his enemy^r.

Antony is forsaken by several of his friends.

DURING Antony's stay at Athens, many of his friends, being ill used by Cleopatra for opposing her design of attending Antony in the war, abandoned him, and came over to Octavianus, among the rest Plancus, and Titius his nephew. Plancus on his arrival at Rome accused Antony before the senate of several crimes, with so much venom and bitterness, that Coponius could not forbear saying to him, Surely you never observed what you now lay to Antony's charge, till the evening before your departure, reproaching him thereby either with baseness, in enduring those crimes so long, or with stupidity, in not finding them out sooner (Q). Pollio's conduct was as generous, as Plancus's was infamous. Pollio had abandoned Antony, and led a private life in Italy, ever since his first intrigues with Cleopatra; but yet, when Octavianus pressed him to serve under him in this war, he answered frankly, I have served Antony better perhaps than he has rewarded me; however, as the favours I have received at his hands are more known than the services I have done him, to avoid the imputation of ingratitude, I will not take up arms against him, but quietly wait the event of the war, and be at the discretion of the conqueror. Antony had made a will in favour of Cleopatra, and highly injurious and dishonourable to the Roman people, and lodged it with the vestals at Rome. Plancus and Titius, who had been privy to all his secret counsels and designs, gave notice of it to Octavianus, who immediately demanded it. The religious vestals answered, that they could not deliver it up, without a sacrilegious breach of the trust reposed in them; but that Octavianus might, if he thought fit, come and seize it himself; which he did accordingly; and having first read it over in private, and made marks upon those places which he thought most for his purpose, he called the senate, and caused it to be read to them. In this will Antony declared, that Cæsarion, Cæsar's son

Octavianus makes use of Antony's will to stir up the people against him.

(Q). Plancus was one of Cleopatra's most servile flatterers, and had been privy to all Antony's intrigues, debasing himself to the meanest employments about him, even to the writing of his love-letters to the queen and to other women. Though he had been consul, commander in chief of an army, and governor of a province, he was not ashamed to appear at the Egyptian court among common actors, buffoons, and stage-players, all wretches, whose birth was as mean as their profession. At a public entertainment, to curry favour with the queen, he took upon him to personate Glaucus, and, having painted his body green, danced quite naked on the public theatre, with a crown of reeds on his head, trailing behind him the tail of a huge fish. This behaviour, highly unbecoming a man of his age and quality, made him appear contemptible in the eyes of the Egyptians themselves. Besides, Antony abused and reproached him for some extortions, whereof he had been accused; which, as he was already despised by the Egyptians, he took so much amiss, that he laid hold of the first opportunity that offered to abandon Antony, and join Octavianus, who received him with great demonstrations of friendship and affection.

a son by Cleopatra, was born in lawful wedlock, and therefore was the true heir of Julius Cæsar. This was dispossessing Octavianus of the inheritance which he held, only as the adopted son of the dictator. By the same will he bequeathed most of the Roman territories, which were under his command, to Cleopatra and her children; and moreover ordered his body, where-ever he should die, though at Rome itself, to be sent into Egypt to Cleopatra, there to be buried, as she should direct. Octavianus insisted more especially on that part of the will which related to his funeral, and on his robbing the Roman people of their provinces, to enrich a foreign princess, who was an enemy to Rome. As these charges were undeniably made good from an authentic instrument, they estranged from him the minds of many, who had hitherto pleaded his cause with great zeal. Some of his friends, however, took his part, declaring, that they thought it an extraordinary and unprecedented way of proceeding to punish a man in his life-time, for what was not to be put in execution till after his death. Hereupon Caius Calvissius accused him of several other crimes, viz. that he had made a present to Cleopatra of the famous library of the kings of Pergamus, consisting of two hundred thousand volumes; that he had suffered the Ephesians to give her the title of their queen; that he had frequently at the public audience of kings and princes received love-letters from Cleopatra, and read them on his tribunal; that one day, when Furnius, an orator of great eloquence and authority among the Romans, was pleading before him, he left him and the audience in the middle of their cause to follow Cleopatra, who happened to pass by in her chair; that at a solemn feast he had risen from table, and trod upon her foot, which all the guests looked upon as the signal of a private meeting, &c. The heads of this accusation, however ridiculous they may seem at present, were seriously proposed by Calvissius, and appeared of such moment and weight to Antony's friends, that they sent one Geminus to him to let him know, that his affairs required him to be more circumspect, and that, unless he altered his conduct, he was in danger of being deprived of the office of consul, to which he had been named for the year ensuing, of being stripped of all his governments, and declared an enemy to the Roman people. The arrival of Geminus alarmed Cleopatra, who, looking upon him as one of Octavia's spies, ridiculed him, and made him the constant jest of the table, where she took care to have him always placed at the lower end. Geminus bore all her affronts and outrages with great patience, in hopes of finding at length an opportunity of talking with Antony in private. But he, instead of giving him a private audience, asked him one night at a full table, what had brought him to Athens? The business I come upon, said he, well deserves a serious consideration, and is not to be talked of over a bottle. One thing, however, I am charged by your friends to tell you, which you may hear as well drunk as sober; your affairs will bear a much better face, if you send back Cleopatra into Egypt. You have done very wisely, Geminus, answered the queen in a great passion, to tell us this important secret, without waiting till it was extorted from you on the rack. A few days after Geminus, dreading the effects of Cleopatra's displeasure, made his escape and returned to Rome, whither he was followed by many of Antony's friends, no longer able to bear with the ill usage they received from the imperious queen. Among these were Marcus Syllanus and Dellius the historian. The latter had said at an entertainment, where the wine was not to his mind, that Antony's friends drank vinegar, while at Rome Sarmentus was served with Falernian wine. This Sarmentus is mentioned by Horace, and was one of Octavianus's buffoons. Cleopatra took this raillery so ill, that she ordered Dellius to be privately murdered; but he being acquainted, by one Glaucus a physician, of her design, saved himself by flight and retired to Rome.

He is accused of several crimes by C. Calvissius.

The imperious behaviour of Cleopatra obliges several of Antony's friends to forsake him.

f AND NOW Octavianus, finding himself in a condition to encounter Antony with equal forces, no longer delayed declaring war; but caused it to be decreed only against Cleopatra, for fear of provoking Antony's friends, who were still very numerous and powerful. However, Antony was deprived of the consulate, and his government was taken from him, for suffering himself to be ruled by a woman. The decree implied besides, that Cleopatra had so bewitched Antony with her charms and potions, as to bereave him of his senses; and that Antony was not to manage the war against the Romans, but Mardion the eunuch, Photinus and Iras, Cleopatra's waiting-women, and Charmion, another of her maids, who were become Antony's counsellors and prime ministers of state. It is said, that this war was preceded by many signs and prodigies digies (R), which were all interpreted very justly, but not before Antony's defeat. The forces of the contending parties were answerable to the empire they shared between them. Antony had under his command all the provinces from the Euphrates and Armenia to the Ionian sea and Illyricum, and from Cyrene to Æthiopia. Octavianus's government extended from Illyricum to the ocean, and comprehended all the coast of Africa that was opposite to Italy, Gaul, and Spain. Many kings followed Antony's fortune, and attended him in this war; namely Bocchus king of Mauritania, Tarcondemus or Tarcondimotus of Upper Cilicia, Archelaus of Cappadocia, Philadelphus of Paphlagonia, Mithridates of Comagene, Adallas of Thrace. These attended him in person: but Polemon king of Pontus, Malchus king of Arabia, Herod king of Judea, Amyntas king of Lycaonia and Galatia, only sent their quotas of forces. All these together made up an army of a hundred thousand foot and twelve thousand horse. His navy consisted of five hundred ships of war, some whereof had eight, and some ten, banks of oars. As for Octavianus, he had no foreign princes in his army, which amounted only to eighty thousand foot, but was as strong in cavalry as the enemy's. He had no more than two hundred and fifty ships, but those light, and well manned with sailors, rowers, and soldiers; whereas Antony's seemed built for ostentation, and, besides, were but very indifferently manned, his officers having been obliged, for want of mariners, to press in Greece, which had been exhausted long before, carriers, labourers, and even boys; and for all this his vessels had not their full complement^w.

each other.

BEFORE these two mighty fleets and armies came to engage, a paper war broke out, on what occasion we know not, between the generals, who wrote very sharp and reflecting letters to each other. Octavianus reproached Antony with the prodigality of his entertainments and his intrigues with Cleopatra. Antony, on the other hand, put Octavianus in mind of the famous entertainment of the twelve gods, at which he presided dressed like Apollo, while the other guests, women as well as men, appeared in the attire of gods and goddesses, and passed the night in the most infamous debaucheries (S). To this he added his hasty marriage with Livia against all rules of decency; his divorcing Scribonia, because she would not bear with the capricious humour of that new mistress; and on this occasion all the Roman ladies, with whom Octavianus had ever carried on intrigues, were brought upon the stage. Antony in one of his letters reproached him with the cowardice he had betrayed, in all the engagements at which he had been present, mentioning those shameful circumstances of which we have taken notice above. Hereupon Octavianus wrote to him, that it was childish to fight any longer with the pen; but that, if he would approach at the head of his army, he should be suffered to land in Italy without molestation, that his fleet should have safe ports, and his land-forces ground enough to incamp on and put themselves in order of battle. In return to these bravadoes, Antony challenged his rival to a single combat, though he was much older; and sent him word, that, if he declined the challenge, he was ready to meet him at the head of his army in battle-array in the plains of Pharsalia, where Cæsar and Pompey had formerly decided their quarrel. However, nothing was done this year; Octavianus assembled with his fleet and army at Brundisium, and Antony came as far as Corcyra to meet him; but, the summer being far spent and the tempestuous season of the year approaching, they both retired and put their armies into winter-quarters^x.

(T) The city of Pisaurum, where Antony had settled a colony, was swallowed up by an earthquake: a marble statue of Antony at Alba was observed to sweat for many days together. While he himself was in the city of Patra, the temple of Hercules was destroyed by lightning, and at Athens the statue of Bacchus was by a violent wind blown out of the Gigantomachia, and carried into the theatre. The Gigantomachia was a public edifice at Athens, where the battle of the gods with the giants was represented in painting. These two latter prodigies were looked upon as very bad omens for Antony, who pretended to derive his pedigree from Hercules, and made a profession of imitating Bacchus, causing himself for that reason to be called young Bacchus. The same storm falling at Athens upon the statues of Eumenes and Attalus, which had been dedicated to Antony, and were called Antonii, overturned them, without hurting others, that stood equally exposed. Some swallows built their nests in the stern of Cleopatra's admiral galley, called Antonias; but others drove them away and destroyed their nests (91.)

(S) This feast, which was called the dodecatheon, because the guests personated twelve gods and goddesses had made a great noise at Rome, and had been the subject of many satirical epigrams. Antony had never been guilty of more infamous and scandalous debaucheries, than Octavianus was on this occasion.

(91) Plut. in Antono.

In the mean time, the consular year expiring, Octavianus caused himself to be declared consul for the third time, and took M. Valerius Messala for his colleague in the room of Antony, who was to enjoy that dignity this year, according to the agreement made between the two triumvirs and Pompey, of which we have spoken above. Messala resigned the fasces on the calends of May to M. Titius, who had abandoned Antony together with Plancus, and Titius on the calends of October yielded his office to one Cn. Pompeius, of whose descent or services no mention is made in history.

As soon as the season would permit, both armies took the field, and the fleets put to sea. Antony's fleet sailed into the Ambracian gulph, between the islands of Coryra and Cephalenia, and his army incamped at Actium near his fleet. Actium was a small city on the south side of the mouth of the gulph in Acarnania. While Antony's fleet was at anchor there, Octavianus, crossing the Ionian sea, surprized Toryne, a small city near Actium. This unexpected attempt occasioned great confusion in Antony's camp, by reason only a few legions were yet arrived, and they had not news of the rest. But Cleopatra, to calm their fears, turned it into a jest; Indeed, said she, we ought to tremble, now that Cæsar has taken Toryne (T), alluding to the word Toryne, which in the language of that country signifies a ladle. The next morning, as soon as it was light, Octavianus appeared off Actium with his ships in order of battle. As Antony's legions were not yet arrived, he had but a small number of soldiers on board his fleet, and consequently must unavoidably have been defeated, had Octavianus attacked him. To divert him therefore for the present from engaging, which he knew was no difficult matter in the absence of Agrippa, he armed all his rowers and mariners, placed them on the decks, and sailed up into the mouth of the gulph, as if he intended to fall upon the enemy; which Octavianus no sooner observed, than he retreated, as Antony had expected. Octavianus's land-forces were incamped on the other side of the mouth of the gulph of Ambracia, at a place where Octavianus afterwards built, in memory of his victory, a city which he called Nicopolis, or the city of victory. While he lay there, Antony, who was well acquainted with the country, found means to cut off the water from his camp, which much distressed his army. In the mean time, the brave Agrippa, with a squadron and a considerable body of land-forces, ravaged the coasts of Greece, intercepted all the convoys that were coming to Antony from Egypt, Syria, and Asia, and, making descents, stormed several cities, among the rest Methona in Peloponnesus, where Bogud, king of Mauritania, who had sided with Antony and defended the place, was killed, and the numerous garison cut in pieces. From Methona Agrippa sailed for Leucas, at a small distance from Actium, and in the sight of Antony made himself master of that island and the ships he found there. The cities of Patrae and Corinth were likewise forced to submit to him, after he had defeated Q. Nasidius, whom Antony had sent to stop the progress of his conquests. As he was returning from the coasts of Greece to join Octavianus, he fell in with Sosius, one of Antony's admirals, who had just put to flight L. Tauresius, whom Octavianus had sent out with a numerous squadron to watch the enemy's motions. Agrippa attacked him with his usual bravery, took some of his ships, sunk others, and dispersed the rest. In this engagement Sosius himself perished, and with him Tracondimotus king of Cilicia. At the same time, a great body of Antony's cavalry, commanded by himself, was defeated by a detachment of Octavianus's cavalry under the command of Titius and Statilius Taurus. These advantages, and the arrival of Agrippa with his victorious squadron, induced Antony to abandon in the night-time the camp which he had fortified over-against the enemy's, and retire to Actium on the other side of the Ambracian gulf, where the greatest part of his army lay. While he continued at Actium, several persons of distinction, seeing his fleet so unfortunate in every thing that was undertaken, and himself spending his whole time with Cleopatra, abandoned him and went over to Octavianus. Among these were the kings Amyntas and Dejotarus, and Cneius Domitius Abenobarbus, the last year's consul, who, notwithstanding his affection to Antony, could no longer bear with the haughty and insolent behaviour of Cleopatra. The unexpected desertion of Domitius, whom Antony looked upon as one of his best friends, stung him to the heart:

(T) It is impossible to preserve the beauty of this allusion in our language. Toryne, which in this place is made use of as the name of a town, signifies likewise a ladle; and the witticism lies there, as if Cleopatra had said, We ought indeed to tremble now that Octavianus has taken a ladle from us.

heart: however, his carriage to him was very generous, and much against the will of Cleopatra; for he sent after him his whole equipage, with his friends and servants; which so sensibly touched Domitius, who was sick of a fever when he fled, that he soon after died, his distemper being increased by the grief of abandoning a man, who by kindness requited his infidelity and desertion. The flight of Domitius proved extremely prejudicial to Antony's interest, most men believing, that a person of his understanding and penetration would never have abandoned him, had he not thought the ruin of his party inevitable. Antony now began to distrust even his best friends, and caused some of them upon bare suspicions to be put to death; namely Jamblicus, a petty king of Arabia, who expired upon the rack, and Q. Posthumus, a senator of distinction.

Canidius advises Antony to dismiss Cleopatra, and retire.

At length Canidius, commander in chief of Antony's forces, arrived with the rest of the legions, and soon after his arrival, as he saw the danger nearer, changed his mind with relation to Cleopatra. He advised Antony by all means to send her back, and retire himself into Thrace and Macedon, there to decide the quarrel in the open fields with his land-forces; the rather, because Dicomes, king of the Getae, was ready to join him with a great army. It will not, said he to Antony, be any disparagement to you to quit the sea, and leave Octavianus master of it, who in his wars with Pompey has gained so great experience in maritime affairs. But it will be renouncing both sense and reason for you, who are one of the most experienced land-officers in the world, to make no other use of your well disciplined and stout troops, than to disperse them on board several ships, and render them useless in the defence of a navy. What can be more ridiculous, more absurd, than to depend upon the sea and winds for a victory, which the valour and experience of your soldiers, whom you have tried in so many dangers, leave you no room to doubt of by land? Antony was very much inclined to follow the advice of his prudent and faithful general; but Cleopatra, whose words were oracles with him, biassed him the other way, and obliged him, against his own judgment, to hazard the empire and his life in a sea-fight. The perfidious and cowardly queen already entertained thoughts of flying, as Plutarch informs us, and was deliberating, not how to be assisting to Antony in obtaining the victory, but how she might, when all was lost, make her escape with greatest safety. Antony, being now determined to put the whole to the issue of a general engagement by sea, went often from his camp to the place where his fleet lay at anchor, sometimes alone, and sometimes attended only by some of his particular friends, as suspecting no danger. One of Octavianus's slaves, having by chance observed him, ran immediately to his master, and told him, that he had seen Antony walking, without any distrust and slenderly attended, from his camp to the seaside. Hereupon Octavianus the same night ordered a party of chosen men to cross the gulph, which at the entrance was but a mile over, and lie in wait for Antony on the narrow neck of land which led from his camp to the sea. His orders were put in execution with such secrecy, and the whole affair so well conducted, that had it not been for the impatience of some soldiers, who started up too soon, they had seized on Antony, and put an end to the war without shedding a drop of blood; for they took the officer who just walked before him, and it was with the utmost difficulty that Antony himself got off.

Antony in danger of falling into the enemy's hands.

AND now Antony being determined, out of a shameful complaisance for Cleopatra, and against his own opinion as well as that of all his officers, to try his fortune by sea, began to make the necessary preparations for an action, on the success whereof depended the empire of the Roman world. As he was well acquainted with the effeminacy of the Egyptians, he was afraid they would turn their backs as soon as the fight began; and therefore he set fire to all their ships, except sixty, which he spared, that they might serve as a guard for the queen. Out of the other squadrons from Syria, Greece, Cilicia, the kingdom of Pergamus, and Phoenice, he chose the best galleys from three ranks of oars to ten. The rest he condemned to the flames for want of mariners. While he was reviewing the troops that were to imbarque, an old experienced officer, who had fought often under him, and had his body covered all over with scars, called to him aloud, and addressed him thus: O my noble general, why do you mistrust these wounds and this sword, so as to put your confidence in rotten wood? Leave the water to the Egyptians and Phoenicians, men born and nursed up in that element; but give us Romans the land, where we are accustomed to brave death, and make

^a our enemies fly before us. Antony returned no answer; only, by his looks and the motion of his hand, he seemed to bid him be of good heart, though he himself was far from being satisfied with the posture of his affairs, as manifestly appeared from his behaviour towards the pilots, who were for leaving their sails behind; but Antony obliged them to take them with them, saying, We must not let one enemy escape; which was putting a good face upon a bad cause.

AND now both fleets were ready to engage; but a violent storm, which continued for four days together, prevented them. On the fifth, the sea being calm, they advanced towards each other in good order. Gellius Publicola commanded Antony's right wing, Cælius the left, and Marcus Octavius and Marcus Justeius the main body. ^{The disposition of the two fleets.}

^b On Octavianus's side, Agrippa was placed in the centre, having Larius on his right, and Aruntius on his left. As for Octavianus and Antony, they were both, according to some writers, in the right wing of their respective fleets; according to others, they chose no particular place for themselves; but went each in a light vessel from one division to another, encouraging their men, and putting them in mind of their former exploits and victories (U). This day, said Antony to his men before the engagement, I expect the empire of the world from your valour, and promise you rewards answerable to so noble a conquest. Octavianus gave no less hopes to his men, and with more confidence, having been animated by a happy omen, which he caused to be published throughout the fleet (W). Antony ordered the commanders of his ships to receive

^c the enemy without stirring, but lying still as at anchor, and to keep within the mouth of the gulf. Agrippa was not for attacking him in that posture; and therefore kept about eight furlongs distant from the enemy till noon, when a gentle gale springing up, Antony's men, impatient of further delays, and trusting to the bulk and height of their ships, put their left wing in motion. Agrippa beheld this with great satisfaction, and ordered his right wing to bear back, on purpose to draw the enemy as far out of the streights as possible, that his galleys, which were light and nimble sailors, might have an opportunity of surrounding Antony's heavy ships, whose bulk and want of hands in proportion to their rates made them unwieldy and unfit for service. On this side the action began; but in a different manner from what was

^d then used in sea-fights: there was no boarding, or running one ship against another, Antony's vessels being, on account of their size, incapable of a violent motion, and, on the other hand, Octavianus's ships not daring to approach them for fear of splitting against their sides, which were armed with strong square pieces of wood fastened together with massy pins of iron; so that this engagement resembled a land-fight, or rather the attack of some strong place. Octavianus's soldiers attacked the enemy with pikes, javelins, darts, and several inventions of fire, which they threw among them, while Antony's men defended themselves with showers of darts and arrows, which they discharged from their wooden towers. In the mean time, Agrippa ordered Aruntius groan under them, and the wind out of breath to move them (98). But, as to the number of Antony's ships, Florus is contradicted by Octavianus himself, who left written in his commentaries quoted by Plutarch, that he took three hundred of the enemy's ships (99).

(U) According to Plutarch, Antony commanded the right wing in conjunction with Publicola. The same writer places Octavianus in his right wing, Agrippa in the left, and Aruntius in the centre (95). The right wing of the Julian ships, says Velleius Paterculus (96), was committed to M. Larius, the left to Aruntius, and to Agrippa the charge of the whole. Caesar was present every where. The command of Antony's fleet was committed to Publicola and Sosius. As to the land-forces, it is agreed on all hands, that Taurus commanded in chief on the side of Octavianus, and Canidius on Antony's. Antony had on board his fleet twenty thousand legionaries and two thousand archers (97); Octavianus eight legions and five prætorian cohorts. As to the number of the ships, Florus tells us, that Octavianus's fleet consisted of four hundred sail, and Antony's only of half that number; but what was wanting in number, adds that writer, was made up in bulk; for all Antony's ships had from six to nine ranks of oars; and besides, they were so raised with turrets and decks, that they resembled castles and cities, making the sea

(W) We are told, that as Octavianus was going out of his tent at break of day to visit his fleet, he met a countryman driving an ass. Being moved with curiosity, or rather superstition, he asked the man's name. My name, replied he, is Eutyches, and my ass is called Nicom. The first of these names in Greek signifies happy, and the other conqueror. This seemed so lucky an omen to Octavianus, that he no longer doubted of victory; and when afterwards he erected a trophy in that place, with the beaks of the ships he had taken, he caused two statues of brass to be erected, one representing the man, and the other his ass (100). Pliny adds (1), that as Octavianus was sacrificing before the battle, the victim was found to have a double liver.

Aruntius to extend his left wing, and endeavour to hem in the enemy; which made Publicola advance to prevent it; but as by this motion he left the main body unguarded, Agrippa bore in upon it and put it in disorder. However, the victory still remained doubtful, Antony's soldiers, who were all chosen men, defending themselves with incredible valour, and making a dreadful havock of all who attempted to approach them. The fight lasted several hours, with as fair a prospect of success for Antony as for Octavianus, the mariners and soldiers on board the two fleets being encouraged by the shouts of their respective armies, who waited the event of the engagement drawn up in battle array, the one on the north side, and the other on the south side, of the Ambracian gulf. While the two parties were thus contending, with great fury and obstinacy, for victory, Cleopatra's sixty galleys, crowding all their sails, advanced unexpectedly between the two fleets. This sudden motion equally surprised both navies. Antony, whose centre was already in disorder, expected some gallant action from the queen, who had brought him into the present danger. He was therefore struck with amazement, when he saw the whole Egyptian squadron, instead of falling upon the enemy, tack about, and with a fair wind steer their course towards Peloponnesus. Thus historians relate the flight and desertion of the Egyptians, without giving any other reason for their abandoning, in so base and shameful a manner, the party they had embraced, than the timorousness of their queen, who could no longer bear the noise and terror of the battle. What they add is still more surprising. Antony had given too many proofs of his courage ever to be suspected of cowardice; and on this occasion not only the empire of the world, but his life, was at stake: neither had he any reason to despair of success; but, on the contrary, the intrepidity and resolution with which his men maintained the combat seemed to promise him certain victory; for tho' his centre had been put into some disorder by Agrippa, yet that brave and experienced commander, notwithstanding his utmost efforts, could not gain the least advantage over them, each of Antony's great ships defending themselves against many of his, and keeping them at a distance with incessant showers of darts, arrows, stones, &c. which did great execution. But here Antony betrayed a weakness hardly to be imagined, and confirmed, as Plutarch observes, the ancient saying, that a lover's soul lives in another body; for, love getting the better of his ambition and of all other regards, he no sooner saw the queen's ship under sail, than, forgetting the duty of a general and renouncing the empire of the world, as if he had nothing more to apprehend than her absence, he threw himself into a galley of five ranks of oars, and, attended only by two domestics, Scellius and Alexander the Syrian, he abandoned his men, who were generously sacrificing their lives in his service, to follow a base woman, who had long since begun, and was now accomplishing, his destruction. As soon as he came up with Cleopatra's galley, he was taken on board; but, without so much as seeing her, he placed himself at the stern, and there, leaning his elbows on his knees and his head on both his hands, as one confounded with anger and shame for his ill conduct, he continued a good while in that melancholy posture^d.

THE gallant behaviour of Antony's troops on this occasion cannot be sufficiently admired and commended; for tho' their general had abandoned them, and the report of his flight was spread all over the fleet, yet they fought with the same ardour and intrepidity as if he had been present, and would in all likelihood have gained the victory, which they disputed till late at night, if a stiff gale, which blew hard a-stern, had not dispersed their vessels, and given the enemy an opportunity of falling upon them, while in disorder and destitute of a leader to rally them. Three hundred ships yielded to the conqueror; but there were not above five thousand of the enemy slain in the whole action, as Octavianus himself left recorded in his commentaries quoted by Plutarch^e (X). Antony's land-forces shewed no less fidelity and affection for their general, than his marines had done. They could not be brought to believe, that a general, who had nineteen legions intire and twelve thousand horse, could basely desert them; and Antony above all, who had so often seen fortune in all her shapes, as Plutarch expresses it, and been so accustomed to changes. They therefore expected he would soon appear from some part or other, and, putting himself at their head, give them an opportunity of shewing their fidelity and zeal for his interest and service. When they were at last thoroughly persuaded that he was fled and had deserted them, they nevertheless kept in a body, tho' quite surrounded both by sea and land, for seven days together, without hearkening to the advantageous offers made them by Octavianus. At length, being abandoned by Canidius and all their chief officers, And his land- who privately made their escape, they listened to the conditions which Octavianus forces submit. offered them, and were incorporated among his legions. Such was the famous sea-fight of Actium, so much spoken of by the ancients, especially the poets of that time^f. It was fought on the second day of September of the year 722 of Rome, Cæsar Octavianus and Messala Corvinus being consuls. As Octavianus, by this ever memorable victory, became sole master of the whole Roman empire, Dion ^g; Suetonius, and after them Aurelius Victor and Eutropius, reckon from this time the years of Octavianus's empire or reign.

AFTER this defeat, the auxiliaries, who had served under Antony, retired to their respective countries, and afterwards made their peace with the conqueror, on the best terms they could. Some of the princes he deposed, others he continued in their former state; but imposed upon them, as well as upon all the free states which had sided with Antony, heavy fines, whereby those unhappy countries were reduced to a most deplorable condition. As for the Romans, Octavianus pardoned some at the earnest intreaties of his friends and his mother Mucia; others he punished with the utmost severity, following therein the natural bias of his temper. Among the latter was the son of the famous Curio, who had distinguished himself among the most zealous partizans of Cæsar the dictator, and had lost his life in maintaining his interest in Africa, as we have related above. His son followed the fortune of Antony, and therefore, being taken prisoner at Actium, Octavianus, without any regard to the important services of his father, caused him to be put to death^h. As to Antony and Cleopatra, Octavianus, the next morning after the battle, finding his victory complete, Octavianus's conduct to- detached a squadron of light galleys in pursuit of them; which Antony no sooner saw wards the con- rowing up to him, than he commanded his pilot to tack about and face them. Here- quered. upon they all gave back, except one commanded by Eurycles the Laconian, who, making up to Antony's vessel with great fierceness and intrepidity, from off the deck shook his lance at him in a threatening manner, Who art thou, cried Antony from the stern, who hast the boldness to pursue me thus? I am, answered he, Eurycles the son of Lachares, brought hither by Cæsar's fortune to revenge my father's death. This Lachares had been condemned to death by Antony for a robbery. However, the Lacedæmonian, not caring to engage so renowned a commander, attacked another galley, and took her, with a ship, on board of which was a great deal of rich plate and furniture. Eurycles retired, well satisfied with his prize; and, upon his retreat Antony returned to his former melancholy posture, and continued so three days, without seeing the queen till he reached Tænarus in Laconia. There Cleopatra's women brought them to see each other, and converse as formerly, Antony shewing himself as fond of her as ever, He continues even at this time, when he had all the reason in the world to detest and abhor her, as his fondness for the only cause of his ruin. At Tænarus he had an account of the total defeat of his fleet; but, believing his legions still held out, he wrote to Canidius to retreat with them through Macedon into Asia, proposing to renew the war there. As he was himself determined to retire into Africa, he gave one his largest ships, laden with vast His generosity sums of money and gold and silver vessels of an inestimable value, to his friends, towards his desiring them to share it among them, and provide for their own safety; but they friends. refusing it with tears in their eyes, and declaring that they would always follow his fortune, he comforted them with all the goodness imaginable, complaining of his cruel destiny, which put him out of a condition of giving them such tokens of his acknowledgment and gratitude, as they had given him of their fidelity and affection. He added, that he could not, without doing them the greatest injury, suffer them to be involved in his misfortunes; and therefore he absolutely commanded them to abandon him in his evil destiny, and consult their own safety. He wrote to Theophilus, governor of Corinth, desiring him to provide for their security, and keep them concealed, till such time as they could make their peace with Octavianus. After this, Antony

Antony retired to Africa, whence he sent Cleopatra into Egypt, and soon after followed ^a her thither. But of the reduction of Egypt by Octavianus, of the unhappy end of Antony and Cleopatra, and the affecting circumstances of their death, we have given a very particular account in our history of *Egypt*ⁱ, to which we refer our readers. All Antony's statues were thrown down and intirely demolished, both in Egypt and at Rome. His memory was declared infamous by the servile senate, and a decree was passed, enacting, that none of his family should ever after bear the name of Marcus. He died in the fifty-third, or, as some write, fifty-sixth, year of his age, leaving behind him seven children by his three wives, Fulvia, Octavia, and Cleopatra; for he married the queen after his divorce with Octavia. What became of Alexander and Ptolemy his sons by Cleopatra, we find no-where recorded; but for his daughter Cleopatra, the virtuous Octavia brought her up with her own children, and married her to Juba king of Mauritania, one of the most learned and virtuous princes of his age. Antyllus, his eldest son by Fulvia, was betrayed by his governor Theodorus to Octavianus's soldiers, who by his orders put him to death. Julius Antonius, the younger brother of Antyllus by the same mother, became one of Octavianus's chief favourites, Octavia, whose generosity for that unfortunate family was without bounds, having bestowed on him Marcella, one of her daughters by her first husband; but he afterwards indiscreetly engaged in a scandalous intrigue with Julia, Octavianus's only daughter, which cost him his life. Octavia had by Antony only two daughters, of whom the elder was called Antonia Major, and the younger Antonia Minor. The former married L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, by whom she had Cneius Domitius, who, by Agrippina the daughter of Germanicus, was the father of the emperor Nero. Antonia Minor, who inherited both her mother's beauty and virtue, was married to Drusus, the son of Tiberius and Livia, and son-in-law to Octavianus. From this marriage came Germanicus, who was deservedly esteemed the greatest general of his time, and the most accomplished person among the Romans, and Claudius, who reigned before Nero. Caius, surnamed Caligula, the son of Germanicus, did likewise govern the Roman empire; so that Antony's family, in spite of their misfortunes, gave three emperors to Rome; whereas none of Octavianus's posterity ever enjoyed that sovereign authority, for the attaining of which he had impiously trod under foot the most sacred laws of his country, and, by a thousand acts of cruelty and injustice, laid waste the Roman world.

Octavianus settles the affairs of Egypt, Asia Minor, &c.

He returns to Rome.

His triumphs.

BUT to resume the thread of our history: Octavianus having reduced Egypt, and settled the affairs of that kingdom, left Alexandria in the beginning of September of the present year of Rome 713, with a design to return, through Syria, Asia Minor, and Greece, to Italy. On his arrival at Antioch, he found there Tiridates, who had been raised to the throne of Parthia in opposition to Phrabates, and likewise ambassadors from Phrabates, who were all come on the same errand, viz. to solicit the assistance of the Romans against each other. Octavianus gave a friendly answer both to Tiridates and the ambassadors of Phrabates, without intending to help either; but rather with a design to animate the one against the other, and by that means to weaken both, so far as to render the Parthian name no longer formidable to Rome. After this, having appointed Messala Corvinus governor of Syria, he marched into the province of Asia properly so called, and there took up his winter-quarters^k. In the beginning of the next year, Octavianus entered his fifth consulate, and had the following colleagues, Licinius Crassus to the kalends of July, C. Antistius to the ides of September, and M. Tullius, the son of the famous orator, from that time to the end of the year. He spent the whole winter in settling the affairs of the several provinces of Asia Minor and the adjacent islands, and early in the spring passed into Greece, whence he set out for Rome, which he entered in the month Sextilis, afterwards called August,^f in three triumphs, which were celebrated for three days together. The first triumph was for his victories over the Dalmatians, Pannonians, and some German and Gaulish nations, whom he had conquered before his war with Antony. The second was for his naval victory at Actium; and the third for the reduction of Egypt. In the last, which was the most magnificent of the three, were led before the victor's chariot Alexander and Cleopatra, whom Antony had by the queen, and the image of the queen was carried in a bed of state, with an asp hanging at her arm. Rome was so much enriched with the immense treasures brought by Octavianus and his soldiers out of Egypt,

^a Egypt, that the value of money fell from ten to four per cent. and the prices of every thing else rose in proportion ^l. After his triumph, the name of emperor was conferred upon him, not in the common sense, as it imported only a title of honour; but as it carried with it a sovereign power and an uncontrouled authority ^m.

AND now Octavianus was at the height of his wishes, sole sovereign, sole master, of the whole Roman empire. But, on the other hand, the many dangers which attend an usurped power, appearing to him in a stronger light than ever, filled his mind with a thousand perplexing thoughts. The natural aversion of the Romans to a kingly government, their love of liberty, and the ides of March, when his father Julius was murdered in full senate, by those very men, whom he thought the most devoted to his person, made him fear there might arise another Brutus, who, to restore liberty to his country, might assassinate him on his very throne. This he knew had happened to Julius Cæsar; whereas Sylla, after having laid down the authority he had usurped, died peaceably in his bed in the midst of his enemies. The passion of fear, which was so natural to him, outweighed in his soul the charms of a diadem, and inclined him to follow the example of Sylla. He was indeed very unwilling to part with his authority; but fear began to get the better of his ambition. However, before he came to any resolution, he thought it advisable to consult his two most intimate and trusty friends, Agrippa and Mecænas, the former no less famous for his probity than his valour, and the latter a man of great penetration, and generally esteemed the most refined politician of his age. Agrippa, sensible only of that sort of glory, which is acquired by great and heroic actions, openly declared for a generous resignation. He enlarged on the many, and almost inevitable, dangers which attend monarchy, insupportable to a free people, and to men educated in a commonwealth. He did not forget the examples of Sylla and Cæsar, and closed his speech with exhorting Octavianus to convince the world, by restoring liberty to his country, that the only motive for his taking up arms was to revenge his father's death. Mecænas, on the other hand, remonstrated to him, that he had done too much to go back; that, after so much bloodshed, there could be no safety for him but on the throne; that, if he divested himself of the sovereign power, he would be immediately prosecuted by the children and friends of the many illustrious persons, whom the misfortune of the times had forced him to sacrifice to his safety; that it was absolutely necessary for the welfare and tranquillity of the republic, that the sovereign power should be lodged in one person, and not divided among many, &c. Octavianus thanked them both for their friendly advice, but shewed himself inclined to follow the opinion of Mecænas; whereupon that able minister gave him many wise instructions and rules of government, which are related at length by Dion Cassius ⁿ, and will ever be looked upon as a master-piece in politics. Among other things he told him, That he could not fail of being successful in all his undertakings, happy in his life-time, and famous in history after his death, if he never deviated from this rule, viz. to govern others as he would wish to be governed himself, had he been born to obey, and not to command. He added, That if, in taking upon him the sovereign power, he dreaded the name of king, a name so odious in a commonwealth, he might content himself with the title of Cæsar or Imperator, and under that name, which was well known to the Romans, enjoy all the authority of a king. This advice Octavianus followed, and from that time laid aside all thoughts of abdicating the sovereign power; but, to deceive the people into a belief that they still enjoyed their ancient government, he continued the old magistrates, with the same name, pomp, and ornaments, but with just as much power as he thought fit to leave them. They were to have no military power, but only their old jurisdiction of deciding finally all causes, except such as were capital; and tho' some of these last were left to the governor of Rome, yet the chief he reserved for himself. He paid great court to the people: the very name that covered his usurpation was a compliment to them; for he affected to call it the power of the tribuneship, tho' he acted as absolutely by it, as if he had called it the dictatorial power. He likewise won the hearts of the populace by cheapness of provisions and plentiful markets; he frequently entertained them with shews and sports, and by these means kept them in good humour, and made them forget usurpation, slavery, and every public evil; people in ease and plenty being under no temptation of inquiring into the title of their prince, or resenting acts of power, which they do not immediately

mediately feel. As for the senate, he filled it with his own creatures, raising the number of the conscript fathers to a thousand. He supplied several poor senators with money out of the treasury to discharge the public offices, and on all occasions affected a high regard for that venerable body; but at the same time divested them of all power, and reduced them to mere cyphers. To prevent them from raising new disturbances in the distant provinces, he issued an edict, forbidding any senator to travel out of Italy without leave, except such as had lands in Sicily or Narbonne Gaul, which at that time comprehended Languedoc, Provence, and Dauphiny. To these provinces, which were near Italy and in a perfect state of tranquillity, they had full liberty to retire when they pleased, and live there upon their estates. Before he ended his sixth consulship, he took a census of the people, which was forty-one years after the last; and in this the number of men fit to bear arms amounted to four hundred sixty-three thousand, the greatest that had ever been found before* (Y). He likewise celebrated the games which had been decreed by the senate for his victory at Actium; and it was ordered, that they should be celebrated every fifth year, four colleges of priest being appointed to take care of them, viz. the pontifices, the augurs, the septemvirs, and quindécemvirs†. The more to gain the affections of the people, he disannulled by one edict the many severe and unjust laws, which had been enacted during the triumvirate. He raised many public buildings, repaired the old ones, and added many stately ornaments to the city, which at this time was, if we may give credit to some ancient writers, about fifty miles in compass, and contained near four millions of souls, reckoning men, women, children, and slaves. He attended business, reformed abuses, shewed great regard for the Roman name, procured public abundance, pleasure, and jollity, often appearing in person at the public diversions, and in all things studying to render himself dear to the populace‡.

AND now Octavianus, entering upon his seventh consulship with M. Agrippa, the third time consul, and finding all things ripe for his design, the people being highly pleased with his mild government, and the senate filled with his creatures, whose fortunes depended upon his holding the power he had usurped, went, by the advice of Agrippa and Mecænas, to the senate-house, and there in a studied speech offered to resign his authority, and put all again into the hands of the people upon the old foundation of the commonwealth, being well apprised, that the greater part of the conscript fathers, whose interests were interwoven with his, would unanimously press him to the contrary; which happened accordingly: for they not only often interrupted him while he was speaking, but, after he had done, unanimously besought him to take upon him alone the whole government of the Roman empire. He, with a seeming reluctance, yielded at last to their request, as if he had been compelled to accept of the sovereignty. By this artifice he compassed his design, which was to get the power and authority, which he had usurped, confirmed to him by the senate and people for the space of ten years; for he would not accept of it for a longer term, pretending, he should in that time be able to settle all things in such peace and order, that there could be no further need of his authority; but that he might then ease himself of the burden, and put the government again into the hands of the senate and people. This method he took to render the yoke less heavy; but with a design to renew his lease, if we may be allowed the expression, as soon as the ten years were expired; which he did accordingly, from ten years to ten years, as long as he lived, all the while governing the whole Roman empire with an absolute and uncontrouled power. With this new authority the senate resolved to distinguish him with a new name. Some of the conscript fathers proposed the name of Romulus, thereby to import, that he was another founder of Rome; others offered other titles; but the venerable name of Augustus, proposed by Munatius Plancus, seemed preferable to all the rest, as it expressed more dignity and reverence than authority, the most sacred things, such as temples and palaces consecrated by augurs, being termed by the
Romans

(Y) Mention is made of this census in the marble tables of Capua in these words: In my sixth consulship with my colleague M. Agrippa, I numbered the people, and made a census after forty-one years, (that is, from the censorship of Cn. Lentulus and L. Gellius)

in which four hundred sixty-three thousand citizens were numbered. Instead of this number, Eusebius, whom several modern writers have followed, has in his chronicle four millions one hundred and sixty-four thousand.

^a Romans Augusta (Z). Octavianus himself was inclined to assume the name of Romulus; but, fearing he should be suspected of affecting the kingdom, he declined it, and took that of Augustus^r, by which we shall henceforth distinguish him in the sequel of our history. Though the whole power of the senate and people was now vested in Augustus, yet, that he might seem to share it with the conscript fathers, he refused to govern all the provinces, assigning to the senate such as were quiet and peaceable, and keeping to himself those that, bordering upon the barbarous nations, were most exposed to troubles and wars, saying, He desired the fathers might enjoy their power with ease and safety, while he underwent all the dangers and labours; but by this politic conduct he secured all the military power to himself, the troops lying in the provinces he had chosen, and the others, which were governed by the senate, being quite destitute of forces. The latter were called senatorial, and the former imperial, provinces. The senatorial were, Africa, that is, the ancient dominions of Carthage, Numidia, Asia properly so called, or the ancient kingdom of Pergamus, Greece, styled by most historians Achaia, Epirus, Dalmatia, Macedon, Sicily, Sardinia, the island of Crete, Libya, Cyrenaica, Bitthynia, Pontus, and that part of Spain called Bætica. The imperial provinces were, the rest of Spain, comprehending the provinces of Tarracón and Lusitania, all Gaul and Germany, Cæle-Syria, Phœnice, Cilicia, the island of Cyprus; and the kingdom of Egypt. Over the provinces of both sorts were set men of distinction, viz. such as had been consuls or prætors, with the title of proconsul and proprætor; but the government of Egypt was committed to a private knight, Augustus fearing lest a person of rank, depending upon the wealth and situation of that country, might raise new disturbances in the empire^s. All these governors held their employment only for a year, and were, upon the arrival of their successors, to depart their provinces immediately, and not fail to be at Rome within three months at the farthest^t. This division of the provinces was made, according to Ovid, on the ides of January (A); whereas he was vested by the senate and people with the sovereign power on the seventh of the ides of the same month, as is manifest from the Narbonne marbles^u; and from that time many writers date the years of his empire. Thus ended the greatest commonwealth, and at the same time began the greatest monarchy, that had ever been known; a monarchy, which infinitely excelled in power, riches, extent and continuance all the monarchies and empires which had preceded it; for it comprehended the greatest, and by far the best, part of Europe, Asia, and Africa, being near four thousand miles in length, and about half as much in breadth. As to the yearly revenues of the empire, they have, by a modest computation, been reckoned to amount to forty millions of our money. But the Romans themselves now ran headlong into all manner of luxury and effeminacy. The people were become a mere mob; those who were wont to direct mighty wars, to raise and depose great kings, to bestow or take away great empires, were so sunk and debauched, that if they had but bread and shoes, their ambition went no higher. The nobility were indeed more polite than in former times, but at the same time idle, venal, vicious, insensible of private virtue, utter strangers to public glory or disgrace, void of zeal for the welfare of their country, and solely intent on gaining the favour of the emperor, as knowing, that certain wealth and preferment were the rewards of ready submission, acquiescence, and flattery. No wonder therefore, that they lost their liberty, without being ever again able to retrieve it.

The history of Rome, from the perfect settlement of the Roman empire to the death of Nero, the last of the family of the Cæsars.The forces of the empire.

THE first and chief care of Augustus, now absolute master of the whole Roman empire, was to satisfy his soldiers, and attach them more and more to his interest. With this view he dispersed them all over Italy in thirty-two colonies, that he might the more easily reassemble them in case of any sudden commotion. He kept twenty-five legions on foot, seventeen of which were in Europe, viz. eight on the Rhine, four on the Danube, three in Spain, and two in Dalmatia. The other eight were sent into Asia and Africa, four of them being quartered in the neighbourhood of the Euphrates and in Syria, two in Egypt, and two in the province of Africa, that is, in the ancient dominions of Carthage. These were constantly maintained, even in the most peaceable times, by Augustus, and for some ages by his successors, their whole number amounting to 170,650 men. In the neighbourhood of Rome were always quartered twelve cohorts, that is, about ten thousand men, nine of which were called cohortes prætorie, or prætorian cohorts, and the other three cohortes urbanæ, or city cohorts. They were established to guard the emperor's person, and maintain peace and tranquillity in the city. The prætorian guards had, as we shall see in the sequel of this history, a great share in all the changes and revolutions of the empire, till the reign of Constantine the Great, who dismissed them all in the year 312 of the christian æra.

The policy of Augustus.

BESIDES these numerous and well disciplined land-forces, Augustus kept constantly at sea two powerful fleets, the one riding at anchor near Ravenna in the Upper or Adriatic sea, to command and defend Dalmatia, Greece, Cyprus, Asia, and the rest of the eastern provinces; the other at Misenum in the Lower or Mediterranean sea, to awe and protect Gaul, Spain, Africa, and the western provinces. They were likewise to keep the seas clear of pirates, to convoy the vessels which brought to Rome the annual tributes from the provinces beyond sea, and to transport corn and other provisions, necessary for the subsistence and relief of the city. As to the civil government, he reformed many of the ancient laws and enacted new ones; but therein affected to do nothing, without the advice and approbation of the conscript fathers. The comitia were held as formerly in the field of Mars; but such only were chosen for the great offices, as Augustus had before-hand recommended to the centuries. In short, the same officers of state, the same names, pomp, and ornaments were continued, with all the appearance of authority, but without the least power^w. However, the senate pretended to be so well pleased with his government, that they honoured him with the title of Pater patriæ, or Father of his country. Towards the end of this year, Augustus, having settled affairs in the capital, left Italy and passed into Gaul, with a design to attempt the reduction of the British islands; but being informed, on his arrival at Narbonne, that the Salassi at the foot of the Alps, and the Cantabri and Astures in Spain, had shaken off the yoke, he sent Terentius Varro against the former, and marched in person against the latter, after having entered his eighth consulship, in which he chose for his colleague Titus Statilius Taurus, one of his lieutenants. However, before he left Gaul, he took a census of the inhabitants of the three provinces into which that country was then divided, and which is the first we read of made out of Italy^z. On his arrival in Spain, he defeated the Cantabri in a pitched battle near Vellica, at a small distance from the Iberus, and obliged them to retire with their wives and children to one of their highest mountains, called by the ancients Vindius, and by the moderns the

^a the mountain of Asturias. But, in the mean time, Augustus falling sick, the whole management of the war was committed to C. Antistius; who having defeated the united forces of the Cantabrians and Asturians in a great battle, forced them to take refuge on another inaccessible mountain, which he surrounded with a wide and deep ditch fifteen miles in compass, and fortified at proper distances with castles and turrets. By this means, all the avenues and passes being shut up, those unhappy people were reduced to the utmost extremity for want of provisions; yet so great was their love of liberty, that, instead of yielding, they endured for a long time miseries hardly to be expressed, the women devouring their own children, and the young men the old, to support the necessities of nature. After many unsuccessful attempts to force the Roman intrenchments, the Asturians were at length for throwing themselves upon the clemency of the conqueror; but were therein opposed by the Cantabrians, who maintained, that they ought all, like brave men, die sword in hand. This dangerous contention was carried so far, that, after a sharp conflict, in which many fell on both sides, the Asturians, to the number of ten thousand, were driven to the intrenchments of the Romans, whom they begged in a most moving manner to receive them upon what terms they pleased. But Tiberius, the emperor's son-in-law, refusing to admit them into the camp, some of those unhappy wretches fell upon their own swords; others lighting great fires, threw themselves into them, and perished in the flames; and some put an end to their lives by drinking the juice of a venomous herb, which grew in the forest they possessed ².

^c In the mean time, the consular year being expired, Augustus, who still resided at Tarracon, whither he had retired in the beginning of the campaign, entered there on his ninth consulship, and chose for his colleague M. Junius Silanus ³. This year was remarkable for the total reduction of Spain, after it had, for the space of two hundred years and upwards, given the Romans constant employment, and obliged them to keep there numerous armies. The Cantabrians, whom Antistius kept closely intrenched, were at length forced to surrender at discretion, to the number of twenty-three thousand. Of these ten thousand were incorporated among the Roman auxiliaries to be employed against the Asturians, the rest were disarmed, and sold to the best bidder; but most of them laid violent hands on themselves, despising their lives, after the loss of their liberty and arms ⁴. Cantabria, now Biscay, being thus intirely reduced, Augustus divided his army into two bodies; the one he detached, under the command of Titus Carisius, into Lusitania, whither some of the Asturians had retired, and the other he led himself into their country. The Asturians in Lusitania were in a battle, which lasted two days, and was one of the most bloody that had ever been fought, intirely defeated by Carisius, who could not help owning, that the Asturians equalled in valour the Romans themselves. On the other hand, Augustus and Antistius entering the country of those brave, but unfortunate, people, cut most of them in pieces, and made themselves masters of all their cities and strong-holds. Thus were the two most warlike nations of Spain forced at length to receive the yoke, and bear it, without being ever after able to recover their ancient liberty. Augustus, before he left the country, built several cities to keep the rebellious Spaniards in awe, among the rest Cæsar Augusta, now Saragosa, and Augusta Emerita, now Merida, so called because it was founded by Augustus, and peopled by his veterans called in Latin Emeriti ⁵. He likewise built a stone-bridge over the Iberus, to facilitate the march of the Roman troops from one province to another.

And also the Asturians.

^e This year several wars were carried on with equal success in other parts. Marcus Crassus, one of Augustus's lieutenants, overcame the Mærians, a fierce and savage people beyond the Danube. M. Vincius gained considerable advantages over some nations of Germany, for which the title of Imperator was conferred upon Augustus, under whose auspices Vincius had fought. Terrentius Varro, surnamed Murena, reduced the Salassi, and obliged them to submit to such terms as he thought proper to impose upon them. After they had delivered up their arms, Varro sent forty thousand of their youth to Eporedia, now Ivrea, where they were condemned to slavery for the term of twenty years. Augustus divided their lands among the soldiers of his guard, and founded in the new colony a city, which he called Augusta Prætoria, now known by the name of Aosta ⁶. The whole glory of this expedition was ascribed to Augustus, tho' he was then in Spain, and a stately monument erected by a decree of the senate to Cornelius Gallus banished.

WHILE Augustus was waging war with the rebellious Spaniards, Cornelius Gallus, to whom Virgil inscribed his tenth and last eclogue, was condemned to perpetual banishment by the senate, for having spoken with too much liberty of Augustus. He had been appointed by the emperor, who loved and esteemed him on account of his fine genius, the first governor of Egypt, which he oppressed in a most tyrannical manner, stripping the most wealthy cities of the country, particularly the famous city of Thebes, of all their ornaments, and laying heavy taxes on the inhabitants. Puffed up with pride, he ruled more like an absolute monarch, than a subordinate magistrate, erecting statues to himself in the chief cities of that kingdom, and inscribing his own name and feats on the pyramids. Such extraordinary proceedings obliged Augustus to recall him, to brand him with infamy, and forbid him his house and the provinces under his command. Hereupon Gallus uttered many disrespectful speeches against the emperor; for which, as well as for his rapines, extortions, and other misdemeanours, he was, by the unanimous suffrages of the senate, condemned to banishment; but he prevented the execution of the sentence, by falling on his own sword^e.

He lays violent hands on himself.

Augustus, whose favour he had gained by his military exploits and the elegance of his poetical compositions, is said to have wept, when he received in Spain the news of his death, complaining, that he alone was not allowed to set what bounds he pleased to his resentment. However, he returned thanks to the senate for the zeal they had shewn on this occasion for the safety of his person and the glory of his name^f. This year died Amyntas king of Pisidia. He had been secretary to old king Dejotarus, and raised by Marc Antony, whom he served with great fidelity, to the throne, which Augustus suffered him to enjoy, but would not allow him to transmit it to his posterity; so that Pisidia, with Galatia and Lycaonia, upon his death, were reduced to a Roman province, and first governed by M. Lollius in quality of proprætor^g.

Pisidia, Galatia, &c. become a Roman province.

DURING Augustus's stay in Spain, Agrippa, who had remained in Rome, was no less employed in adorning with magnificent structures that stately metropolis, than others were in extending its dominions. Among the many public edifices he built at his own charges, the most remarkable were, the porch and temple of Neptune, the hot baths, called Thermæ Agrippæ, and the Pantheon, a celebrated temple, so named, according to Dion, from the many images of the gods with which it was embellished, or rather from its arched roof, which resembled the heavens. This wonderful structure was finished this year, in the ninth consulship of Augustus, and is preserved intire to this day. While Augustus continued at Tarracon, his health not allowing him yet to set out on his return to Rome, he had the satisfaction to see the most remote nations of the north and the east, that is, the Scythians, the Sarmatians, the Indians, and the Seres (B), courting his friendship with embassies and rich presents^h. Florus tells

(B) The Seres, the same people whom we now call the Chinese, are thought to have been the first who made silk; whence silk was called serica, and a silken garment sericum, by the Greeks as well as by the Latins. From the country of the Seres, that is, from China, silk was brought into Persia, and from Persia into Greece and Italy. It was first brought into Greece on Alexander's conquering Persia, and from thence into Italy in the flourishing times of the Roman empire. It was for a long time very dear in these western parts, being weight for weight of equal value with gold; for the Persians, to keep this manufacture to themselves, would not allow the silk-worms to be carried out of Persia, or any one to pass from thence into the west, who were skilled in the management of them. But the emperor Justinian, who died in the year of the christianæra 565, looking upon it as a great hardship, that his subjects should purchase this manufacture of the Persians at so dear a rate, sent two monks into India, to learn there how the silken manufacture was managed, ordering them to bring with them on their return some silk-worms, that he might set up the manufacture in his own dominions. These monks on their return told him, that the silk-worms could not be brought so long a journey, but the emperor understanding from them that their eggs might, he sent them back for them; and by this means great quantities of these eggs were brought to Constantinople. From these eggs have been propagated all the silk-worms and silk trade, which have been since that time in Europe. The ancients were so ignorant how silk was made, that they believed it was produced, like cotton, from trees. For a long time it was worn only by women, it being thought a great instance of luxury and effeminacy for a man to wear a silken garment. In the beginning of the reign of Tiberius, a law was made,

^a tells us, that the Seres were four years on their journey, and that they presented Augustus with pearls, precious stones, and elephants. The fame of Cæsar's moderation in the midst of his victories was that chiefly prompted those distant nations, if we believe Suetonius ⁱ, to solicit his friendship. This year ended with two marriages, viz. of Cleopatra Selene, the daughter of queen Cleopatra by Antony, with Juba king of Getulia; of whom we have spoken above, and of Julia, Augustus's daughter by Scrubonia, with Marcellus, his sister Octavia's son by her first husband, a youth of extraordinary accomplishments, and already adopted by Augustus, who had no hopes of issue by his wife Livia, whom he passionately loved. As the emperor was still kept in Spain by the bad state of his health, the ceremonies used by the Romans on such occasions were performed with all imaginable pomp and magnificence by Agrippa ^k.

^b THE ensuing year, Augustus entered upon his tenth consulship, having C. Norbanus Flaccus for his colleague; but whether he was then in Spain; on his journey, or at Rome, is uncertain. Upon his return to the capital, which happened in the end of the preceding year or the beginning of this, the senate conferred a greater authority upon him than ever, freeing him from the obligation of all laws, and empowering him to govern the republic according to his arbitrary will and pleasure. At the same time, by a solemn oath they approved of all his acts, and decreed, that Marcellus, tho' then not above sixteen years of age, should, on account of his extraordinary merit, have a place in the senate among those of the prætorian rank, and that he might stand for the consulate, ten years sooner than he was allowed by the laws. It was likewise ordained in favour of Tiberius, son-in-law to Augustus, that he might stand for the curule officers, five years sooner than the usual time. These decrees were no sooner passed, than Marcellus was made ædile, and Tiberius quæstor ^l. This year was remarkable for an expedition against the southern Arabs, undertaken by Ælius Gallus, a Roman knight, and the third governor of Egypt under Augustus. The emperor being informed, that South Arabia abounded in gold, silver, and other riches, resolved either to make them his friends by treaties, and so open a way for commerce with them, or by conquest to make them his subjects. He had also this farther view, viz. in case he should, either as a friend or conqueror, get footing in that country, to open himself an easy way for the subduing of the Troglodites, their country being separated from South Arabia only by the narrow streights, now called the streights of Babelmandel, through which the Arabian gulf discharges itself into the southern ocean. For the carrying on of this expedition, Augustus furnished Gallus with ten thousand men; Herod king of Judæa sent him five hundred drawn out of his own guards; and Obodas king of the Nabathean Arabs a thousand more; under the command of Syllæus his chief minister. Syllæus undertook to be Gallus's guide in this expedition; but with no other view than to betray him, and make the undertaking miscarry. Gallus had proposed to march through the country of the Nabatheans, and from thence into South Arabia, or Arabia Felix; but Syllæus falsely informing him, that there was no safe passage thither by land, he built a hundred and thirty transports at Cleopatriis, a port at the bottom of the Arabian gulf or Red sea, and, putting his army on board of them, sailed for Leucocome, a maritime city of the Nabatheans, on the other side of that sea. As this was a very dangerous navigation, on account of the many rocks and shelves which are in that part of the Arabian gulf, and Syllæus conducted them the worst way through it, he was fifteen days in his passage, and lost a great many ships. Upon his landing, his whole army was seized with a distemper common in that country, which obliged him to continue inactive, at Leucocome and in that neighbourhood, the remaining part of the summer and the following winter. Early next spring, he set out from Leucocome, and, after a most painful march of six months southward, being led by the treacherous Syllæus through ways almost impassable, he arrived at length on the borders of Arabia Felix. Upon his approach, Sabus, king of the country, fled, abandoning his metropolis, called by Strabo the city of the Agrans, which Gallus took by assault. From thence he continued his march southward, and arrived the sixth day at a river, where he was met by a numerous body of Arabs, who had assembled with a design to dispute his passage; but Gallus, falling upon them, cut ten thousand of them in pieces, with the loss of two men only. He then, without further opposition, made himself master of Annestus, Asca, Magusum, Tommacum, Labeccia, Mariaba, a city six miles in compass, Athrula, where he left a garrison, and Caripeta. From Caripeta he penetrated farther into the country, and, after some days march, came to Marfyabæ, a city of the Rhamanites, who were governed by a petty prince named Ilajarus. He besieged the place; but was obliged, after several unsuccessful attempts, to drop that enterprize for want of water. In the mean time, his men being seized with various distempers, occasioned by the heat of the climate and the unwholsomeness of the air, water, and herbs of the country, and great numbers of them dropping off daily, he thought it adviseable to march back into the country of the Nabathæans, and from thence pursue his rout into Egypt. Accordingly, having by this time discovered the treachery of Syllæus, he set out on his march homeward, under the conduct of more faithful guides, and came in six days to Anagrana; whence, after having put to flight king Sabus, who attempted to harass him on his march, he pursued his journey to Negra, called also Hygra, a maritime city of the Nabathæan country, which he reached in sixty days; whereas he had spent six months in marching from thence to the confines of Arabia. At Negra he imbarqued his troops, and having crossed the Arabian gulf in eleven days, he landed at Myos Hormus on the Egyptian side; and from thence, by the way of Coptus, led back the poor remains of his army to Alexandria, after having spent two years in this unhappy expedition. In the several skirmishes he had with the enemy, he lost only seven men; but the far greater part of his forces perished, either by famine or diseases^m. Some of the medicinal compositions, which he invented against the distempers that reigned in his army, are mentioned by Galen, and among the rest treacle, which on his return he presented to Augustus, telling him, that it had saved the lives of many of his soldiersⁿ. The bad success, that had attended Ælius in this expedition, deterred both him and others from any further attempts on that country; so that the inhabitants of Arabia Felix in the east, and the Scots in the north, as we shall observe hereafter, were the only people who continued to enjoy their liberties to the downfall of the Roman empire, while all the other nations of the then known world groaned under the yoke.

of Ethiopia, invades Egypt.

But is defeated

who takes several of her cities.

WHILE Ælius Gallus was employed with part of the Egyptian army in this expedition, Candace, queen of Ethiopia, invading the province of Thebais in Upper Egypt with a great army, surpris'd the cities of Syene, Elephantina, and Phyllis, carried the Romans who garisoned them into captivity, overthrew Augustus's statues, and laid waste the whole country. Hereupon C. Petronius, at that time governor of Egypt, having with all imaginable expedition got together a body of ten thousand foot and eight hundred horse, marched against the warlike queen, and coming up with her in the neighbourhood of Pselcha, a city of Ethiopia on the banks of the Nile, obliged her to give battle, defeated her army, tho' thirty thousand strong, and made himself master of Pselcha, a city of Ethiopia on the side of Egypt. From Pselcha Petronius penetrated above eight hundred miles into the country; and after having passed those deserts, where the whole army of Cambyfes is said to have been by a sudden storm buried in the sand, he took, without opposition, the cities of Premnis, Aboccis, Phturis, Cambyfes, Atteva, and Stadifis; which last place stood near the cataracts of the Nile. Encouraged with this success, the Roman general advanced to Napata, which Dion calls Tenape, the metropolis of the kingdom, which he took and destroyed, and from thence marched forward, till at length being able to proceed no farther by reason of the great deserts, nor stay there any longer on account of the excessive heats of the climate, he was obliged to turn back. Having therefore put a garison of four hundred men into Premnis, one of the strongest fortresses of Ethiopia, and supplied it with provisions for two years, he returned to Alexandria, carrying with him many thousand captives, whom he sold for slaves, except one thousand, in which number were the chief commanders of Candace's army; and those he sent as a present to Augustus. The queen of Ethiopia, upon the first notice of the departure of the Romans, having

^a having assembled new forces, attacked with great vigor the garison they had left at Premis; but Petronius returning with a quickness and expedition hardly to be imagined, she was obliged not only to raise the siege, but to conclude a peace upon terms very advantageous to the Romans. However, Augustus afterwards remitted the tribute, which she was, pursuant to the treaty, to pay yearly to the Roman people, and restored to her all the cities which Petronius, had seized [°]. The queen concludes a peace with the Romans.

^b DURING these transactions in the east, the Asturians and Cantabrians attempted anew the recovery of their liberty; and having by a stratagem surprised a considerable body of Romans, put them all to the sword. But Ælius Lama, whom Augustus had left governor of that part of Spain, soon revenged their death, laying waste the whole country with fire and sword, and cruelly massacring most of their young men who were able to bear arms: by which means he reduced them in less than a month to an intire subjection [°]. The Cantabrians and Asturians rebel, but are soon reduced

^c THE following year, Augustus, being in his eleventh consulship with Cn. Calpurnius Piso, fell into a dangerous distemper, which brought him to the point of death. When he thought himself past recovery, he sent for the curule magistrates and the chief men of the senatorial and equestrian order, who came immediately to attend him, not doubting, but he designed to name in their presence his successor, and intail the empire on his family. They were therefore greatly surprised to see the dying emperor, without uttering a single word, put into the hands of his colleague Calpurnius Augustus at the point of death.

^d Piso his last will, and with it a book of his own writing, which contained a distinct and minute account of all the towns, provinces, allies, forces, riches, and taxes of the whole Roman empire. The contents of his will, which was to be opened only after his death, were never known; but, from his not naming a successor and his delivering to the chief magistrate, in so critical a juncture, an account of the revenues and forces of the empire, they all concluded, that his design was to put the commonwealth once more into the hands of the senate and people. His ring he delivered in the presence of all to Agrippa, signifying thereby, as was then interpreted; that if they desired to be governed by one man, they could not chuse a person more fit for so great a trust than Agrippa. As for Marcellus, his son-in-law, his nephew, and his son by adoption, whom every one expected he would name for his successor, he seemed to have entirely forgot him. This unexpected behaviour of Augustus at the point of death, when his sincerity could not be reasonably questioned, gained him the affections of the people, above any thing he had hitherto done in their behalf. They thought him more worthy of being solemnly deified and ranked among the gods, in regard of the disinterested love he shewed for his country, than his father Julius on account of all his warlike exploits. But the apotheosis of Augustus was put off for many years; for Antonius Musa, a famous Greek physician, and brother to Euphorbus physician to Juba king of Mauritania, by cooling potions and the use of the cold bath, restored him to his health, to the great real, or seeming, satisfaction of the senate and people, who immediately ordered a statue of brass to be erected to Musa over-against that of Æsculapius, a distinction never before granted to any freed-man. He was also allowed to wear a gold ring, and all persons of his profession were for ever, out of gratitude to him, exempted from all manner of taxes and tributes [°]. The recovery of Augustus occasioned great rejoicings in the city; medals were struck, many of which have reached our times, and the most magnificent sports exhibited that had ever been seen in Rome. We are told, that some fathers, then on their death-beds, commanded their children to sacrifice victims in their name by way of thanksgiving to Jupiter Capitolinus, with this inscription, The day of our death was the day of Augustus's recovery [°]. Antonius Musa restores him to his health. Rejoicings at Rome for his recovery.

^e The emperor, as soon as he was in a condition to appear abroad, went to the senate-house, and, after having thanked the fathers in most obliging terms for the concern they had shewn during his illness, and the joy they had expressed on his recovery, he opened his will, and offered to read it to the assembly, in order to convince them, that he had appointed himself no successor, but left them at full liberty either of re-establishing the ancient form of government, or chusing for themselves a sovereign; but they all cried out with one voice, That they would not by any means suffer him to take that trouble, which was to no purpose, since they were, without any further proof, fully convinced of the sincerity of his intentions, and his disinterested zeal for the public welfare [°].

Marcellus and Agrippa.

New honours heaped upon Augustus.

Tiridates at Rome.

Augustus's answer to his em-bassadors, and to those of Phraates.

THE behaviour of Augustus during his illness occasioned a misunderstanding between Marcellus and Agrippa. The former thinking himself injured by his uncle, who had preferred to one of his own family a man of a mean descent, a mere soldier of fortune, expressed his resentment, not against the emperor, but against his favourite, treating him on several occasions with great contempt. On the other hand, Agrippa was not a man to bear with any ill usage. The emperor therefore, to prevent the evil consequences of their mutual jealousies, thought it adviseable to part them; and accordingly appointed Agrippa governor of Syria, who immediately left Rome, but went no farther than Mitylene in the island of Lesbos, whence he sent his lieutenants to govern the provinces committed to his care.

AND now Augustus, thinking his authority sufficiently established, resigned the fasces, after having held them nine years together, to P. Sestius, a man of an unblemished character, but a constant and faithful friend to Brutus, under whom he had served in the battle of Philippi in quality of proquaestor, and whose memory he still revered, keeping his picture in his house, and commending on all occasions the zeal of that brave patriot for the welfare of his country. The senate was so affected with this impartial conduct of Augustus, in preferring a man of Sestius's character to many of his own friends, who aspired at the same dignity, that they heaped new honours upon him, declared him perpetual proconsul of the Roman empire, impowered him to assemble the senate when he pleased, and, what he valued above all other prerogatives, allowed him to exercise the authority of the tribuneship, and enjoy all the privileges annexed to that dignity, not only within the walls of Rome, but in the most distant provinces. Such an ample and unlimited power was without precedent; but the emperor readily accepted it, as it rendered his person sacred, and secured him against all outrages and insults, whether in words or actions. His successors never parted with this power; but, after the example of Augustus, caused it to be recorded in public registers in these terms; Tribunitiæ potestatis primum, secundum, &c. Thus were the Romans, by raising the authority of their emperors, daily rivetting their own chains. In the consulate of Cn. Calpurnius Piso and L. Sestius, Phraates king of Parthia being restored to the throne by the Scythians, Tiridates, whom the Parthians had chose in his room, being obliged to save himself by flight, came to Rome, with the chief men of his party, to solicit the assistance of Augustus, promising to hold the kingdom of him, in case he was restored by his means to the throne. On the other hand, Phraates, hearing he had fled to Rome, sent ambassadors after him to defeat his designs, and to demand of Augustus the delivery of his rebellious slaves, as he styled them, and the release of his son, whom Tiridates had put into his hands at Antioch, when he passed through that city on his return to Italy after the reduction of Egypt. Augustus introduced the ambassadors of the contending parties to the senate; but after they had pleaded the cause of their respective princes before the fathers, without consulting them, he answered the ambassadors himself in the same manner as he had done before at Antioch, viz. That he would not deliver Tiridates into the hands of Phraates, nor assist either of them against the other. However, to gratify both in something, he gave Tiridates leave to live at Rome, ordering him out of the public treasury an allowance suitable to his rank, and sent back to Phraates his son, on condition that he should restore all the captives and ensigns taken from Crassus and Antony. This Phraates promised; but did not perform till three years after*. This year Marcellus was seized with a hectic fever, which Antonius Musa undertook to cure; but the remedies he prescribed, the same which had saved the life of Augustus, were commonly believed to have occasioned his death, which happened in the nineteenth year of his age, to the inexpressible grief of Augustus, his mother Octavia, and the Roman people, whose hearts he had won by his extraordinary accomplishments, obliging behaviour, and uncommon modesty. Tho' this year proved very sickly, and many were carried off by the reigning distempers, yet the ambitious Livia was generally charged with the death of that hopeful youth, whom she was believed to have dispatched by means of Antonius Musa, to make room for Tiberius and Drusus her own children. His funeral obsequies were performed with the utmost magnificence in a in the campus Martius, Augustus himself, who was his nearest relation, pronouncing; according to custom, his funeral oration^y.

THE next year, M. Claudius Marcellus Æternus and L. Arruntius being consuls, a dreadful plague raged in Rome and all the other cities of Italy; which, as the lands were left untilld, was attended with a general famine. The Tiber overflowed, and laid great part of the city under water. Lightning fell on the Pantheon, and there dashed to pieces several statues, &c. The populace imagining, that the gods visited them with these, and threatened them with greater calamities, because they had suffered Augustus to lay down the consulate, surrounded the senate-house, and threatened to set fire to it, unless the fathers immediately created him dictator. The
b conscript fathers readily complied with their request; whereupon the people repaired in great crouds to the house of Augustus, with twenty-four axes and fasces, intreating him to accept of the dictatorship; but he wisely declined the envy and danger of that title, having already all the power and authority annexed to it. However, that he might not seem to despise the favours of the people, he accepted the office of general purveyor, which had been formerly conferred on Pompey the Great, and took care to supply the city with great plenty of provisions, appointing annually two persons for that purpose, who had discharged the prætorship two years before. As to the office of perpetual censor, he could by no means be prevailed to take it upon him; but named to that important employment Paulus Æmilius Lepidus, brother to the triumvir, by whom he had been proscribed, and L. Munacius Plancus, formerly one of Antony's most zealous partizans; but Lepidus dying soon after, and Plancus, who was a man of a most infamous character, being no ways qualified to censure the vices of others, Augustus took upon himself to perform the functions, tho' he declined the title, of that magistracy, and enacted many excellent laws relating to the reformation of manners, which gained him the love and esteem of the whole city. He suppressed several private assemblies, and reformed others; from the ædiles he transferred the care of the public shews and sports to the prætors, whom he reduced to ten, and would not allow them to exhibit the usual sports at their own charges, but obliged the people to contribute a small sum for their own diversions, and paid the d rest out of the public treasury. As the ædileship was the first step to public honours, the young noblemen often spent their whole fortunes, and reduced themselves to beggary, by the expensive shews with which they entertained the people, in hopes of being raised by their suffrages to the superior magistracies; and it was to obviate this abuse, that Augustus committed the celebrating of the games to the prætors, and would have the charges attending them divided between the people and the public treasury. To the curule ædiles he committed the care of extinguishing fires, allowing them for that service six hundred slaves, who were bought and maintained at the public expence. He likewise ordered by a particular edict, that none should exhibit the shew of gladiators without leave from the senate, and then only twice a year, and e with no more than one hundred and twenty combatants. As many persons of rank, women as well as men, had of late debased themselves to act and dance upon the stage, Augustus restrained such scandalous practices, by forbidding, under the severest penalties, any of the senatorial or equestrian order to appear on the stage, and extending this prohibition to the children and grand-children of senators^z. In these regulations he exerted the power and authority of an absolute prince and legislator; but in other things used great condescension, affecting to appear in courts of judicature like a private person, and even to plead for his friends, or attend them when cited before the prætors or other judges. This complaisance often drew insults upon him from the adverse parties, as it happened in the case of one M. Primus, who was accused f of having made an irruption into the country of the Odrysians, while he was governor of Macedon. Primus maintained, that he had been ordered by Augustus to make war upon the Odrysians; whereupon Augustus, appearing soon after in court, was asked by the prætor, Whether Primus's plea was true or no? The emperor answered, That Primus was certainly mistaken, since he was very sure he had given no such orders. This open and positive declaration left no room for any reply; which so provoked L. Murena, who pleaded for Primus, that he could not help asking the emperor with great boldness and anger, What business he had there? and what had brought him to a place where he was neither expected nor wanted? The public good, replied replied Augustus with great calmness and moderation. This deportment gained him the esteem of many; but others, who were enemies to Augustus in their hearts, and wished to see the ancient form of government restored, laid hold of this opportunity to stir up Murena, and to enter into a conspiracy with him against the tyrant of Rome, as they styled him. Murena and Fannius Cæpio, the former a man of an unblemished character, and the latter the greatest debauchee in Rome, took upon them the whole management of the plot, for the execution of which a day and place was already appointed. But, in the mean time, Murena disclosed the whole to his sister Terentilla, and she to her husband Mecænas, who gave notice of it to the emperor, after having advised his brother-in-law and the other conspirators to abscond, till such time as he should obtain, as he hoped to do, their pardon. But Augustus would not hearken to the intreaties either of Mecænas or Proculus, who was brother to Murena, and in such favour with the emperor, that he had been long in suspense, whether he should bestow his daughter Julia on him or Marcellus. As Augustus proved inflexible, the conspirators were summoned to take their trials, and not appearing, interdicted by a majority of suffrages fire and water, throughout the whole extent of the Roman empire. Cæpio was conveyed in the night-time by a faithful slave to the Tiber in a basket, and put on board a small vessel which landed him at Ostia. From Ostia the slave conducted him safe to Laurentum, and from thence to Cumæ, where he was betrayed by another slave to a centurion, who cut off his head and carried it to Rome. Murena was discovered in Rome, and assassinated by Augustus's emissaries. As the conspirators were absolved by the votes of some of the judges, the emperor, fearing such criminals might for the future go unpunished, enacted the two following laws, viz. That all guilty persons who refused to appear, should be condemned to the same punishments, which would have been inflicted upon them, if they had been regularly tried and convicted; and that for the future the judges in criminal cases should deliver their opinions, not in writing, but openly and by word of mouth. Lest the severity he shewed on this occasion, and the new laws he enacted, might estrange the minds of the people from him, he took no notice of the odd behaviour of old Cæpio, who not only set at liberty the slave who had conveyed his son out of Rome, but sentenced the other to be crucified, after having caused him to be led through all the streets of Rome with a writing, which expressed the cause of his punishment. At this time, Augustus, out of complaisance to the senate, whom his severity towards two men of rank might have provoked, delivered up to the conscript fathers the provinces of Cyprus and Narbonne Gaul, which, from this time, began to be ranked among the proconsular provinces, and to be governed by magistrates sent thither by the senate^a. This same year, the Cantabrians and Asturians revolted anew; but were soon brought under subjection by C. Furnius. Many of the Cantabrians, finding they could not shake off the yoke, chose rather to lay violent hands on themselves than to bear it; so deep was the love of liberty imprinted in the hearts of that brave people^b!

AND now Italy and all the provinces in the west enjoying a profound tranquillity, Augustus resolved to take a progress into the east, and with this view set out for Sicily towards the end of the year, leaving the people at full liberty to chuse for consuls whom they pleased. At the time therefore appointed for the great elections the centuries met, and with one consent raised to the consulate Augustus, and gave him M. Lollius for his colleague; but he refusing to accept of that dignity, and even to name another in his room, the centuries met a second time, when such disorders were raised in the comitia, by the ambition of two competitors, L. Silanus and Q. Æmilius Lepidus, that the wiser citizens thought it proper to acquaint Augustus therewith, and solicit him to return to Rome, and with his presence put a stop to the contests and divisions, which the opposite factions had raised in the city. Augustus heard the account of these disturbances with a secret satisfaction, hoping they would convince the most zealous and obstinate republicans, that they were no longer capable of governing themselves as formerly. However, lest the quarrels of two such men, who had a great number of clients and were allied to most of the chief families in Rome, should produce a civil war, he sent for the candidates, reprimanded them severely, and commanded them to keep at a distance from Rome till the election was over. But this did not restore tranquillity to the city; the friends of the two competitors supported their respective interest with the same warmth as if they had been present; but but at length Lepidus's party prevailed, and he was chosen consul. However, Augustus, to prevent such disturbances for the future, as he could not be always at Rome himself, judged it necessary to create a new magistrate, whose province should be to maintain peace and tranquillity in the metropolis. Agrippa seemed to him the most proper person for so great a command. He therefore dispatched a messenger to him, ordering him to quit the island of Lesbos and repair to him in Sicily. On his arrival, to procure him more respect and authority in his new employment, he commanded him to divorce Marcella, tho' daughter to Octavia and Augustus's niece, and to marry his daughter Julia, the widow of Marcellus. We are told, that Mecænas promoted this match, by suggesting to Augustus, when he consulted him about it, that since he had already made Agrippa so great and powerful, he ought either to cut him off, or unalterably attach him to his interest by marrying him to his daughter^b. The marriage was celebrated with the utmost pomp and magnificence, and Agrippa immediately after took his leave of Augustus, and set out for Rome, where he discharged his new office with great applause, being equally beloved by the senate and people.

He marries Julia, Augustus's daughter.

IN the mean time; Augustus, having settled the affairs of Sicily, passed over into Greece, where he shewed particular marks of his favour to the Lacedæmonians, on whom he bestowed the island of Cithæra and five cities, as a reward for the kindness they had formerly shewn to Livia, when she fled with her husband and son out of Italy. The Athenians he punished for having erected statues to Brutus and Cassius, and afterwards sided with Antony. He took from them the island of Ægina and the city of Eretria, forbidding them for the future to sell the right of citizenship, which brought them in vast sums, the Romans themselves glorying in being free of Athens^c. From Greece Augustus sailed to Samos, and there wintered.

EARLY in the spring, M. Apuleius and P. Silius Nerva being consuls, Augustus left Samos, and crossed over into Asia, settling the affairs of the provinces through which he passed, in as absolute a manner as if they had belonged to himself and not to the senate. He deprived the Cyzicans of their liberty, for having whipt and put to death some Roman citizens. The same punishment he inflicted on the inhabitants of Tyre and Sidon, judging this the most effectual method of putting an end to the factions, which reigned in these two cities, and were attended with frequent murders. As he drew near the borders of Parthia, Phraabates king of that country, dreading a foreign war, as he was universally hated by his subjects, not only sent back to him all the ensigns and captives taken by the Parthians, in their wars with Crassus and Antony, but yielded to all the conditions which Augustus required, giving four of his sons with their wives and children as hostages for the performance of them^d; whereupon Justin observes, that Augustus did more by the greatness of his name, than any other commander could have done by a long and bloody war^e; but Tacitus tells us, that not the fear of Augustus, but the diffidence Phraabates had of his own people, induced him thereunto^f; and with him agree Strabo^g and Josephus^h (C). However, Augustus, no less proud of having thus recovered the Roman eagles and captives, than

(C) So far as we can gather from their writings, the whole matter seems to have passed in the following manner: A very beautiful Italian woman, named Thermusa, having been formerly sent by Augustus to Phraabates as a present, the king entertained her first as his concubine, and afterwards, on her bringing him a son, married her, and declared her queen. In this station she gained an absolute ascendant over him, which she made use of to secure the succession to her son. With this view she proposed to Phraabates the putting of his other sons, whose names were Sarospades, Cerospades, Phraabates, and Vonones, into the hands of the Romans. Phraabates, not thinking himself safe against his subjects, so long as there were any of the race of Arfaces of an age fit to govern, readily complied with the queen's proposal; and accordingly, when matters were made up between him and Augustus, and hostages demanded for the securing of the terms of that agreement, he delivered his four sons into the hands of Augustus, who carried them to Rome, where they remained many years. As for Thermusa's son, who was named Prabatices, he was bred up to succeed his father in the kingdom. The Parthians were so superstitiously addicted to the race of Arfaces, that Phraabates well knew they would bear him, so long as they had no other of that family of an age fit to be set up to reign in his room; and this was, according to Strabo and Josephus (6), the reason why Phraabates so readily yielded up his sons to the Romans; but at length his destruction came from what he thus projected for his safety, as we have related in our history of the Parthians (7).

than if he had overcome the Parthians in battle, sent orders to the senate to shut up ^a the temple of Janus, which he had opened on his setting out for the east, and to offer sacrifices, by way of thanksgiving to the gods, for the success which had attended him in this expedition. To perpetuate the memory of an action, which he looked upon as the most glorious of his whole reign, on his return to Rome, he caused a temple to be built in the capitol to Mars the Avenger, upon the plan of that which had long before been built in honour of Jupiter Feretrius. In this new temple were hung up the military ensigns, which the king of Parthia had restored, as monuments of the homage which that proud monarch had paid to Augustus ⁱ. At the same time Augustus settled the affairs of Armenia. Artabazes, king of that country, having been taken prisoner by Antony and carried to Alexandria, as we have related above, Artaxias ^b his son, whom Dion calls Artabazes, succeeded him. But he having made himself obnoxious to his subjects by a most tyrannical and oppressive reign, they complained of him to Augustus, desiring to have Tigranes, his younger brother, who was then at Rome, to reign over them in his stead. Augustus complied with their request, and sent Tiberius, the son of Livia, who had attended him into the east, with an army into Armenia, to drive out Artaxias and place Tigranes on the throne. But Artaxias being killed by his own subjects before the arrival of Tiberius, and Tigranes thereupon admitted, without opposition, to succeed him, the young Roman had no opportunity of signalizing himself by any military exploits. However, he crowned the new king with great pomp and magnificence, placing the diadem upon his tribunal, and obliging Tigranes to receive it of him, as if he had been indebted to him for his kingdom ^k. Velleius Paterculus, the great flatterer of Tiberius, tells us, that, entering Armenia at the head of his legions, he reduced the whole country, and obliged the Armenians to receive Tigranes, whom he calls Artavasdes, for their king. He adds, that the Parthians were so terrified at his approach, and the fame of his name and exploits, that they sent back to Augustus the Roman ensigns and captives ^l. But all other writers ascribe the recovery of the ensigns to Augustus, and agree, that Tiberius performed nothing worth mentioning. This year, Julia, who had had no children by her first husband Marcellus, brought Agrippa a son, who was named Caius, and on whose birth-day a perpetual sacrifice, with other solemnities, was decreed by ^d way of thanksgiving to the gods ^m. Towards the end of the summer, Augustus left Syria, and being attended by Herod, king of Judea, to the sea side, he imbarqued and sailed for Samos, where he passed the ensuing winter. In the mean time, the consular year being expired, Augustus was named consul in the assembly of the people, and C. Sentius Saturninus given him for his colleague. But Augustus declining that office, the factions revived, and the campus Martius was turned into a field of battle, many persons being killed in the fray; insomuch, that Augustus, to put a stop to the disorders that were raised on this occasion by the ambitious competitors, was obliged to name a colleague to Sentius of his own authority. The person he pitched upon was Q. Lucretius Vespillo, who had been formerly proscribed by the triumvirs, but ^e at this time served under Augustus in quality of lieutenant. These two magistrates together with Agrippa maintained peace and tranquillity in the city, by punishing with the utmost severity the ring-leaders of the late tumult ⁿ.

WHILE Augustus resided at Samos, he received a second embassy from the king of India, soliciting an alliance with him. The ambassadors, as we are informed by Nicolas of Damascus, who saw them as they passed through Antioch, delivered to Augustus a letter in the Greek tongue, wherein the king of India told him, that though he reigned over six hundred kings, yet he had so great a value for his friendship, that he sent his embassy on so long a journey on purpose to desire it of him; that he was ready to meet him in what place soever he pleased to appoint; and that upon the first notice he would assist him to the utmost of his power in whatever was right. This letter he subscribed by the name of Porus king of India. The six hundred kings, whom he boasted to reign over, were the rajās, or petty princes, who governed the kingdom under him, several of whose descendants remain to this day, who, paying an annual tribute to the Great Mogol, govern their subjects with an absolute authority. Of the ambassadors, who first set out from India, three only reached the presence of Augustus, the others dying by the way. Of the three surviving one was Zarmar a gymnosophist, who following Augustus to Athens, there burnt himself a in his presence, as Calanus, another of that sect, had formerly done in the presence of Alexander, it being customary for the gymnosophists to put an end to their lives, by throwing themselves on their funeral piles, when they thought they had lived long enough, or apprehended some misfortune^o. Among the presents which they brought were huge vipers, serpents ten cubits long, a river tortoise three cubits long, a partridge bigger than a vultur, and several tygers, the first that had ever been seen either by the Greeks or Romans^p. Augustus early in the spring left Samos, after having declared the inhabitants free, and returned to Rome, where he was received with loud acclamations and all possible marks of honour, his bringing back the military ensigns and prisoners taken in the Parthian wars being what the Romans valued beyond the greatest victories. Augustus himself took so much pride in having thus retrieved the glory of the Roman name among foreign nations, that he caused a great number of medals, many of which have reached us, to be struck with this legend on the reverse, Signis receptis. The poets of his time made, as is well known, his recovering of the ensigns and prisoners, the common topic of their flatteries^q. Three triumphal arches were decreed him by the senate, an altar was erected to Fortune with this inscription, Fortunæ reduci; and it was ordained, that the day of his arrival in the capital should be annually solemnised with sacrifices, sports, shews, &c. and distinguished by the name of Augustalia, or the feast of Augustus. This year died the prince of the Latin poets in the fifty-first year of his age, having bequeathed a considerable part of his great wealth to Augustus and Mecænas, his two chief patrons and benefactors. He had designed to attend Augustus into the east, but was obliged by the bad state of his health to remain at Naples, whence he passed over to Athens to meet Augustus on his return from the island of Samos. The emperor received him with uncommon marks of kindness and esteem; but he, leaving Athens soon after to visit the antiquities of Megara in the hot season of the year, fell sick there, but nevertheless imbarqued for Italy, and reached Brundisium, where he expired soon after his arrival. As he had not yet put the last hand to his Æneid, he ordered by his will that inimitable performance to be burnt; but Augustus saved Troy, we may say with an ancient poet, from a second conflagration, and by that means preserved for all future ages a most perfect pattern of epic poetry. Virgil's body was, according to his own appointment, conveyed to Naples, and there laid in a monument erected for that purpose on the road from Naples to Puteoli. On the monument was engraved a distich wrote by the poet himself, wherein he gave a modest account of his birth, his death, the place of his burial, and his works (D)^r.

Virgil died.

BUT to return to Augustus; as there reigned at this time in Rome a general depravation of manners, and the city was in a manner over-run with all kinds of vices, the senate prevailed upon Augustus to accept the office of censor for five years. At the same time, they conferred upon him the consular power for life, ordaining, that he should always have twelve axes and fasces carried before him, and should sit in a curule chair between the consuls. At the same time, they entreated him to make new laws, offering to bind themselves by oath to the observance of them. But the emperor refused an oath, which he judged useless, intimating, that if his laws were good, they would observe them without that tie; if not, their oath would be ineffectual^s. And now the presence of Agrippa being no longer necessary in Rome, Augustus dispatched him into Gaul to stop the incursions of the Germans, who, having passed the Rhine, committed horrible disorders in the countries subject to Rome. But, at the approach of so renowned a commander, they repassed the river, and sheltered themselves in their woods. Hereupon Agrippa, having settled the affairs of that country, and left a sufficient number of troops to guard the banks of the Rhine, the boundary between Gaul and Germany, passed from thence into Spain, where the Cantabrians, notwithstanding their former losses, had raised new disturbances. Most of their youth had a few years before been taken prisoners, and sold for slaves to the neighbouring nations; but, having found means to break their chains, they had cut the throats of their masters, and returning into their own country, fortified themselves there, and attacked with incredible fury the Roman garrisons. Agrippa marched against them with

with great expedition, but, on his arrival in their country, he met with so vigorous a resistance from that brave and gallant people, that his soldiers began to despair of ever being able to reduce them. As the Cantabrians had waged war with the Romans for two hundred years and upwards^a they were well acquainted with their manner of fighting, no ways inferior to them in point of courage, and now become desperate, as well knowing, that if they were conquered, after having so often attempted to recover their liberty, they must expect the most severe usage and cruel slavery. Animated with this reflection, they fell upon the Romans with a fury hardly to be expressed, put them to flight in several rencounters, and defended themselves; when attacked by the enemy, with such intrepidity and resolution, that Agrippa afterwards owned, that he had never, either by sea or land, been engaged in a more dangerous expedition. That brave commander was obliged to use intreaties, menaces; and to brand some of his legionaries with ignominy, before he could bring them to enter the lists with so resolute and formidable an enemy. But having at length with much ado prevailed upon them to try the chance of an engagement in the open field, he so animated them by his own example, that, after a most obstinate dispute, he gained in the end a complete victory, which indeed cost him dear, but put an end to that destructive war. All the Cantabrians fit to bear arms were cut in pieces, their castles and strong-holds were taken and razed, and their women, children, and old men, none else being left alive, were obliged to abandon the mountainous places and settle in the plain. Thus Agrippa completed the reduction of a brave nation, which had kept the Roman arms employed for the space of two hundred years; that is, ever since the time of Scipio Africanus, the first Roman who made war in Spain. The final reduction of Cantabria and the quieting of all Spain was judged both by the senate and Augustus well worthy of a triumph; but Agrippa modestly declined that honour, ascribing the whole glory of so successful an expedition to Augustus; under whose auspices he had fought. He was well acquainted with the jealous humour of the emperor, no ways renowned for military achievements; and therefore, to avoid giving him the least umbrage, he artfully lessened his own glory for fear of eclipsing his, which, he knew, might be attended with dangerous consequences^b. Agrippa on his return to Rome applied himself wholly to the embellishing of the city with new edifices, and supplying it with great plenty of water, which proved no less ornamental to that great metropolis, than convenient and useful to the vast multitudes of people who flocked thither from all parts of the then known world. The waters, Virgo, Julia, and Tepula, were by him conveyed, at his own expence, into the city, by aqueducts, of a most magnificent structure, and for the most part supported by large and beautiful columns of marble. The aqueducts of the waters, Appia and Marcia, which conveyed into Rome, we may say, whole rivers, were by him repaired at a vast charge. In short, to Agrippa chiefly is Rome indebted for that great plenty of wholesome water, which it enjoys to this day, perhaps above all the cities in the world; and to this Augustus alluded, when he pleasantly answered the people, who complained to him of the scarcity and dearth of wine, that Agrippa had taken care they should not die of thirst^c. Towards the end of this year, Augustus granted a triumph to Lucius Cornelius Balbus for having subdued the Garamantes, a people of Africa, hitherto unknown to the Romans. Balbus made himself master of that country, which lay between Africa properly so called, that is, the ancient dominions of Carthage, Lower Æthiopia, and Getulia, extending by that means the limits of the Roman empire as far as the river Nigris. Such an important conquest Augustus judged well worthy of a triumph, which was accordingly granted to Balbus, though he was not so much as a native of Italy, but born at Gades in Spain, and lately admitted to the rights of a Roman citizen. He had the glory of being the first foreigner who was honoured with this mark of distinction, Augustus wisely overlooking ancient customs, to honour and reward valour without distinction in men of all nations^d. This year Ælius Gallus, præfect of Egypt, made a progress into the upper parts of that country, as far as Syene and the borders of Ethiopia, in which Strabo the geographer attended him, who tells us, that at Thebes he saw the statue of Mæmnon, which, according to the poets^e, saluted the sun at his first rising with an harmonious sound. He adds, that being one morning

THE next year, P. Cornelius Lentulus and Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, either brothers or relations, being consuls, Augustus prorogued his authority for five years more, the first ten years of his sovereign power being near expired. This, he well knew, would stir up the zealous republicans against him; and therefore, dreading the fate of his father Julius, he took care never to appear in public, but armed with a breast-plate under his robe; and, to deprive them of all hopes of ever seeing the ancient form of government restored, he made Agrippa, as it were, his partner in the sovereign power, conferring upon him an authority almost equal to his own, and the high prerogative of the tribune-ship for the space of five years; so that the few republicans, who still remained, being well apprised, that if they should cut off Augustus, Agrippa might easily step into his place and revenge his death, as he was greatly adored both by the people and soldiery, gave over all thoughts of any further attempts for the recovery of their liberty ^z. The first thing Augustus undertook after the prorogation of his power was, to reform the senate, many persons of no birth and of infamous characters, having been admitted into that venerable body, during the confusion of the civil wars. In order to purge the senate of so many unworthy members, he agreed with Agrippa, whom he took for his colleague in the censorship, to reduce the number of the fathers from a thousand to six hundred; but, to avoid the odium of chusing them all himself, he named only thirty, empowering each of them to elect five: of the five each of them named one only was to be chosen, and he by lot; so that thirty only were elected at a time; but as soon as that election was over, five others were named by each of the thirty electors, and one of the five chosen by lot as before. Though each of the thirty electors had bound himself by a solemn oath not to elect any of his own relations, or persons unworthy of that rank, yet in some of their tablets were found the names of men of most infamous characters, while others of known probity were excluded. This unjust partiality induced Augustus and Agrippa to change the method of election, and since they could not depend upon others, to name the rest themselves to the number of six hundred; wherein to do them justice, they proceeded with the utmost impartiality, chusing only men of merit, and by that means restoring the senatorial order to its former splendor. Those who were degraded, to the number of four hundred, were allowed to appear at the public shews with the ancient badges of their dignity, and to stand for the first offices, as if they had been still members of the senatorial order. But, notwithstanding this distinction, many of them were soon after put to death, for having, as it was supposed, conspired against the emperor; though Tacitus tells us ^a, that Augustus laid hold of this opportunity to get rid of such as he suspected of being republicans in their hearts, and secret enemies to absolute power. Some writers think he followed, in putting many of the degraded senators to death, the old maxim, that a prince ought to cut off those whom he has once provoked. Be that as it will, it is certain, that Augustus for some time after betrayed a great fear of being assassinated, admitting no body to his presence, but after a narrow search, whether they had any arms concealed under their garments, and forbidding even the senators to approach his chair more than one at a time. This precaution gave the fathers an opportunity of making a proposal, which was highly agreeable to the timorous emperor. They offered to watch night and day at the door of his room each in his turn, to guard his person. But while they were consulting about their proposal, Antistius Labeo, a learned civilian and a man of great humour, pretending to sleep, snored very loud, and waking as it were all on a sudden, Don't depend upon me, said he, to guard the emperor; for I shall be apt to fall asleep, and prove more troublesome to him than serviceable. The senators could not forbear laughing, and Augustus ashamed of his cowardice, made them drop the proposal, when they were ready to confirm it by a decree ^b.

Augustus, having thus restored the senate to its ancient splendor, applied himself in the next place to the reforming of several abuses in the city. He decreed, that such as should be convicted of having purchased the suffrages of the people with money, should be excluded from all public offices for the space of five years. That the people, who used to sell their votes, might not be sufferers by this law, he caused large sums to be distributed among them, on condition, that they should not require any thing of the

the candidates. To check the debauchery of the Roman youth, which at this time^a was greater than ever had been known, he laid heavy taxes upon such as continued unmarried after a certain age, and encouraged with great rewards the procreation of lawful children. He allowed the patricians and plebeians to intermarry; declaring, that though a patrician should marry a liberta or freed-woman, his children should rank among the patricians. However, he excepted the senators, whom he would not allow to marry under their rank; and because the Hortensian family had been by the civil wars reduced almost to beggary, he presented young Hortensius with a large sum, which put him in a condition of marrying a woman of distinction. The loose behaviour of the married women was what chiefly deterred the young Romans from marriage; but Augustus, who had himself debauched many; not sparing even the wife of his great friend Mecænas, refused to put a stop to that disorder, saying, that he left the care of married women to their husbands. Having reformed many abuses in the state, he applied his thoughts to matters of religion, calling in a great many prophetic books, which were then in vogue, and causing most of them, to the number of two thousand volumes, to be burnt as spurious, reserving only those which were commonly ascribed to some of the Sibyls. These also he subjected to a strict examination, and retained such only as were on this trial judged genuine; the rest he committed to the flames, but those that were judged genuine he caused to be copied by the pontifices themselves, and lodged them in two golden cabinets, which he placed in the temple of Apollo built by him in his palace^c. These Sibylline oracles were of great repute among the Gentiles, and often appealed to by the ancient Christian writers. This year, Julia brought Agrippa a second son, who was named Lucius; and Augustus adopted both him and his brother Caius, declaring them his successors, in order to put a stop to any attempts that might be made by the old republicans, for the recovery of their liberty^d.

THE following year, C. Furnius and C. Julius Silanus being consuls, the secular games, which had not been celebrated for a hundred years before, were exhibited, by Augustus and Agrippa, with extraordinary pomp and magnificence. In these games one of the players giving him the title of Dominus, that is, lord or sovereign, he shewed great marks of dissatisfaction, and the next morning published an edict, forbidding all persons under severe penalties to give him that title for the future. It was on occasion of these games that Horace wrote the Hymn, intitled, Carmen Seculare, which was sung at the sacrifice, that was offered to Pluto and Proserpine before the shews and spectacles of the circus, the theatre, and amphitheatre. Great part of this year was spent in public games and diversions, of which Augustus himself was a great admirer, especially of the tournament, or warlike exercise, called Troy, which he thought becoming the education of the young nobility. He was likewise a great encourager of wrestling, but would not allow women to be present at those games. He enticed to Rome with great rewards the best players and actors from all parts of the world, took them under his protection, and would not allow the prætors and ædiles to cause them, according to ancient custom, to be publicly whipt, when they had not performed to the satisfaction of the audience. But, notwithstanding the encouragement he gave them, he severely examined their morals, not allowing the least licentiousness in their lives or indecency in their actions. Being informed, that one Stephanio a comedian was attended by a woman in the disguise of a boy, he ordered him to be whipt through the three theatres, and banished the city. He likewise drove out of Rome Pylades a famous actor, for having behaved disrespectfully towards a Roman citizen, and because he was continually quarrelling with Bathyllus, an actor no less famous than himself, and greatly favoured by Mecænas. But he soon recalled him to gratify the people, and the comedian on his return, instead of thanking the emperor, told him, that it was his interest the people should be diverted by men of his profession, lest they should watch too narrowly his actions, or seriously reflect on their own condition^e.

THE ensuing year, Augustus, having got L. Domitius Ahenobarbus and P. Cornelius Scipio, two persons wholly addicted to him, raised to the consulate, resolved to leave Rome for a while, and march with an army into Gaul, to quell some disturbances there occasioned by the avarice of Libinius Enceladus, who, being appointed by the emperor to gather the taxes in those parts, had obliged the people to pay them^f.

them monthly, and by a deceitful account reckoned fourteen months in the year. However, the disturbances were not such as required the presence of the emperor. It was therefore commonly believed, that he undertook this expedition with no other view, but to enjoy the company of Terentia, or, as others call her, Terentilla, the wife of his friend Mecenas, without being disturbed in the enjoyment of his scandalous pleasures, either by her husband, or his own wife Livia. He took Terentia with him, and, because Mecenas could not help resenting this base treatment, he appointed Statilius Taurus governor of Rome during his absence, passing over his old friend, who had in more difficult times discharged that office with great applause. As for Agrippa, he dispatched him again into the east, to settle there some differences between the princes and states of Asia. Augustus no sooner passed the Alps, than the Gauls returned to their duty, but the Sicambri, Usipetes, and Tencteri, people of Germany, having passed the Rhine, defeated first a considerable body of Roman horse, and afterwards M. Lollius, proconsul of Gaul, from whom they took a standard. Lollius, though no great commander, found soon after an opportunity of retrieving his honour, by falling upon the Germans unawares, and driving them with great loss beyond the Rhine. Though all was now quiet in Gaul, yet Augustus spent the remaining part of this and all the following year, when M. Lucius Drusus Libo and L. Calpurnius Piso were consuls, in that province, not caring to return to the capital, where he well knew his criminal conversation with his friend's wife would give occasion to endless satires and lampoons, especially, after he had set up for a reformer of manners, and punished with the utmost severity less crimes in others. During his stay in Gaul, the inhabitants flocked to him from all parts of the country with complaints against Encecladus. He was by birth a Gaul, and formerly a slave of Julius Cæsar, by whom he had been taken in the Gaulish wars; but being afterwards manumitted by him, and having found means to insinuate himself into the favour of Augustus, he had been appointed by him receiver-general of all the taxes paid annually by his countrymen. In this employment he oppressed the Gauls in a most barbarous manner; insomuch, that Augustus, ashamed of having employed a man of so infamous a character, was determined to inflict upon him such punishment as should deter others from the like practices. But the crafty Gaul found means to appease the emperor, by delivering up to him the vast sums he had heaped up by rapine and extortion; and assuring him, that in plundering the Gauls he had nothing else in view, but to enrich the public treasury, and put his countrymen out of a condition of being ever able to shake off the Roman yoke. Augustus pleased with this defence, and more with the large sums, which were delivered to him upon the spot, not only absolved the iniquitous extortioner, but approved of his conduct, and, deaf to the complaints of the oppressed Gauls, continued him in his office.

But according to Strabo and Pliny, whose opinion is by all modern geographers preferred to that of Ptolemy, the Rhæti inhabited only the Alps, and the valleys formed by those mountains; their country reaching no farther than the lake of Constance; from that lake to the conflux of the Ænus and the Danube extended Vindelicia, or the country of the Vindelici, and Noricum: from thence to the Cæthian mountains. In the country of the Vindelici were anciently some out distinction of rank or age ; nay, we are told, that when they happened to take women with child, they consulted their augurs whether the child was a male or female ; if they pronounced it a male, the mother was immediately massacred. Against these fierce nations was sent Drusus, the second son of Livia, a youth of extraordinary valour and great accomplishments. The young Roman behaved on this occasion with a prudence far superior to his years ; for he found means to draw the enemy to battle, gained a complete victory over them, and cut great numbers of them in pieces, with the loss of a very small number of his own men. Those who escaped the general slaughter, being joined by the Vindelici, took their rout towards Gaul, with a design to invade that province. But Augustus, upon the first notice of their march, detached Tiberius, who had attended him into Gaul, at the head of several chosen legions, to complete the slaughter, which his brother had begun : and indeed Tiberius was no less successful than Drusus ; for having transported his troops over the lake Brigantium, now the lake of Constance, he fell unexpectedly upon the enemy, gave them a total overthrow, took in that surprise and confusion most of their strong-holds, and obliged the whole nation to submit to what terms he thought proper to impose upon them. Thus were the Vindelici, the Rhæti, and the Norici, three of the most barbarous nations of Germany, by the valour of Drusus and Tiberius, brought under the Roman yoke^f. Tiberius, to keep in awe the country he had subdued, planted two colonies in Vindelicia, and opened a road from thence into Noricum and Rhætia. One of the cities, which he built for the defence of his colonies, he called by the name of his father Drusus Drusomagus, the other by the name of Augustus Augusta-Vindelicorum, which cities are now known by the names of Mimminghen and Augsbourg.

The chief cities of Rhætia, or, as some write it, Rætia, were Tridentum, Curia, Feltria, and Bellunum, now Trent, Cibur, or Coira, Feltri, Bellano. Some writers place Verona in Rhætia ; but Strabo reckons Verona among the cities of Italy. Horace mentions the victories gained by Tiberius and his brother Drusus over the Vindelici and Rhæti.

The Genauni and Bræuni were inhabitants of Rhætia, as is plain from Strabo (11). For the better understanding of the ancients, it is necessary to observe here, that though Rhætia and Vindelicia were two distinct countries, yet they formed but one Roman province, called Rhætia ; and hence the ancients, when they mention Rhætia, or the Rhætian province, are to be understood as speaking of Rhætia, properly so called, and Vindelicia ; that is, of the countries lying between the lake of Constance, the Danube, the Ænus, and the territories of the Carni, of the Veneti, and of the Insubres. And hence it is, that Tacitus, in speaking of Augusta Vindelicorum, calls it, the fairest colony of the Rhætian province (12) ; and Horace calls the Vindelici, Rhæti Vindelici, to distinguish them from the inhabitants of Rhætia, properly so called (13). In the time of the emperor Adrian, or rather of Dioclesian, the Rhætian province was divided into two, whereof the first was called Rhætia Prima, and comprehended Rhætia Proper, and the second, comprehending Vindelicia, Rhætia Secunda : the metropolis of the former was Curia, of the latter Augusta Vindelicorum (14).

Noricum, formerly a kingdom (15), and afterwards a Roman province, extended between the Danube and the Alpes Noricæ in the neighbourhood of Trent, from the Ænus, which parted it from Vindelicia, to the Cetian mountains its boundaries on the side of Pannonia ; so that ancient Noricum comprehended great part of Austria, the archbishoprick of Salzburg, and all Stiria and Carinthia. It was afterwards, probably in the time of Dioclesian (16), divided into two provinces, viz. Noricum Ripense, so called, because it extended along the Danube, lying on the south side of that river, which divided it from Germany properly so called ; and Noricum Mediterraneum, comprising that part which lay at some distance from the Danube. In the province of Noricum Ripense were the following cities of note, Jovavum or Jovavia, Boiodurum, Lentin, Ovilis, or Ovilabis, and Lauriacum or Laureacum, now Salzburg, Innsbruck, Lintz, Wels, and Lorch ; in Noricum Mediterraneum, Pons Æni, Viscelli or Viscellæ, Graviacis, Aguntum, Turnia and Solva, now Innsbruck, Wels, Garch, Innsbrunnen, and Villach : Lauriacum was the metropolis of the former province, and Solva long since buried in its ruins of the latter (17).

WHILE Augustus and his two sons-in-law were thus employed in Gaul and Germany, Agrippa was settling with equal success the affairs of the eastern provinces. On Agrippa's ^{ex-} his first arrival in the province of Asia properly so called, Herod king of Judea hastened ^{plots in the} thither to wait upon him, and having prevailed with him to take a tour into Judea, ^{east.} he entertained him and all his attendants in a most elegant and sumptuous manner. After having shewn him all his new-built cities and castles, viz. Sebaste, Cæsarea, Alexandrium, Herodium, and Hyrkania, he carried him in the last place to Jerusalem. As he drew near that city, he was met by all the people in their best apparel, and attended into the metropolis of Judea, by a solemn procession and with loud acclamations. After he had staid there some days to view the curiosities of that great city, he offered an hecatomb at the temple, feasted all the people, and then hastening to the port, where his fleet waited for him, he sailed back into Ionía before winter, highly pleased at the reception he had met with from the Jewish king ^e. Early in the spring, he was obliged to quit Ionía, and advance towards the Cimmerian Bosphorus ^h to quell some disturbances there. For Asander, king of that country, dying without issue, had left his kingdom to Dynamis his wife, in whose right he had held it, she being the daughter of Pharnaces the son of Mithridates. One Scribonius, a native of Asia, pretending to be the grandson of Mithridates, and to have a grant from Augustus to succeed Asander, married Dynamis and seized the crown. But Agrippa, knowing him to be an impostor, sent Polemon, whom the Romans had made king of Pontus and the Lesser Armenia, to drive him from the throne. Before the arrival of Polemon, the Bosphorans themselves, being well satisfied that Scribonius was no-ways related to their royal family, but an impostor in all his pretensions, had put him to death. However, they would not submit to Polemon, but, though overcome by him in a pitched battle on his first coming into their country, still held out, and were likely in the end to get the better of him. Hereupon Agrippa marched with all his forces to the assistance of Polemon, which Herod no sooner heard, than he hastened after him with a considerable fleet, and a good number of his best troops on board; and having sailed first to Mitylene, and thence to Byzantium, overtook him at length at Sinope in Pontus. Nothing could be more acceptable to the Roman general than such a supply; for he stood in great need both of sea and land-forces, the Bosphorans having armed a great many vessels, and beset with their land-forces, which were both brave and numerous, all the defiles and narrow passes, through which the Romans were to pass. However, with the assistance of Herod, he opened himself a way into the heart of the enemy's country, and having brought the Bosphorans under subjection, he obliged Dynamis to marry Polemon, conferring on him the kingdom of Bosphorus, which by the favour of Augustus, who confirmed that grant, he held with that of Pontus and Armenia Minor. However, he had not the whole kingdom of Pontus, but only that part of it which lay next to Cappadocia, and was afterwards, by way of distinction called Pontus Polemoniacus. Agrippa, having thus settled matters in Bosphorus, returned through Paphlagonia, Cappadocia, and Phrygia, to Ephesus in Ionía, being attended thither by Herod, who obtained many favours of him in behalf of the nations, through which he passed; and, on his coming into Ionía, not only got the many grievances redressed, of which the Jews, who were spread all over Asia and the adjacent islands, with great reason complained; but all their immunities and privileges restored, in as ample a manner as they had ever enjoyed them, either under the kings of Syria or the Romans ¹. Julia, Agrippa's wife, ^{Julia in great} attending him in this expedition, suffered great hardships, and narrowly escaped being ^{danger.} drowned in the Scamander, as she passed that river in the night-time, while it was swelled with sudden rains. The inhabitants of Ilium, whose territory was watered by the Scamander, were altogether ignorant of her coming; but nevertheless Agrippa was, contrary to all justice, so provoked against them for not having assisted her, that he laid a fine upon them of a hundred thousand drachmas. Hereupon the Ilienses, not daring to appear before Agrippa, prevailed upon Nicholas of Damascus, who happened to be at that time in their city, to engage Herod to speak to Agrippa in their behalf. The king of Judea readily espoused their cause, and by his interest with Agrippa prevailed upon him to remit the fine, for which signal favour great honours were decreed him by the Ilienses ^k. After this Agrippa passed from Ephesus to

to Samos, and Herod, taking his leave of him, returned into Judea, where he received the thanks of the whole nation, for what he had done in behalf of the Jews in *Asia Minor*¹. Augustus, who was still in Gaul, being informed of the success which had attended Agrippa in the Cimmerian Bosphorus, ordered supplications to be made in the capital, and passed a decree, empowering Agrippa on his return to enter Rome in triumph^m. This year Lepidus the triumvir dying, Augustus took upon him the office of pontifex maximus, or high-priest, vacant by his deathⁿ. This dignity he held to the hour of his death, as did all his successors, as well Christians as Heathens, till the time of the emperor Gratian, who, succeeding his father Valentinian in the year of the Christian æra 305, and thinking it inconsistent with the Christian religion, of which he was a zealous professor, to bear even the name of high-priest in the rites of the Gentiles, refused that title, as did afterwards all those who succeeded him in the Roman empire^o. This year died likewise Vedius Pollio, famous in history for the cruelty with which he treated his slaves, throwing them often for the smallest faults into his fish-ponds to fatten his murenas. As he had been raised by Augustus from the mean condition of a libertinus, or the son of a freed-man, to the rank of a Roman knight, he appointed him his chief heir, bequeathing to him his fine country seat, called Pausilypus, in the neighbourhood of Puteoli, and his house in town, which was one of the most stately and magnificent buildings in Rome. Augustus, however, caused it to be pulled down, and a sumptuous portico to be built in its room for the use of the public, which from his wife's name he called Porticus Livia^p.

THE following year, Cn. Cornelius Lentulus and M. Licinius Crassus being consuls, the Ligures Comati, who inhabited the maritime Alps, were subdued, and their country reduced to a Roman province. And now Augustus, having settled the affairs of Gaul, stopped the incursions of the Germans, and brought under subjection most of the nations inhabiting the Alps, left Drusus with an army upon the Rhine, and returned to the capital, either in the end of this, or the beginning of the following year, when Tiberius Claudius Nero, his son-in-law, and P. Quintilius Varo were consuls. As he had been near three years absent, he was received by the people with universal joy and satisfaction. But he could not be prevailed upon to accept any of the honours, which the fathers, some out of fear, others out of flattery, decreed him. Nay, he would not even allow the people to come out and meet him, but, according to his custom, entered the city by night. The next morning the whole city went to wait upon him at his palace, for his house was so called, because it was situated on the Palatium or Palatine hill. Augustus received them with great politeness and condescension, and afterwards, being attended by most of the senators and knights and numberless crouds of people, he went up to the capitol, and, prostrating himself before the statue of Jupiter Capitolinus, took the laurel from about his fasces, and laid it at his feet. A few days after he assembled the senate, but, not being able to speak himself by reason of a violent cold he had got on his journey home, he gave the quæstor a paper to read, containing an account of what he had done ever since he left the capital. As he was not interrupted this year by any disturbances either at home or abroad, he enacted many excellent laws, which were long observed by his successors. Among the rest he published one, by which it was enacted, to the great satisfaction of the inhabitants of Italy, that for the future the services of the veterans should not be rewarded with lands, but money. What evils attended the bestowing of lands upon them, is plain from Virgil's eclogues. By the same law the time was fixed, which each corps was to serve, the pay which they were to receive during their service, and the sum they were to expect, if they continued to serve after the time prescribed by law was expired. The emperor's own guards known by the name of the prætorian cohorts or bands, were, by this law, to serve twelve years before they could demand their dismissal, and the rest sixteen; the former were allowed about twelve pence of our money a-day, and the latter five pence; if they were refused their dismissal, when the time of their service was expired, or chose to continue in the army, they were accounted veterans, and as such exempted from all drudgeries, and obliged solely to fight, and that for the space of five years only; after which term they were absolutely to obtain their discharge, if they chose to quit the service, and the rewards due to veterans, which were, according to Augustus's appointment, five thousand drachmas for the prætorian cohorts, and three thousand for the common legionaries.

legionaries. Some years after, Augustus extended the time of service to sixteen years for the former, and to twenty for the latter^p. To give new lustre to the nobility, and attach them more firmly to his interest, he required but one year's service of the young patricians to qualify them for military employments, which they could not bear in the times of the republic, till they had served several years. To this distinction he added another in favour of the sons of senators, whom he allowed to have a place in the senate, and to wear the laticlavium, which was peculiar to the first magistrates, senators, and chief officers of the army; at the age of seventeen, whereas they could not enjoy this honour in former times, till they had attained to the twenty-sixth year of their age.

THIS year Augustus, in quality of pontifex maximus, corrected a gross mistake in the Roman calendar. For the pontifices having for the space of thirty-six years, that is, ever since the reformation of the calendar by Julius Cæsar, made every third year a leap year instead of every fourth, twelve days had been inserted instead of nine, so that the Roman year consisted of three days more than it ought. Augustus, for the rectifying of this mistake, ordered first, that for the twelve ensuing years there should be no leap year; and secondly, that, after the expiration of the said twelve years, the leap years should thenceforth be made every fourth year^q; by which means the three super-added days being thrown out, and the leap years fixed to their true terms, according to Julius Cæsar's institution, the form of this year has ever since been regularly observed, and is still, under the name of the old style, in use among us. When Augustus made this reformation, a decree was passed by the senate and people, enacting, that the month Sextilis should thenceforth from the emperor's name be called Augustus, which name it retains to this day, in all the calendars that have been formed from the Roman. Suetonius tells us, that Augustus himself, in settling the year, gave his name to the month Sextilis, preferring it to September, in which he was born, because in the former he had been first raised to the consulate, and obtained many signal victories^r. But the very words of the decree of the senate are related by Macrobius^s, who also mentions the decree of the people, and tells us, that the law was proposed by the tribune Pacuvius. Towards the end of this year, Agrippa, having settled the affairs of the eastern provinces, and left Sentius Saturninus and Titus Volumnius governors of Syria and Phœnicia, returned to Rome with Antipater, Herod's eldest son by Doris his first wife. Augustus received him with all the marks of a sincere affection and friendship, and was for having him enter the city in triumph; but he declined that honour, ascribing, according to his custom, all the glory of his conquests to the emperor, under whose auspices he had fought: and this was the chief cause, why the custom of triumphing, in former times of great advantage to the Romans, was laid aside, other generals following the example of Agrippa, and not caring for an honour, which he seemed to despise^t. However, Augustus confirmed to him the tribunitial power for five years more, the former term being near expired; and then sent him at the head of a powerful army into Pannonia (F), where a new war began to break out, with greater power and authority than had ever been granted to any commander. Agrippa left Rome in the beginning of the consulate of M. Valerius

(F) Pannonia was bounded on the east by Upper Mæsa, on the west by Noricum, on the south by Dalmatia, and on the north by the Danube (17); so that Pannonia comprehended Carniola, Croatia, Windisch March, part of Austria, part of Hungary, all Sclavonia and Bosnia, and part of Serbia. It was anciently divided into Upper Pannonia, the former comprehending Carniola, Croatia, Windisch March, and part of Austria; the latter Bosnia, Sclavonia, and that part of Hungary which lies between the Danube, the Drave, and the Arabo, now the Raab; so that scarce the third part of the present kingdom of Hungary was within the limits of ancient Pannonia, that tract which lies beyond the Danube, between that river and the Tibiscus, not belonging to Pannonia, but to the Iazyges Metanastæ. The chief cities of ancient Pannonia were Segeste or Siscia at the confluence of the Calpe and the Save; Amona, a Roman colony, Nauportum, upon a river of the same name, now known by the name of Laubach; Vindoniana, or Vindobona, Scarabantia, Sirmium on the Save, and Taurunum, now Siseck, Unterlaubach, Oberlaubach, Vienna, Scarbing, Simach, and Belgrade. Sirmium was the metropolis of all Pannonia. Some geographers place Stridon, the native city of St. Jerom, in Pannonia, others in Dalmatia; but St. Jerom himself calls it the boundary of Dalmatia and Pannonia (18).

lerius Messala Barbatulus and P. Sulpicius Quirinus, or, as others call him, Cirinus. The former, who was father to the famous Messalina, dying some months after his election, was succeeded by Caius Valgius, a man of great learning^a, who before the end of the year resigned the fasces to Caius Caninius Rebilus. The Pannonians were so frightened at the very name of Agrippa, that, upon his approach, they sent deputies to him, offering to submit upon what terms he should think fit to impose upon them. Hereupon Agrippa, having obliged them to deliver up their arms and give him hostages for their peaceable behaviour, returned to Italy, but was taken with a violent illness as he marched through Campania, which in a few days brought him to his grave. Augustus, upon the first news of his danger, left the sports, which his two grandsons, Caius and Lucius, were then exhibiting in honour of Minerva, and hastened into Campania, to see and relieve, if he could by any means, his dying friend. But Agrippa expired a few minutes before his arrival, which he no sooner understood, than he burst into tears, bewailing in the illustrious deceased the loss of the greatest general of his age, the wisest minister, and the most faithful, constant, and disinterested friend he had in the world. He caused his body to be conveyed to Rome, and took upon himself to make his funeral oration, a curtain being drawn between him and the bier, perhaps because it was not lawful for him as pontifex maximus to look upon a dead body. His obsequies were performed with extraordinary pomp and magnificence, and his remains deposited not in the campus Martius, where the senate had allowed him a monument, but in Augustus's own mausolæum near Marcellus, the emperor declaring, that he would not be separated even after his death from two persons, whom he so tenderly loved in his life^b. He died in the fifty-first year of his age, and left behind him by his first wife Cecilia Attica, the daughter of the famous Pomponius Atticus, one daughter named Agrippina, who was married to Tiberius; and by his third wife Julia, three sons, viz. Caius, Lucius, and Agrippa Posthumus, so called because he was born after his father's death; and two daughters, Julia married to Lucius Paulus, and Agrippina married to Germanicus, by whom she had the emperor Claudius and Agrippina the mother of Nero; Agrippa had no children by his second wife Marcella, whom he divorced to marry Julia. He bequeathed his fine gardens and a bath, which was called by his name, to the Roman people, and to Augustus among other things the Taurica Chersonesus; but how he acquired the dominion and property of that country is what we find no-where recorded, Dion owning himself quite in the dark as to this point.

Thus long did Augustus reign, in some measure with a partner, though not a rival, in the empire. Upon his death the emperor, judging it necessary that he should have one to assist him in the government, superior to all others in power and authority, the better to prevent plots and conspiracies, made choice of Tiberius, though much against his will, as Dion informs us, his grandsons, Lucius and Caius Cæsars, being yet too young to bear any public offices^c. He obliged Tiberius, before he invested him with the power, which Agrippa had enjoyed, to divorce his wife Agrippina, who had already brought him a son, and was then big with child, and to marry Julia, whose leud and scandalous behaviour was well known to Tiberius, and to all the young debauchees of Rome, and had given great uneasiness to Agrippa some time before his death. However, Tiberius complied without betraying the least reluctance, through fear of disgusting Augustus, who was the only person in Rome unacquainted with his daughter's infamous conduct. The usual ceremonies were no sooner over, than Augustus dispatched his new son-in-law against the Pannonians, who upon the news of Agrippa's death had attempted to shake off the yoke, and recover their ancient liberty. But Tiberius, with the assistance of their neighbours the Scordisci, who had remained faithful to the Romans, obliged them in a short time to return to their duty, and submit to the will of the conqueror. They delivered up their arms, gave hostages, and put the Romans in possession of all their towns and strong-holds. Tiberius spared their lives, but laid waste their fields, plundered their cities, and, having sent the best part of their youth into other countries, returned to Rome the same year, Q. Aelius Tubero and Paulus Fabius Maximus being consuls. The senate, as we may well imagine, decreed him great honours, and among the rest a triumph. But Augustus obliged him, sore against his will, to reject the offers of the conscript fathers, and content himself with the marks of distinction, which were granted for

for life to those who had triumphed, viz. to have a particular place apart from the rest at the publick shews, and to appear with the triumphal robes and a crown of laurel. On the other hand, his younger brother Drusus signalized himself no less among the Gauls and Germans. Having been left in Gaul by Augustus to stop the incursions of the Germans, he had begun there a second census, taking a minute account of each person's estate and fortune, the better to regulate the annual taxes and contributions. This the Gauls looked upon as a new attempt upon their liberties, and seemed disposed to take up arms, and attempt the recovery of their antient rights and privileges. But Drusus, being apprised of their design, summoned all the Gaulish chiefs to assist at the solemn ceremony of consecrating a temple, which the Lugdunenses had built in honour of Julius Caesar. When they were all assembled, Drusus by his address and engaging behaviour won their affections to such a degree, that they not only dropt the design they had formed of shaking off the Roman yoke, but agreed to erect an altar in honour of Augustus, and to pay him even in his lifetime divine honours. Sixty different nations concurred in this design, each of them contributing their quota, and sending a statue to adorn the new altar, which was consecrated with great solemnity on the first day of August, and became soon very famous all over Gaul, as is plain from the writings of almost all the antients^y. Games were instituted in honour of the new deity, much of the same nature with the Ne- mean and Isthmian games.

AND now Drusus, having nothing to fear from the Gauls, turned his arms against the Germans, who, having raised the most numerous and formidable army that had ever been seen in those parts, were advancing towards the Rhine, in order to invade Gaul. But the young Roman not only defeated them as they attempted to cross that river, but, pursuing the advantage he had gained, entered the country of the Usipetes or Usipii, now known by the name of Relinckhusen, and from thence advanced against the Sicambri in the neighbourhood of the Lyppe and Iffel; these he overthrew in a great battle, laid waste their country, burnt most of their cities, and, following the course of the Rhine, approached the German ocean, and reduced the Frisii and the Chauci between the Amisus and the Albis, now the Ems and the Elbe. In these marches his troops suffered extremely for want of provisions, and he himself was often in great danger of being drowned, as the Romans, who attended him, were quite unacquainted at that time with the flux and reflux of the ocean. As winter drew near, he led his troops into east Friesland, and, leaving them there under the command of his lieutenants, returned to Rome, where he was honoured with the prætorship, Q. Fabius Maximus and Julius Antonius, the son of the triumvir, being then consuls. Early in the spring, Drusus left the capital, and returning to his army quartered in Frista or Friesland, marched from thence into the country of the Tencteri, whom he easily subdued; and afterwards passing the Lupias, now the Lyppe, in Westphalia, brought into subjection the Catti and the Cherusci, extending his conquests to the banks of the Visurgis, now the Weser, which he would have passed, had he not been obliged to return for want of provisions, the enemy having laid waste the neighbouring country to a great distance. As he was retiring, the Germans unexpectedly fell upon him in a narrow passage, and having surrounded the Roman army, cut a great many of them in pieces. But the brave Drusus, animating his men more by his example than by speeches, after a warm conflict, which lasted almost the whole day, in the end put the enemy to flight, and made such havock of them, that the ground was strewn for some miles with dead bodies. Drusus found in their camp a huge quantity of iron chains, which they had prepared for the Romans; and so great was their confidence, that they had agreed before-hand about the division of the booty; the Tencteri were to have the horse, the Cherusci and Sicambri the baggage, and the Usipetes and Catti the captives. Drusus was saluted imperator by his troops on the field of battle, where they erected a trophy as a monument of so signal a victory; after which Drusus, to secure the countries he had conquered, built two forts, the one at the confluence of the Lupias and the Aliso, the Lyppe and the Alme, the other in the country of the Catti or Chatti on the Rhine, and made that famous canal, long known by the name of Fossa Drusiana, of which we shall have occasion to speak hereafter. For these exploits Drusus on his return to Rome was honoured with the triumphal ornaments, as his brother Tiberius had been the preceding year, but was not allowed by Augustus to triumph, or even to retain the title

title of imperator, with which he had been honoured by the army, that title being now peculiar to the sovereign. Drusus, as well as Tiberius, had fought under the auspices of Augustus, who, therefore ascribing to himself the glory they had acquired, allowed them such marks of distinction as were usually conferred on triumphant victors, but not the triumph itself². This same year, Tiberius being sent against the Pannonians, who had again rebelled, reduced them anew, and likewise the Dalmatians, who had joined them in their revolt. One Vologeses, a priest of Bacchus, by birth a Thracian, raised far greater disturbances in that part of Thrace, which was subject to Rascuporis, the son of Cotys, a faithful ally of the Romans. Vologeses stirring up the people against that prince, whom he styled a slave of Rome, committed most dreadful ravages in all parts of his dominions, overthrew and killed the young prince himself in a pitched battle, put to flight Rbemetalces his guardian, and, having overrun the whole country, advanced, without opposition, into the Thracian Chersonesus, with a design to pass from thence into Macedon. But, in the mean time, Lucius Calpurnius Piso, one of the best generals of his age, being ordered by Augustus to quit Pamphylia, which he governed in quality of proconsul, and to stop the progress of the barbarians under the conduct of Vologeses, arrived in Thrace, and coming up with the enemy near the confines of Macedon, attacked them, but had the misfortune to be defeated, his men not being accustomed to the enemy's manner of fighting. However, as he was a man of great experience in military affairs, he made his retreat in good order, and falling the next day unexpectedly on the barbarians, gave them a total overthrow, pursued them into Thrace, and made himself master of the fruitful plains lying between mount Pangæus and mount Hæmus. Augustus was so pleased with this conquest, that he decreed to Piso, not indeed a triumph, but all the honours and privileges which were formerly granted to those who had triumphed, ordaining besides supplications by way of thanksgiving to the gods, for the success which had attended his arms³. The joy and satisfaction which Augustus received from these successes was greatly allayed by the death of his sister Octavia, who was a true heroine, and a perfect pattern of all the virtues peculiar to her sex, and therefore greatly lamented by persons of all ranks and conditions. Augustus caused her body to be exposed on a bed of state in a temple lately erected in honour of Julius Cæsar, and pronounced himself her funeral oration, but would not admit of the many honours which were decreed her by the senate. Her body was carried to the grave by her four sons-in-law, the husbands of the two Marcellæ, whom she had by her first husband Marcellus, and of the two Antoniæ, her daughters by Antony the triumvir. She died in the fifty-fourth year of her age⁴.

THE following year, Nero Claudius Drusus and T. Quinctius Crispinus being consuls, Augustus, bent upon the total reduction of Germany, left the capital, attended by his two sons-in-law, Tiberius Claudius Nero and Nero Claudius Drusus, and, passing the Alps, advanced to the banks of the Rhine, whence he sent Tiberius against the Daci, and Drusus to complete the conquest of the rest of Germany. Tiberius easily subdued the Daci, obliged them to give him hostages, and transplanted forty thousand of them into Gaul. On the other hand, Drusus having passed the Rhine, and afterwards, in spite of all opposition, the Weser, brought under subjection all the nations from the Rhine to the Elbe, or, as the Romans called it, the Albis. Having attempted in vain to pass this river, he erected several trophies in that neighbourhood, and began his march back to the Rhine. Dion tells us, that as he was deliberating with himself whether he should penetrate still farther into these northern countries, or make the Albis the boundary of the Roman empire, a woman of a stature more than human appeared to him, and calling him by his name, asked him, Whither his ambition would carry him? The fates, said she, will not allow you to see all parts: retire therefore, and know, that the period both of your life and actions approaches. With this and such like prodigies, Dion pretends, that the death of Drusus, which happened soon after, was foretold. For before he reached the Rhine, he was seized with a violent fever, which carried him off in a few days. Augustus, upon the first notice of his illness, sent an express to Tiberius, acquainting him with the danger his brother was in, who thereupon made what haste he could to see him before he died, travelling two hundred miles in twenty-four hours. Upon his arrival he found him still alive, but just expiring. His sudden death occasioned a report, which was credited by many, viz. that that Augustus and Tiberius had conspired to take him off by poison, and effected their wicked design by means of their emissaries. It is at least certain, that Drusus was in his heart a zealous republican, and had on several occasions betrayed a great desire of seeing the antient form of government restored. Though he was generally thought to be the son, not of Claudius Nero, but of Augustus, yet he looked upon him as an usurper, and wrote the following letter to his brother Tiberius, while they were both waging war in Germany at the head of two powerful armies: The gods have put it into our power to render Rome happy or miserable: Augustus has trusted us with the forces of the empire: can we employ them better than in re-establishing the republic, and restoring Rome to her antient liberty and splendor: how glorious a thing it is to be the deliverer and avenger of one's country! This letter Tiberius sent to Augustus, and soon after happened the death of Drusus in the manner we have related^c. However, most of the antients clear Augustus from all suspicion of being any ways accessary to the death of the young hero. Livy, who here ends his history, says, that he died of a fall from his horse: perhaps that fall occasioned the fever of which he died. Suetonius thinks the report, which was spread upon his death to the prejudice of Augustus, to have been intirely groundless, since the emperor loved him with great tenderness, and had even named him in his will for his successor in conjunction with his two grandsons, Lucius and Caius^d. Tacitus, whom we cannot suspect of partiality towards Augustus, or indeed towards any of his successors, tells us, that Augustus never extended his cruelty to any of his own family^e. Drusus was a man of an unblemished character, of a probity which was proof against all temptations, of great honour, open-hearted, and an enemy to all manner of deceit and dissimulation. He was no ways inferior either in courage or conduct to the most experienced commanders of his age, and had nothing in view in all his expeditions, but the glory of the Roman name and the public welfare. It is agreed on all hands, that he would have re-established the republic, and resigned with joy the sovereign power, had it ever devolved to him. He died in the thirtieth year of his age, and left behind him three children by his wife Antonia Minor, the younger daughter of Antony and Octavia, viz. Drusus, surnamed Germanicus, Livilla, and Claudius, who succeeded Caligula in the empire. His soldiers, to testify their grief for the loss of a general, whom they so tenderly loved, erected to his memory a stately monument on the banks of the Rhine, and assembling yearly on the anniversary of his death, that is, on the eleventh of July, performed round it their military evolutions in honour of the illustrious deceased^f. As for his body, it was conveyed to Rome, and attended the whole way by Tiberius, the chief officers and magistrates of the Roman colonies and municipia, through which it passed, meeting it on the road, and attending it with the utmost pomp from one city to the other. Augustus himself received it at Rome, being returned from Gaul for that purpose, and pronounced in the Circus Flaminius a funeral oration in honour of the deceased, in which he begged of the gods, with great earnestness and many tears, that they would grant him a death as glorious as that of the young hero, and make the grand-children they had given him tread in his foot-steps. Tiberius made another funeral oration in the forum, where the body was exposed, and from thence carried on the shoulders of the Roman knights to the field of Mars, where it was burnt with great solemnity; as for the ashes they were deposited in the mausoleum of Augustus. The senate did not neglect, as we may well imagine, so favourable an opportunity of making their court to the emperor. A triumphal arch was erected to his memory, and statues in most public places of the city: the surname of Germanicus was conferred upon him by a decree of the senate, and confirmed to his posterity; many trophies were erected, and medals struck with the inscription de Germanis, to perpetuate the memory of his victories over the Germans, &c. Extraordinary honours were decreed to his mother Livia and his widow Antonia, who had inherited both her mother Octavia's beauty and virtue; she continued inconsolable to the hour of her death, nor would she ever be prevailed upon to marry again, though often and earnestly pressed to it by Augustus^g.

New regulations of Augustus.

THE emperor was in haste to return to Gaul, but nevertheless before his departure he made several new regulations. The conscript fathers, finding their authority to be of no weight, assembled very seldom, and in small numbers. Augustus therefore appointed certain days in each month, on which they should be obliged to meet; and

and at the same time enacted, with the approbation of the senators themselves, that such as absented themselves on those days, without a lawful cause, should pay a certain sum by way of mulct; and that their determinations, when they were but few, should not obtain the force of a senatusconsultum, or decree of the senate, but only be called a regulation of the senate. He granted the prætors the prerogative of voting in the senate, and extended the jurisdiction of the quæstors, giving them the superintendency of all the maritime cities of Italy. The election of the new consuls, C. Marcius Censorinus and C. Asinius Gallus, gave rise to a new regulation. They were both accused of having purchased their dignity with money distributed among the tribes. Augustus did not oblige them to resign the fasces, but ordered, that for the future all the candidates should deposit a certain sum with him, which they should forfeit, if convicted of bribery or any unlawful practices. This law was generally approved of, at least by the patricians; but another, which he published soon after, was as much disliked. The depositions of slaves had never been admitted at Rome in the courts of judicature. But Augustus, for the safety of his own person, though under pretence of the public safety, published a law, enacting, that when any person was accused of treasonable designs, the evidence of slaves should be of the same weight as that of freedmen; that this law might not seem to clash with the ancient custom of rejecting the evidence of a slave against his master, it was ordained by the same law, that the slaves of the accused person should be first sold to the emperor or the public. By this low evasion, unworthy of a man of sense, he pretended not to have intrenched on the ancient custom, since it was still true, that slaves were not allowed to accuse their masters, nor admitted as evidence against them. This innovation occasioned great complaints; but the crafty emperor soon quieted the minds of the people by public shews and sports, by a pretended clemency and condescension, and above all by affecting popularity, and carefully avoiding all needless ceremonies and marks of grandeur. The antients relate many instances of his extraordinary condescension: they tell us, that a common legionary, having desired him to plead his cause in one of the courts of judicature, the emperor told him, that he was so overwhelmed with business that he could not well do it himself; but that he would send him an orator better qualified for that purpose than himself. This obliging answer did not satisfy the soldier, who answered bluntly, Have I thus fought for you by proxy? The emperor, highly pleased with this unexpected answer, Neither will I, said he, plead for you by proxy. He was as good as his word; for on the day appointed he appeared at the bar, and pleaded his cause in person. In like manner he undertook the cause of another citizen, and gained it; which so provoked the accuser, that he behaved very disrespectfully towards the emperor, who was so far from resenting it, that he afterwards pardoned him, when he was accused before him as censor of some faults which deserved severe punishment. Though he was very kind and generous to his friends, yet he never allowed them greater privileges than others, nor would he by any means exempt them from the judiciary laws. Of all the criminals he rescued but one, during the whole time of his long reign, who had been very serviceable to him, and that by prevailing with intreaties on the accuser to drop the prosecution ^b.

Germany.

THIS year, the second term of Augustus's ten years drawing to an end, he pretended to be willing to lay down the power with which he had been trusted, saying, that he was no longer able to bear so heavy a burden; but he was easily persuaded to carry it ten years longer. This limitation contributed, in the opinion of the antients, more than any thing else, to his safety, since by receiving his power from the senate and people, he openly acknowledged the sovereignty to be lodged in them; so that they were not quite destitute of all hopes of recovering it one day. The term of his power being prolonged, he resolved to quit the capital, having his mind still bent on the intire reduction of the many nations that inhabited Germany. He was not indeed inclined to wage war with those barbarous nations in person, but chose to be as near the generals, whom he employed, as he could with safety. The person he thought the most proper for the pursuing and completing of the conquests, happily began by Drusus, was his brother Tiberius; whom therefore he sent into Gaul, after having honoured him with an ovation, on account of the advantages he had gained in Germany the foregoing year. Augustus soon after the departure of Tiberius left Rome, but, instead of passing the Alps, as he had done the year before, he took his

his rout towards Aquileia, and passed the whole summer in the neighbourhood of that city, having with him his grandson Caius Caesar, then twelve years old. In the mean time, Tiberius, having passed the Rhine at the head of a powerful army, over-ran all the countries between that river and the Elbe, and struck such dread into the inhabitants of those northern provinces, that several of them sent deputies to Augustus at Aquileia to sue for peace, which they could not obtain upon any terms, the emperor declaring, that he would not grant a peace to any particular nation, till they had all agreed to demand it. But the Catti, or, as some authors write, the Sicambri, could not by any means be prevailed upon to submit; so that the project of peace did not take place this year. We shall see in the sequel of this history what streams of blood it cost the Romans to reduce them. As winter approached, Augustus returned to Rome with his grandson Caius; but Tiberius remained with his troops in Germany, in order to renew the war, as soon as the season would allow him to take the field¹. Augustus upon his return made a second census, in which were numbered, according to the Ancyran marbles, 4233000 Roman citizens^k. While he was thus employed, his great friend Mecænas died, which was a sensible affliction to him, though he had not of late honoured him with the same intimacy as formerly. His criminal conversation with Terentilla could not but displease Mecænas, who thought he did not deserve that treatment at the hands of one, whom he had served with the utmost fidelity. On the other hand, Augustus in that particular could not bear any controul; and hence that coldness and indifference which appeared between these two great friends, some years before death parted them. Mecænas was a man of great penetration, and understood the art of governing well better than any man of his age, as appears from the many wise directions and maxims, which he suggested to Augustus in the beginning of his reign. But though possessed of talents equal to the highest employments of the state, yet he was such an enemy to all trouble, so fond of his ease, so addicted to his pleasures, that he abhorred all business, and seemed in a manner to have attained to that indolence, in which the Epicureans placed happiness. As he was remarkably good-natured, and slighted preferments himself, as capable of disturbing his quiet and interrupting his pleasures, he employed all his credit and interest with the emperor in behalf of others, and for the most part with good success. Of the ascendant which he had gained over Augustus, and the liberty he took in correcting his faults and curbing his cruel temper, Dion Cassius gives us the following remarkable instance. As Augustus was one day judging some criminals, Mecænas perceiving him to be in a bad humour, and inclined to give himself over to revenge without check or compassion, attempted to approach his tribunal; but not being able to break through the croud, he wrote the following note; Come down from the tribunal, butcher, and threw it into his lap. Augustus no sooner read it, than he rose up and quitted the tribunal, without sentencing any of the criminals to death^l. As for the scandalous lewdness and debaucheries of Augustus, which gave occasion to many severe lampoons and cast a great blemish upon his reputation, Mecænas was not at all a proper person to set up for a censor in that particular. The generous protection, which he afforded to men of learning, especially to Virgil and Horace, will render his name immortal, and transfer his fame to the latest posterity. He was not only an encourager of learning, but published, according to Priscian^m, *Isidorus*ⁿ, and Seneca^o, several works, which intitled him to a place among the best writers of that polite age. The works ascribed to him by the above-mentioned writers are, a history of animals; a journal of the life of Augustus; a treatise on shorthand-writing; of which some will have him, others Tyro, Cicero's freedman, to have been the inventor; another treatise on the nature and different kinds of precious stones; and two tragedies, the one intitled Octavia, and the other Prometheus: but none of these works have reached our times. Horace, the prince of the Latin lyric poets, did not long survive his great patron and benefactor; for Mecænas died about the beginning of September, and Horace on the twenty-seventh of the following November. The fame of so great a poet will be as lasting as his works, which all ages must admire, as the utmost effort of a human genius. The same year died one Caius Cæcilius Isidorus, famous for the immense wealth of which he was possessed; for he left to his heirs 4116 slaves,

ON the calends of January of the ensuing year, Tiberius, who was now come to Rome, entered upon his second consulship with Cn. Calpurnius Piso, and was the same day honoured with a triumph, which was a new sight to the Roman people. The bucklers and arms, which he had taken from the Germans, were carried before him, and the captive generals and officers of distinction marched in chains by the chariot of the triumphant victor. Before he left Rome, he repaired the temple of Concord, placing his own name and that of his deceased brother Drusus on the frontispiece of that stately building. After this he dedicated a temple, which the senate had erected, to his mother Livia, she herself being present at the ceremony. On this occasion he gave a most sumptuous entertainment to all the senators, while Livia feasted the women of distinction by themselves. In the beginning of the spring he left the capital and returned to Germany, but performed nothing which historians have thought worth transmitting to posterity. This year a dreadful fire happened in Rome, which reduced to ashes many stately buildings, and was thought to have been occasioned by the debtors, with a design to make their escape, in that confusion, out of the houses of their creditors. To prevent the like misfortunes and disorders for the future, Augustus created new officers called curatores vicorum, who were permitted on certain days to wear, within the verge of their jurisdiction, the robe peculiar to magistrates, and to have two lictors to attend them. To them were now assigned the six hundred slaves, who had been formerly appointed to attend the ædiles for the extinguishing of fires. At the same time, by Augustus's particular order, the city was divided into fourteen regions or wards, and these into inferior precincts, the government of which wards and precincts was committed to the above-mentioned curatores vicorum, and also to the tribunes of the people and the prætorsⁿ.

The bold and unseasonable demand of Lucius Cæsar.

THE following year, Caius Antistius Vetus and D. Lælius Balbus being raised to the consulate, Lucius Cæsar boldly demanded of Augustus in the public theatre, that his elder brother Caius Cæsar might be named consul for the ensuing year. The emperor, no less surprised than offended at this unseasonable demand, notwithstanding his affection for the two brothers, answered, that he hoped he should never lie under the necessity of raising any to the consulate under twenty years of age. The bold youth not being satisfied with this answer, but continuing to solicit him with great earnestness in behalf of his brother, the emperor raising his voice, told him with a grave air, That an office of such importance ought to be discharged only by a man who could bridle his own passions, and resist the desires of the giddy and head-strong multitude. However, his tenderness for the two brothers, whom he looked upon as his own children, having adopted them into the Julian family and the name of Cæsars, in some degree got the better of his reason; for he granted to Caius the priesthood, a place in the senate, and the privilege of sitting among the senators at all public shews and sports; but at the same time, to curb their ambitious temper, he conferred on Tiberius the tribunitial power for five years, which gave the two young Cæsars no small jealousy. But Tiberius had scarce received this new addition of power, when, to the great surprise of Augustus and the whole city, he desired leave to quit the city and retire to Rhodes. Various reasons are alledged by the ancients for this sudden resolution; Tiberius indeed pretended a desire of improving himself in the study of philosophy and eloquence, there being then at Rhodes famous professors of both these sciences. But Suetonius is of opinion, that the infamy of his wife Julia, which was now the talk of the whole city, and reflected great disgrace on his person and family, prompted him to retire, that he might not be an eye-witness of her scandalous debaucheries^o. Velleius Paterculus, a great flatterer of Tiberius, tells us, that he withdrew out of respect to the two young Cæsars, that he might not stand in their way to the highest preferments^p, following therein the example of Agrippa, who had retired to Mitylene, when Marcellus first entered upon public offices. Dion thinks he was piqued at the favour which Augustus shewed to his grandsons, especially at his declaring them princes of the Roman youths (G), which intirely defeated his ambitious projects, and left a left him no hopes of ever enjoying the sovereign power, the sole object of all his wishes^a. But, whatever his motive was, notwithstanding the remonstrances and tears of his mother Livia, he was very pressing with Augustus for his permission to retire; which the emperor not only refused, but took great pains, in concert with Livia, Which Augustus refuses him. to divert him from such an unseasonable resolution. He even complained to the senate of his being abandoned by one, from whose abilities he had promised himself great relief in the government of the republic. But Tiberius, deaf to all entreaties and remonstrances, and obstinately bent upon departing, continued importuning Augustus for his permission, which he constantly refused, being unwilling to lose the only person, in whom, after the death of Agrippa and Mecænas, he reposed any confidence, his grand-children not being yet of an age fit to be trusted. At length Tiberius, finding all other means ineffectual, retired into his own apartment, and, there shutting himself up, abstained four whole days from all kind of nourishment. Hereupon the emperor, seeing he could not get the better of his obstinate and inflexible temper, complied at length with his request, and granted him the so much wished-for permission to retire; which he no sooner obtained, than he set out for Ostia, without speaking a word on the way to those who attended him to the place where he imbarqued, or taking any notice of them, a small number of his particular friends excepted, at his departure^r. However, Dion tells us, that before he took his leave of Livia and Augustus, he opened his will and read it in their presence^s. From Ostia he sailed along the coast of Campania, and staid some time in that province, being informed there, that Augustus was indisposed. But, in the mean while, a report being spread abroad, that he waited for the news of Augustus's death, he weighed anchor as soon as it came to his ears, tho' the sea ran then very high, and sailed for Rhodes, where he led at first a very private and retired life, frequenting the schools and academies without any attendants, conversing familiarly with the Greeks, and avoiding all appearance of grandeur both in his house and equipage. However, he once exerted the tribunitial power with which he was invested; for a warm dispute arising one day in the school of Theodorus the Gadaraean, of whom he was a constant hearer, he interposed, and endeavoured to put an end to the contest. But one of the disputants, judging him partial, not only refused to acquiesce with his decision, but abused him in a most outrageous manner; which so provoked him, that he returned home, and assuming the habit of a public magistrate, appeared in the school, as tribune of the people with his apparitors, and summoning by a crier the philosopher, who had reviled him, ordered him to be carried to prison^t. Velleius, a scandalous flatterer of the Cæsars, especially of Tiberius, tells us, that he appeared greater in his retirement, than if he had been at the helm of affairs; that all the proconsuls and governors, who were sent into the east, went to wait upon him, lowering their fasces to him; that he gained the affection and esteem of all the Greeks, &c.^u. But all other writers tell us, that not being able to keep his vices concealed from the inhabitants of the island, they daily more despised and hated him, insomuch, that the Nemausians threw down his statues and defaced his pictures; nay, some time after, as Caius Cæsar passed that way, mention being made of Tiberius at a private entertainment, one of the company addressing Caius, Give only the word, said he; and you shall have the head of the exile in an instant. The name of exile well suited Tiberius; for though he voluntarily retired to Rhodes, yet he was long kept there against his will. Growing weary of his retirement, he publicly declared, that he had left Rome purely to avoid giving umbrage to Caius and Lucius, and wrote to the emperor, after they had attained to man's estate and were promoted to the highest dignities, begging leave to return home and visit his friends, since his presence could dren of the Roman noblemen under his command, and appeared at their head, when they performed their military exercises in the field of Mars, or exhibited the tournament called Troy. In the times of the republic the children of the most distinguished families were called principes juventutis, and principes equitum (19), because they were reckoned equites or knights, till they attained the age, which the laws required in the candidates for offices. The principes juventutis was distinguished from the rest by a triumphal robe, as Tacitus informs us (20). On the reverse of a medal of the emperor Severus, which has reached our times, are represented three youths on horseback, and one of them in the attitude of commanding, with this legend, Princ. juvent. which shews, that the princeps or principes juventutis had some command over the young nobility.

could no longer be disagreeable to his grand-children. But the favour was absolutely denied him, and a message sent, bidding him lay aside all care and thoughts of his friends, since he had been so impatient to abandon them. Thus he was obliged, fore against his will, to continue at Rhodes, and it was not till after seven years that Augustus was prevailed upon to consent to his return^w. This year Augustus himself was consul, and had for his colleague Cornelius Sylla. He had resumed the fasces, after having declined the consular dignity for seventeen years together, with no other view, as is supposed, but to render the ceremony of giving the toga virilis to his grandson Caius more solemn. For he presented him in person to the senate, gave him the toga virilis himself, with the usual ceremonies, and designed him consul; which dignity, as he was then but fifteen, he was to hold, after five years, to be reckoned from the day he was presented to the senate. Thus the Ancyran marble^z. This year Augustus reduced the number of those who were supplied with corn at the public expence, to two hundred thousand, corn having for some years been given indifferently to all who desired it. Nothing remarkable happened in Rome or Italy the two following years, in the first of which C. Calvisius Sabinus and L. Passienus Rufus were consuls, and in the second L. Cornelius Lentulus and M. Valerius Messalinus. The ensuing year, Augustus again reserved the consular dignity for himself, and took for his colleague M. Plautius Sylvanus, or Silanus. As Lucius, the younger of his grandsons, was now of an age to receive the toga virilis, Augustus conferred on him the same honours as he had done three years before on his brother Caius. Several medals, coined on this occasion, have reached our times, on which are the heads of the two brothers with bucklers and spears, and this legend on the reverse; Caius and Lucius Cæsars, the sons of Augustus, designed consuls, princes of the youth. Thus were the two sons highly favoured and honoured by Augustus; but their mother Julia met with a very different treatment. Her lewdness, infamy, and scandalous debaucheries, hardly to be matched in history, had for some years been the talk of the whole town. But Augustus had the misfortune of most princes, who are, generally speaking, the least acquainted with their nearest concerns. He believed indeed, that she did not lead a very strict life, but never imagined her capable of committing those monstrous and almost incredible excesses, of which he now found her guilty. Upon a full discovery of her actions and conduct, he was so sensibly affected with grief and confusion, that he shut himself up in his palace, and there continued several days, bewailing his misfortune, without seeing any even of his most intimate friends. Not able to conceal the transports of his grief and anger from the public, he communicated to the senate by a letter the excesses of the infamous prostitute, and the disgrace of his family, an indiscretion which he afterwards said he would never have been guilty of, had Agrippa or Mecænas been living. Overcome with shame and rage, he first resolved to put his daughter to death; but afterwards altered his mind, and contented himself with banishing her to Pandataria, a desert island on the coast of Campania, now known by the name of Santa Maria. Her mother Scribonia, whom Augustus had divorced the same day she was born, that is, thirty eight years before, attended her to the place of her banishment, and never afterwards abandoned her. The emperor not only punished the infamous Julia with banishment, but at the same time forbade her the use of wine, and all sorts of delicacy whatsoever either in diet or cloaths. By an express order from the emperor, no person of what condition soever was to come near her without his leave. Not long after, her eldest daughter by Agrippa, named also Julia and married to L. Paulus, being convicted of the same crimes as her mother, was confined to the island of Tremera, now Tremiti, in the Adriatic sea^y. The punishment of Julia was followed by that of all those who were any ways accessory to her debaucheries. Sempronius Gracchus, T. Quinctius Crispinus, C. Claudius, and L. Scipio, all persons of great distinction, were condemned to perpetual banishment. But Julius Antonius (H), the son of the triumvir, and many others, were by the emperor's orders put to death. Some writers tell us, that

(H) Julius Antonius was a man of learning, and wrote a poem intitled Diomedæ, consisting of ten books. To him Horace addressed the second ode of his fourth book. He left a son very young, whom

Augustus banished to Marseilles under colour of having him instructed by the great masters, who flourished then in that city. He died without offspring and in him ended the Antonian family.

^a that Augustus laid hold of this opportunity to get rid of many considerable Romans, who gave him uneasiness and jealousy. Be that as it will, it is certain, that an incredible number of illustrious Romans were sacrificed, under pretence of having received favours of Julia. Her chief confidant, by name Phæbe, laid violent hands on herself before sentence was pronounced against her. Augustus, when news was brought him of her death, could not help admiring her courage, and wishing that Phæbe, and not Julia, had been his daughter, intimating thereby, that he would have been well pleased, if Julia had had courage enough to end her days in the same manner. Tiberius heard, as we may well imagine, the news of the disgrace and banishment of Julia with great joy; but, as no man knew better the art of dissembling, he became her advocate; and, pretending great tenderness and compassion for her, he wrote frequent letters to Augustus, intreating him to forgive her, and reinstate her in his favour. But the emperor continued inflexible to the hour of his death, nay, he carried, in a manner, his resentment beyond his grave; for by his last will he ordained, that she should not be deposited after her death among the Cæsars, whom she had so disgraced during her life. As for Tiberius, Augustus obliged him to divorce her, notwithstanding the tenderness and affection which, by the deepest dissimulation, he still pretended to retain for her ².

AND now Augustus, to divert his mind from fixing on his domestic misfortunes, exhibited the most magnificent and expensive shews that had ever been seen in Rome, chariot-races in the circus, representations on the stage, combats of gladiators, &c. were now become common. Augustus therefore, the better to divert both himself and the people, revived those sports which had been for a considerable time laid aside, on account of the extraordinary charges that attended them. He caused a canal to be dug eighteen hundred paces in length and two hundred in breadth, conveying into it the Flaminian water, and building scaffolds quite round it capable of holding numberless multitudes of spectators. And indeed the concourse of people was so great, that the emperor was obliged to place guards in all the quarters of the city, lest the thieves should lay hold of that opportunity to plunder the empty and abandoned houses. Augustus had frequently entertained the people with fights of lions, tygers, elephants, rhinoceros, &c. but now the new canal appeared all on a sudden covered with crocodiles, of which thirty-six were killed by Egyptians brought from the banks of the Nile for that purpose. The multitude were highly delighted with this sight, which was quite new; but the sea fight which ensued afforded them still greater diversion. For at the opposite ends of the lake, or canal, two fleets appeared, the galleys of one being built after the Greek, and those of the other after the Persian, manner. Both fleets engaged; and as they fought in good earnest, most of the combatants being persons sentenced to death, the battle proved very bloody ^a.

Magnificent shews exhibited by Augustus.

IN the midst of these public sports and diversions, news was brought to Augustus, that the Armenians, entering into an alliance with the Parthians, had driven out Artabazes, whom he had appointed king of that country, and raised to the throne Tigranes in his room. Hereupon the emperor, dreading the consequences of an alliance between those two powers, was greatly at a loss what measures he should take to put a stop to the war, which threatened the eastern provinces. He could not manage it in person, being now stricken in years; Tiberius was retired to Rhodes, and the emperor determined not to recall or employ him; on the other hand, he was afraid to trust any with the command of the army, except those of his own family. In this perplexity, he at length resolved to send into the east his grandson Caius, who was then entered into the nineteenth year of his age (I); but before his departure, to procure him the greater esteem, he honoured him with the title of proconsul, and married him to Lollia Paulina, either the daughter or niece of M. Lollius, an officer of great experience, who was his governor, and whom he now appointed to command under him^b. Before the young general set out, Augustus, who omitted nothing that might contribute to the success of this expedition, sent Dionysius, a geographer of great fame, into the east before him, with orders to take an exact survey of the country, which was likely to be the seat of war^c. Whether this was the famous Dionysius, whose periegesis in Greek verse has reached us; or another Dionysius, the son of Diogenes, who published the dimensions of the earth, as we read in Marcianus Heracleota^d, we know not. This commission of Caius Cæsar is variously mentioned by the ancients; Tacitus writes, that he had Armenia for his province^e; Velleius Paterculus, that he was sent into Syria^f; Suetonius, that he was appointed governor of the east^g; Orosius, that he was sent by Augustus to settle the provinces of Egypt and Syria^h; and Pliny quotes a book wrote by king Juba, in which mention is made of Caius's expedition into *Arabia*ⁱ; but adds, that the young prince had only some thoughts of invading Arabia^k. In the mean time, Phraates, king of Parthia, being informed of the warlike preparations that were carrying on in different parts of the empire, and not doubting, but they were designed against him, wrote a submissive letter to Augustus; but as he deferred, under various pretences, withdrawing his troops out of Armenia, which Augustus in his answer required him to do without delay, Caius, taking his leave of Augustus, set out from Rome, and hastened into Armenia^l. In his passage he touched at Cbios^m, or, as Suetonius will have it, at *Samos*ⁿ; which Tiberius no sooner understood, than he went to wait upon him, behaving himself on that occasion in a very submissive manner, and shewing the utmost respect not only to the young prince, but to all those of his attendance. Caius received him with great coldness, his governor M. Lollius, who hated Tiberius, having filled the mind of his pupil with prejudices against him^o. Thus Suetonius: but Velleius, flattering Tiberius, according to his custom, tells us, that Caius received him with the greatest marks of esteem, and treated him as his superior^p. Be that as it will, it is certain, that Tiberius's tribuneship, expiring about this time, he earnestly solicited the emperor for leave to return home, and received from him the answer, which we have related above; so that he was obliged much against his will to continue at Rhodes, which he no longer looked upon as the place of his retreat, but as the place of his banishment. However, his mother Livia, who had a great influence over the emperor, to cover the ignominy of her son, got him, with much ado, declared Augustus's lieutenant in those parts. But he, finding himself obnoxious to the sovereign, and apprehending himself in danger of his life, not only lived as a private citizen, but retiring into the midst of the island, concealed himself there to avoid the compliments of the Roman officers and magistrates, who were sent into the east^q. Nay, he wrote to Augustus, desiring him to send some person, in whom he could confide, with a charge to watch him, and transmit to Rome a faithful account of all his words and actions^r.

BUT to return to Caius Cæsar; from Samos or Cbios he hastened into Syria, where all the Romans forces in the east, and those of the allies of Rome, were assembled and ready to march. Suetonius tells us, that he passed through Judea, but scorned to worship at Jerusalem, and adds, that his conduct therein was approved of, and much commended, by Augustus^s. Upon his arrival in Syria, he put himself at the head of the army, and began his march towards the frontiers of Parthia. Upon his approach Phraates, distrusting his own subjects, who bore him an irreconcilable hatred, sent deputies to him to treat of a peace. The young general received the ambassadors with great politeness, and it was agreed, that Caius and Phraates would have an interview in an island formed by the Euphrates. Thither they both repaired on the day appointed, each of them being attended with the like number of guards, while their self at the head of his army, as is manifest from the Anicyran marble, containing a summary of the chief actions of his life; and Caius was entered into his nineteenth year when he began to prepare for his expedition against the Parthians; so that his father and he went commanders at the same age.

a two armies, drawn up in battalia, lined the opposite banks of the river. In the conference Caius only insisted upon the Parthian's renouncing all pretensions to Armenia, which he readily consented to; so that a treaty was soon concluded, and tranquillity restored, when least expected, to the eastern provinces. Matters being thus settled, the two chiefs feasted each other; Caius entertained Phraates on the Roman side of the river, and Phraates Caius on the Parthian side. Thus Velleius Paterculus, who was present, as a spectator, at these entertainments, he being then a military tribune in Caius's army ^t. The same writers tell us, that the Parthian king acquainted Caius in a private conference, that he was betrayed by his governor M. Lollius, who had taken large bribes of him, and had heaped up immense sums by laying, without his knowledge, heavy contributions on all the provinces of the east. The same writer adds, that the king bid him beware of the treacherous designs and counsels of Lollius, at which the young prince being alarmed, forbid him his presence. Lollius thus disgraced, died a few days after; but whether of a natural or violent death, our author will not take upon him to determine ^u. Pliny and Solinus say, that he put an end to his life with poison; but none of the ancients impute his death to Caius, though he deserved to be punished with the utmost severity, if the charge, brought against him by the Parthian king, was true. Upon his death Publius Quirinius was either appointed by Augustus, or chosen by the young prince himself, for his governor. He was a good commander, and had been rewarded by Augustus for his eminent services first with the consulship, and afterwards with a triumph, or rather an ovation, for driving the Homonades, a people of Cilicia, out of their strong-holds ^v. He proved a friend to Tiberius, and reconciled Caius to him, as we shall see anon. The treaty of peace between the Romans and Parthians was scarce concluded, when Artabazes, whom Augustus had placed on the throne of Armenia, died; and then Tigranes, who had been set up by the Parthians, sent rich presents to Augustus, accompanied with a submissive letter, wherein, without styling himself king, he begged the kingdom of him. The emperor, glad to put an end to the disturbances of the east, accepted his presents, and ordered him to attend Caius in Syria; which he did accordingly, and received at his hands the crown of Armenia ^x. Augustus, to perpetuate the memory of this expedition, and the glory of young Caius, who managed it with such success, caused several medals to be struck, or pieces of money coined, some of which have reached us, with the figure of Armenia in a suppliant posture, and the names of Augustus and Caius Cæsar on the reverse.

(K) From the time of Romulus to the reign of Augustus the temple of Janus had been but twice shut, viz. during Numa's peaceable reign, and after the first Punic war (22). Augustus shut it up three times, viz. after he had vanquished Antony and Cleopatra, four years after on his return from the war, which he had waged with the Cantabrians in Spain, and some years before the birth of our Saviour. Horace, who died seven years before, speaks in his last ode of Augustus's victory over the Sicambri, and observes, that the temple of Janus was then shut. Orosius says, that after Augustus had shut it the third time, it continued so for the space of twelve years (23). On the other hand, F. Noris, is of opinion, that it was opened on occasion of Caius Cæsar's expedition against the Parthians, whence he concludes, first against Orosius, that it did not continue shut for twelve years, and secondly against most historians and chronologers, that our Saviour was born before the troubles in the east broke out; for he was born, as all the fathers affirm, while the world was in peace; and, on the other hand, Tacitus assures us, that after Augustus had laid open the gates of Janus the third time, they were never shut again to the reign of Vespasian (24). But as no war was declared, and no hostilities committed either by the Romans or Parthians, we cannot persuade ourselves, that the temple of Janus was opened on occasion of this expedition.

(L) Augustus having issued out a decree for taking such a description or survey of the whole Roman empire as should contain an account of all persons, possessions, and estates therein, and the taxes issuable from them, it was this year executed in Judæa in the manner St. Luke describes it. When it came to Bethlehem, Joseph and Mary were called from Nazareth in Galilee, the place of their habitation, to that city, the city of David, to which, as being of the house and lineage of David, they originally belonged,

But to dwell on the particular circumstances of this or the other mysteries of the Christian religion, would be deviating from the design of the present work, and intrenching on the province of the ecclesiastic writers. The death of

THE following year, Cassius Cornelius Lentulus and L. Calpurnius Piso were raised to the consulate, and succeeded the year after in that dignity by Caius Cæsar, tho' then absent in Syria (M), and L. Æmilius Paulus. During their administration nothing remarkable happened in Italy, or in the countries subject to, or depending upon, Rome, except the death of king Herod, which was no less miserable than his life had been detestable, and the division of his kingdom made by Augustus, who gave one half of it to Archelaus, and divided the other half between his two brothers, Antipas and Philip, as we have related at length in our history of the Jews^y. During the consulship of Caius, Augustus ended his great climacterical year, that is, the sixty-third of his age, on which occasion he wrote the following letter to his grandson in Syria: Hail, my dear Caius, my chief delight: your presence is the constant object of my most ardent wishes: I cannot, my dear child, bear to be from you: when shall I have the pleasure of seeing my beloved Caius again, and tenderly embracing him? Your presence would have doubled the mirth of this day, my sixty-fourth birth-day, which I hope you have solemnly kept in good health: for I have ended, you see, my sixty-third year, the common climacteric of old men. May the gods render the remaining part of my life useful and serviceable to the republic: may they continue to shower their blessings upon you, till they shall think fit to remove me, and place you in my room^z.

to Rome.

THE following year, P. Albinus Varus and P. Vinucius being consuls, Tiberius was at length allowed to return to Rome; Caius, to whom Augustus had referred the matter, to deliver himself from the importunities of Livia, consenting to it at the earnest intreaties of his new governor Quirinius; but upon that condition that he should bear no office in the commonwealth^a. We are told, that when the ship, which brought him the news of his being allowed to return to Rome, first appeared, he was walking by the sea-side with one Thrasyllus, a famous astrologer, who assured him, though the ship was at a great distance, that it brought him joyful tidings. The sudden appearing of the ship saved Thrasyllus's life; for Tiberius had at that very time determined with himself to throw him headlong into the sea, as one who was privy to all his secrets, and whom he now began to mistrust, after he had for some years entertained him as his bosom friend. He put off the execution of his design till the arrival of the ship, when finding the prediction of the astrologer fulfilled, he tenderly embraced him, and ever after had him in great esteem, though he pretended himself to a great knowledge in judicial astrology^b. Upon his return to Rome he withdrew to Mæcenas's gardens, and there led a retired life, doing good offices to some of his friends, but not meddling with public affairs^c. But he was soon delivered from the objects of his envy and jealousy; for Lucius Cæsar, who was but a youth of tender abilities, died this year at Marseilles on his journey to Spain, whither he belonged, that there, as citizens of that place, their circumstances, and estate, or trade, might be described and registered among those who were of the same house and family. Whenever a census was made at Rome, the censors registered all the Roman citizens, their wives and children, their age, qualities, trades, offices, and estates both real and personal: Censoris officium erat, says Florus (25), omnia patrimonialia, dignitatis, ætatis, artium, officiorum, discrimina in tabulas referre; and Cicero (26) Censores populi ævitates, soboles, familias, pecuniasque censent. Augustus was the first who extended this census to the provinces, where those, who were charged with it, pursued, without all doubt, the same method as the censors did at Rome. 'Tis true, none of the ancient historians mention this general census extending to all the provinces, and kingdoms subject to, or depending upon, Rome; but Tacitus (27), Suetonius (28), and

Dion Cassius (29), tells us, that Augustus left behind him a book containing an exact account or survey of all the provinces of the Roman empire, and their revenues, taxes, and tributes, which, it is manifest, he could not have done without a previous and general census. Besides, St. Justin (30) and Tertullian (31) frequently refer the Gentiles to the registers which were made on occasion of this census, and were still extant in their time.

(M) That Caius was absent from Rome when he was raised to the consulate, and that he discharged the office of consul in the east, is unanimously attested by all the ancients. It is therefore surprising, Josephus should tell us, that Augustus referred the dispute, which upon the death of Herod arose between Archelaus and Antipas about the succession, to a council, at which Caius Cæsar, the son of Agrippa and Julia, presided, he being at that time in Rome.

a he had been sent by his grandfather, who had no other view therein than to bring him into favour with the soldiery, and accustom him to a military life and a foreign climate^d. Some writers suspect Livia, as if she had found means to take him off by poison; for his death was so sudden, that it surprised his attendants, and the art of poisoning was at that time brought to great perfection, and become very common in Rome. His body was brought by sea from Marseilles to one of the ports of Italy, and from thence carried to the capital on the shoulders of the military tribunes, and the decurions of the colonies and municipal towns. At Rome it lay in state for several days in the forum, being watched and guarded by the Roman knights, who had presented the deceased youth with a silver spear when he took the toga virilis. The spear was hung up in the senate-house, and the body burnt with great solemnity, probably in the campus Martius. The ashes, we suppose, were deposited in Augustus's own mausoleum, the burying-place of the Cæsars. The emperor was sensibly affected, as we may well imagine, with the loss of a youth whom he so tenderly loved, and saw thus snatched away in the spring of his life; and Tiberius, by affecting an extraordinary concern for the death of his son-in-law, wrought such a change in the mind of Augustus, Livia, no doubt, contributing to it with her usual art and dexterity, that he would have adopted him, if Velleius is to be credited, had he not absolutely declined that honour, through fear of giving umbrage to Caius^e (N).

IN the following consulate of L. Ailius Lama and M. Servilius, the famous temple of the mother of the gods at Rome was reduced to ashes; but the flames, which did not respect the statue of the goddess, spared that of the vestal Claudia, who, in former times being accused of incest, is said to have given a glaring and miraculous proof of her innocence, by drawing ashore with her girdle the ship which brought the mother of the gods to Rome, and had run a-ground off Ostia^f. This pretended miracle is much talked of by the Roman writers, and elegantly described by Ovid and Silius Italicus^g. In the consulate of Sextus Ailius Catus and C. Sentius Saturninus (O), Numidia, formerly subdued and reduced to a Roman province by Julius Cæsar, rebelled, but was soon brought again under subjection by Passienus and Cossus, whom Augustus honoured on their return to the capital with triumphal ensigns, that is, he allowed them all the privileges and honours which were peculiar to triumphant victors^h, the custom of triumphing being now laid aside. But the troubles which this year broke out anew in Armenia, were not so easily quelled: the Parthians, notwithstanding the treaty concluded a few years before between them and the Romans, invaded that kingdom with a numerous army. Hereupon Caius, who was still in Syria, having with great expedition drawn together his forces, marched against the enemy, and penetrating into the heart of Armenia without opposition, appeared before Artagera. Upon his arrival, one Addo, whom some call Domnes, the governor of the place, sent deputies to him, inviting him to a private interview, under pretence that he had something to communicate to him of the utmost importance. Caius, not suspecting any treachery, complied with his invitation; but Addo, or, as Strabo calls him, Ador, having insensibly drawn the unwary youth during the conference close to the wall, wounded him, and retired that instant into the city; which the Romans, provoked at the treachery of the barbarian, immediately assaulted on all sides, took by storm,

(N) Alphenus Varus was of a mean descent, but raised himself by his own merit to the first office in the state. Horace mentions him in the third satyr of his first book:

Abjeto instrumento artis, clausaque taberna,

Upon which passage Acron comments thus: Alphenus was a native of Cremona, by profession a shoemaker; but abandoning his trade, applied himself to the study of the Roman law, under the famous civilian Servius Sulpicius. The great progress he made in the Roman jurisprudence gained him such reputation, that he was judged worthy of the greatest honours of the state. When he died, he was buried at the public expence, a distinction granted to few and those persons of the highest merit.

(O) When Agrippa was recalled from the east, Sentius Saturninus and Titus Volumnius were appointed to succeed him in the government of Syria and Phœnice. Some writers think, that Saturninus was governor or president of the province, and that Volumnius was only his lieutenant, or rather Augustus's procurator under him; but Josephus speaks of him as in joint commission with Saturninus (32).

storm, and dismantled, after having put the traitor, and with him the whole garrison, to the swordⁱ (P). The wound did not prove mortal; but nevertheless weakened the body, and sunk the spirits of Caius to such a degree, that after he had driven the Parthians out of Armenia, and placed Ariobarzanes, by birth a Mede, on the throne, he gave himself up to an idle and indolent life, leaving the whole management of affairs to his officers and lieutenants. Hereupon Augustus, who had a great desire to see his favourite grandson, recalled him to Rome; but he, taken with the delights of that soft climate, and having many flatterers about him, who made it their constant study to feed his vicious inclinations with new pleasures, begged leave to continue in Syria, declaring, that he had rather live in the most remote and inhospitable corner of the earth, than return to Rome. This unexpected proposal stung Augustus to the heart, who, in his answer to him, insisted on his returning to Italy, assuring him, that he should there be allowed to do what he pleased. Caius therefore, with the utmost reluctance, left Syria, and sailing for Lycia, arrived at Limyra, a city of that country, where he died soon after in the twenty-fourth year of his age^k (Q). Thus was Augustus, in the space of eighteen months, deprived of both his grandsons, whom he had adopted, and brought up to succeed him in the sovereign power. His death, as well as that of Lucius, is by some imputed to the secret arts of Livia, who left no stone unturned to advance her son Tiberius to the empire. The grief of Augustus for the death of one, whom he loved with all the tenderness of a fond father, was great beyond expression. Livia and Tiberius endeavoured to comfort him; and on this occasion it was that the artful Livia, who had gained an absolute sway over her husband, prevailed upon him to adopt her son Tiberius. However, he adopted at the same time Agrippa Posthumus, the third son of Agrippa and Julia, whom he had hitherto quite neglected, as being a youth of no parts, and of an untractable temper. He likewise obliged Tiberius to adopt Germanicus, the son of his brother Drusus, tho' he had a son of his own; so that the joy of Tiberius in seeing himself at length adopted into the family and name of the Cæsars, was not a little allayed by this mortifying and unexpected preference. His nephew Germanicus was now become the emperor's grandson, while his own son Drusus was denied that honour^l. These three different adoptions happened on the same day, viz. on the fifth of the calends of July; and it is remarkable, that Augustus, in adopting Tiberius, solemnly swore before the people, that he adopted him for the good of the commonwealth^m. At the same time he conferred on him the tribunitial power, for five years according to some writersⁿ, but according to others for ten^o. Thus, by the address of Livia, were all honours heaped upon her son, now sole candidate, we may say, for the succession.

WHILE Augustus was thus strengthening himself by the adoption of Tiberius and Agrippa, a dangerous conspiracy was discovered, at the head of which was Cornelius Cinna, grandson to Pompey by his daughter Pompeia. As several persons of the highest rank were engaged in the plot, Augustus was greatly at a loss what measures

(P) Florus relates this event in the following manner: Domitius, on whom the king of Parthia had conferred the government of Artaxata, pretending a revolt, came out to meet Caius, and delivered into his hands a writing, which, he said, contained an account of all the king's treasures; but while he was perusing it with great attention, the traitor, drawing a poniard concealed under his garment, stabbed him (33). Sextus Rufus follows Florus, and, by an unpardonable mistake, adds, that the Parthians, by way of satisfaction for so bold and treacherous an attempt, did then first give hostages to Octavianus Cæsar, and restored the ensigns which had been taken from Crassus (34).

(Q) Tacitus says he died of his wound as he was returning from Armenia (35), and Sextus Rufus, that he returned into Syria, and died there; but Suetonius, Dion Cassius, and Velleius Paterculus, who served under Caius, assure us, that he died at Limyra in Lycia on his return to Rome, Augustus was extremely grieved at his death, and complained of Asinius Pollio, one of his chief favourites, for inviting his friends to an entertainment while his grief was yet fresh. Pollio answered, I supped after the same manner when I lost my son Arterius, and can any one require more grief of a friend than of a father (36)? The body of Caius was conveyed to Rome, and buried there with great pomp. Beltonius tells us, that he saw the tomb and epitaph of C. Cæsar at Hama or Emesa in Syria (37); but that his bones were buried at Rome is manifest from the following epitaph, which is still to be seen in the church of the apostles behind the temple of Minerva: *Offa C. a to take in so nice an affair. If he used rigor, he was afraid their friends and relations, who were very powerful, might raise dangerous disturbances to revenge their death; if he pardoned them, he apprehended this might encourage others to the like attempts. In this perplexity he passed several nights without being able to take the least rest, or come to any resolution. At length Livia, by her refined artifices, drew from him the true cause of his disquiet and uneasiness. Dion Cassius relates a conference between her and the emperor, which seems rather to have been framed by him than real^o. However that be, it is certain, that she, by many ingenious and politic arguments, convinced him, that it was safer in so critical a juncture to use clemency than rigor. Pursuant to her advice, Augustus sent for Cinna, and taking him into his closet, charged him with the conspiracy, named to him all his accomplices, and shewed himself thoroughly informed of the place, time, and other circumstances, which the conspirators had agreed on in their last meeting. Cinna was thunder-struck, as we may well imagine, when he saw his treason thus discovered, and himself in the power of the person whom he sought to destroy, without any possible means of escaping the punishment due to his crime. His surprise was still greater, when Augustus, instead of treating him as a traitor, only upbraided him in a gentle manner with ingratitude, putting him in mind of the many favours he had bestowed upon him, and adding, that he was resolved to get the better of his obstinacy; and therefore not only freely forgave him, but, for his sake, all those he had seduced into the same wicked designs; and to shew you, said he, that I am sincerely reconciled to you, I now name you consul for the ensuing year. This generous behaviour made such a deep impression upon the mind of Cinna, that he continued, from that time to the hour of his death, inviolably attached to the interest of Augustus and his family^p. It was about this time, and perhaps on this occasion, that the people offered him the title of Dominus, that is, Lord or Master, which he not only refused, but published an edict, forbidding any one to address him under that name; a name peculiar to masters with respect to their slaves, and therefore no less injurious to him than the Roman people^q. Towards the end of this year, the people earnestly intreated him to recal his daughter Julia; but he answered, That fire and water should sooner meet than they two; and when the people were very pressing with him, he could not refrain his anger, but, in a violent passion, wished they might have such wives and such daughters. However, they prevailed upon him at length to change the place of her confinement, and to remove her from the island to the continent; but he would not by any means suffer her to return to Rome^r.

In the beginning of the ensuing year, when Cn. Cornelius Cinna, who had conspired against Augustus, and L. Valerius Messala were consuls, Tiberius was sent into Germany, to complete the conquest of that country, and keep in awe the several nations which had been some years before subdued by him and his brother Drusus. C. Sentius Saturninus, the last year's consul, an officer of known valour and great experience, was appointed by Augustus to command under him, as one who was well acquainted with the country, he having been formerly Augustus's lieutenant in those parts. Velleius Paterculus the historian attended Tiberius in this expedition, and served under him in quality of præfectus equitum, or commander of horse; which post had been held by his father, and at his death was conferred upon him. He tells us, that Tiberius, entering Germany, over-ran the country of the Caninefates, now the province of Utrecht; that from thence he advanced against the Attuati and Brueteri, that is, the people of the territory of Munster, whom he easily reduced; that the Cherusci, the inhabitants of the present duchies of Brunswic and Lunebourg, submitted at his approach; that he made himself master of all the countries lying on the Visurgis and the Lupias, now the Weser and the Lyppe; and that putting his troops into winter-quarters on the banks of the Lupias, he returned to Rome towards the end of December, where he was received with loud acclamations by all ranks of men^s.

In this and the following year, Rome was afflicted with a dreadful famine, inasmuch, that all foreigners, gladiators, athletæ or wrestlers, and slaves, except physicians and schoolmasters, were driven out of the city, and ordered to keep at eighty miles distance from the capital, Augustus himself sending away the greater part of his own slaves and attendants. On this occasion he doubled his usual largesses, ordering a certain quantity of corn to be weekly distributed among the indigent citizens, and provisions to be brought from Sicily, Sardinia, and the neighbouring countries at the public expence, and sold at a low rate. This still more gained him the affections of the people, who were therefore for decreeing him new honours, which he absolutely refused; but the glory which accrued to him from a solemn embassy sent this year to Rome in the name of the Parthian nation, is greatly celebrated by all the writers of those times; for the Parthians, quite tired with the troubles that were daily raised in their country by pretenders to the crown, had at length recourse to Augustus, begging him to give them a king. The emperor, highly pleased with this embassy, named Vonones, one of the sons of Phrabates, who had been sent to Rome, as we have observed above, commending him both to the Parthian ambassadors and the Roman governors in the east. The Parthian nobility received him with great joy, and placed him on the throne; which Augustus was no less proud of, than if he had subdued that warlike nation^t. The next year, M. Æmilius Lepidus and L. Aruntius, being consuls, Tiberius, returning into Germany, pursued his conquests there with surprising rapidity, if Velleius his historian, or rather panegyrist, is to be credited. He first subdued the Chauci (R), the most flourishing and numerous nation of Germany, and then the Langobardi or Lombardi, who surpassed in fierceness all the inhabitants of that vast continent. He over-ran and brought under subjection all the countries between the Rhine and the Albis or the Elbe, while his fleet struck terror into the warlike and barbarous nations bordering on the ocean. In short, the Roman ensigns and eagles were revered and adored by numberless nations, who, till the arrival of the invincible Tiberius, had never heard of the Roman name. Such is the account which Velleius gives us of the victories and exploits of Tiberius^u. But another writer, unbiassed by any affection or prejudice, tells us, that Tiberius indeed over-ran all the countries between the Albis and the Visurgis; but performed nothing which he thinks worth mentioning, tho' both Tiberius and Augustus were honoured with the title of Imperator on account of the pretended success of this campaign, and Sentius Saturninus with the ensigns of triumph^w. While Tiberius was carrying on the war in Germany, Cornelius Cossus was employed in Mauritania against the Getuli, who, revolting from king Juba, massacred all the Romans settled in his country, and committed most dreadful ravages in the provinces subject to that prince. But Cossus marching against them, overthrew the rebels with great slaughter, and obliged them to submit upon what terms he thought fit to impose upon them; for which he likewise was honoured with the privileges peculiar to those who had triumphed. This year Agrippa Posthumus, having incurred the displeasure of his grandfather Augustus, was by him banished to the island of Planasia, now Pianosa, in the Mediterranean sea. Some writers tell us, that Augustus conceived an irreconcilable hatred to him on account of his irregular and scandalous life, which he thought a disgrace to his family; whence, when mention was made of him, or the two Julias, he used to say with a profound sigh, O, had I lived without a wife, or died without children! nor did he commonly call them by any other name than his three imposthumes. But Tacitus ascribes the disgrace of young Agrippa not to any vices of his own, but to the arts and ambitious views of Livia, who was glad to remove the only person who stood in her son's way to the absolute power. As Augustus was now very old, says that writer, Livia had obtained such an ascendant over him, that, to please her, he banished into the island of Planasia his only surviving grandson Agrippa Posthumus, one indeed destitute of extraordinary talents, in his temper untractable, and stupidly conceited of his own strength, but guilty of no misdemeanour or transgression^x.

THE next year, when A. Licinius Nerva and Q. Cæcilius Metellus were consuls, Rome had three mighty wars to maintain, viz. one in Germany, another in Pannonia, and the third in Dalmatia. In Germany, Maroboduus king of the Marcomanni (S), a prince

a prince of extraordinary strength, which was a great merit among the Germans, of uncommon address, and great personal courage and experience in military affairs, having raised a formidable army, consisting of seventy thousand foot and four thousand horse, threatened the countries lately subdued by Tiberius, nay, Italy itself, with an invasion. Against him was sent Tiberius, who arriving in Illyricum, divided the numerous forces he had under his command into two bodies. The one he put under the conduct of C. Sentius Saturninus, who, pursuant to Tiberius's order, taking his rout through the territories of the Catti, and opening himself a passage through the Hercynian forest (T), brought his legions to the confines of the Marcomanni, called by the ancients Boiobæmi. As for Tiberius himself, he seemed to be in no great haste to enter the lists with the king of the Marcomanni; for, under various pretences, he put off his march, and continued in Illyricum, as if he were afraid of the enemy, or designed to spin out the war. Augustus was old, and Tiberius well knew how much it would be for his interest to have at his death an army under his command ready to second his ambitious views. Be that as it will, he passed great part of the summer in a state of inaction; at the head of a numerous and well disciplined army. In the mean time, M. Valerius Messalinus, having, by Augustus's orders, led the troops he commanded in Dalmatia and Pannonia into Illyricum, to reinforce Tiberius's army there, the inhabitants of those two countries, being now awed by no Roman garisons, conspired to shake off the yoke, and recover their ancient liberties, under the conduct of the two chiefs of the same name. The two Batos, for so they were called, raised each in his own country a hundred thousand foot and nine thousand horse, slew all the Romans who had settled in Pannonia or Dalmatia, over-ran the neighbouring countries subject to the Romans, and penetrating into Macedon, committed there most dreadful ravages. The two chiefs had agreed to act jointly or separately, as occasion should require, and not to lay down their arms till they had delivered their respective countries, and all Germany, from the Roman bondage. This general and unexpected insurrection filled Rome with terror and confusion. The emperor, having assembled the senate, instead of lessening, magnified the danger, telling the conscript fathers, that unless a new army was raised with all possible expedition, they might in ten days see the enemy at the gates of Rome. Levies were therefore made without delay, the veterans were ordered to return to their colours, and not only freed-men, but great numbers of slaves, were admitted into the legions. By this means a numerous army was raised, and the command of it given to Germanicus, the son of Drusus and nephew of Tiberius, a youth of extraordinary accomplishments. As for Augustus, he left the capital, and went to reside at Ariminum, whence he could with more ease and quickness send his orders to the two generals, and assist them with his advice in the carrying on of a war, which he looked upon as the most dangerous one he had yet been engaged in, the enemy's troops being very numerous, well disciplined, and at no great distance from Italy, which, if any misfortune should happen either to Tiberius or Germanicus, they would not fail to invade, and might over-run before a new army could be raised. Tiberius no sooner heard that Germanicus was appointed to command against the revolted Pannonians and Dalmatians, than he turned his arms against them, hoping he should be able to reduce them before the arrival of Germanicus, whom he now looked upon as his rival, and therefore would have willingly deprived of the glory, which might accrue to him from that expedition. With this view, quitting Illyricum, he incamped in the country which parted Pannonia from the Bohemia, and driven out the Boii, settled there. Vell. Paterculus gives us an account of their migration under the conduct of Maroboduus (39). They made themselves afterwards masters likewise of Moravia. They were in process of time driven out of Bohemia by the Sclavonians, whose descendants hold that kingdom to this day.

(T) Julius Cæsar speaks in his commentaries of this forest thus: It is nine days journey over; we cannot otherwise describe it, because the Germans have no fixed measures of distances. It begins on the confines of the Helvetii, Nemetes, and Rauraci, (that is, of Switzerland, Basil, and Spire) and extends along the Danube to the borders of the Daci and Arnates (that is, to Transilvania); then turning from the river to the left, it runs through an infinite number of countries. None could ever yet come to the end of it, or know its utmost extent, tho' some have gone sixty day journey in it (40). Mela gives this forest an immense length; for, according to him, it extended from the Rhine to the country of the ancient Sarmatæ, which is at present a considerable part of Muscovy. In process of time the Hercynian forest was grubbed up, and inhabited by different nations. The Black forest and the forest of Bohemia, were formerly parts of the Hercynian.

the kingdom of Maroboduus, to prevent the conjunction of the Pannonians and the Marcomanni. But in the mean time Bato the Pannonian laid siege to Sirmium (U); and tho' defeated by Cæcina Severus, governor of Mæsia, had again recruited his army, and obliged Cæcina to quit the field. On the other hand, Bato the Dalmatian laid siege to Salona (W), and tho' wounded in the attack of the place, yet marched at the head of his troops to meet Messalinus, whom Tiberius had detached against him, gave him battle, and put him to the rout. The Roman general being obliged in his retreat to pass through certain defiles, was there unexpectedly shut up, and surrounded on all sides by the enemy. However, he found means to make his escape without losing a man, which Paterculus magnifies as an exploit worthy of a triumph; but Dion Cassius assures us, that Tiberius ascribed it wholly to Bato's generosity, and that he afterwards acknowledged it as a favour, and rewarded him for it. However that be, the two Batos soon after united their forces, and incamping on mount Almus in the neighbourhood of Sirmium, kept that place blocked up, and laid the country to a great distance under contribution. Tiberius detached Rhymetalces, a petty king of Thrace, against them, who gained indeed some advantages over them, but was not able, tho' joined by A. Cæcina governor of Mæsia, at the head of a considerable body of Roman troops, to dislodge them². At length Tiberius, who had hitherto acted only by his lieutenants, marched against them in person; but the enemy, not thinking it adviseable to engage him, upon the news of his approach, abandoned their post, and dividing their numerous forces into several small bodies, retired by different ways into Macedon, committing dreadful ravages in all the countries through which they passed. As winter drew near, Tiberius did not pursue them; but Rhymetalces and his brother Rasipolis, at the head of the Thracian auxiliaries, followed them close, and coming up with them on the confines of Macedon, gave them a great overthrow, and cut many thousand of them in pieces³. These are the exploits of Tiberius in this campaign, which Velleius magnifies and extols more with the partiality of a panegyrist, than the sincerity of an historian^b. As for Germanicus, he did not, it seems, enter Dalmatia this year.

UPON the approach of winter, Tiberius, according to his custom, returned to Rome, where M. Furius Camillus and Sextus Nonius Quinctilianus were soon after raised to the consulate. During their administration, ambassadors came to Rome, both from the Jews and Samaritans, to accuse Archelaus, to whom Augustus had given the half of his father Herod's kingdom under the name of ethnarchy, of male-administration, tyranny, and oppression. Hereupon Archelaus being called to Rome to answer the charge brought against him, and not being able to justify himself before the emperor, he was by him deposed, his goods were confiscated, and he himself banished to Vienna in Gaul, where he ended his days. Archelaus being banished, Augustus appointed Publius Sulpitius Quirinius, who, according to the Greek way of writing that name^c, is by St. Luke called Cyrenius, to be president of Syria, and sent him into the east to seize on the countries over which Archelaus had reigned, that is, Judea, Idumea, and Samaria, and reduce them to a Roman province. Coponius, a Roman knight, was sent with him to take upon him the government of them, with the title of procurator of Judea. These two arriving at Jerusalem, seized all Archelaus's effects and treasures, pursuant to the sentence passed against him by Augustus, and

(U) Sirmium, now Sirmisch, was in former times the metropolis of Pannonia inferior, and the place which the emperors chose for their residence, when the affairs of the empire called them into those parts. Many laws were published at Sirmium by the emperors, which Jacobus Gothofredus has with great pains collected. The emperor Probus was killed in this city, and Theodosius, if we believe Aurelius Victor, first saluted emperor by the Romans who were here in garison. The emperor Decius was born in a village called Budalia, or Bubalia, in the neighbourhood of this city. Pliny places it near the confluence of the Sarve and a river which he calls the Bacuntius (41).

(W) Salona, one of the chief cities of Illyricum, stood on the Adriatic sea, at a small distance from the present city of Spalatro. It became afterwards a Roman colony, as appears from several ancient medals and inscriptions, in which it is called sometimes Colonia Julia, sometimes Colonia Martia, and sometimes Colonia Claudia Augusta. It is mentioned by Lucan in the following verse:

^a and having in great part abolished the Jewish polity, introduced the Roman in its stead. Coponius took on him, in the name of Augustus, the administration, but in subordination to the president of Syria, Judea being made a part of that province. Thus was the power of life and death taken out of the hands of the Jews, and placed wholly in the Roman procurator and his subordinate officers. All taxes were thenceforth paid immediately to the Roman emperor, and the Jews might now say with truth what they were heard to say some years after, We have no king but Cæsar ^a. But what disturbances attended this change of government, we have related at length elsewhere ^e. While Cyrenius or Quirinius was in Judea, he deposed the high-priest Joazar, the son of Boethus, and appointed Annas, the son of Seth, to succeed him in that office, which he held several years ^f.

^b EARLY in the spring, Tiberius and Germanicus took the field, the former against the Pannonians, and the latter against the Dalmatians. We read of no great advantages gained by Tiberius; but Germanicus obliged the Dalmatians to quit the field, and shelter themselves behind the walls of the cities and castles, some of which he besieged and took. We are told, that while he lay before one of their strong-holds, and was ready to abandon the enterprize, on account of the vigorous opposition he met with, a German, by name Pulio, who served under him, taking up a stone of an enormous size, threw it against the wall with such violence, that one of the battlements fell with the shock, and brought down a soldier, who was leaning against it; which struck the garison with such dread, that they abandoned the city, and retired into the citadel, which soon after submitted. While they were thus pressed by Germanicus, a famine, occasioned by the last and this year's ravages, began to rage all over their country, and was attended by various distempers, arising from their feeding on herbs and roots, to which they were not accustomed. In this extremity, Bato, the chief of the Dalmatians, began to think of submitting; and accordingly sent deputies to treat with Tiberius, who received both them and Bato himself, when he appeared before him the next day, in a very obliging manner. The Roman asked him from his tribunal, What had induced him to revolt, and persist so long, and with such obstinacy, in his rebellion against Rome? The Romans, answered Bato with great intrepidity, who, instead of shepherds to protect and defend us, send wolves to devour us. The kind treatment he met with from Tiberius, made such an impression upon his mind, that he was easily prevailed upon to turn his arms against his name-sake and ally, whom he defeated; and inhumanly murdered, having persuaded the garison of a castle, to which the unfortunate Pannonian had fled after the battle, to betray him into his hands. Upon his death, the greater part of the Pannonians submitted; but some still continued in arms, whom Sylvanus was charged to reduce, and left for that purpose in Pannonia, with a considerable body of Romans ^g.

Augustus no sooner heard of the submission of one Bato and the death of the other, than he left Ariminum, and returned to Rome, where great complaints were made to him by the knights, against the law which he had published some years before, concerning unmarried persons and such as had no children. The knights, whose aversion to marriage proceeded from the looseness of their lives, as it generally does, were very pressing with the emperor to get this law abolished. Whereupon Augustus, having assembled the whole body of knights, ordered the married and unmarried persons among them to be placed separately; then, observing the former to be much inferior to the latter in number, he first addressed those who had complied with his law, telling them, that they alone had served the ends both of nature and civil society; that mankind was ordained male and female to prevent mortality; that as the species could not subsist without children, so no commonwealth could be supplied either with men for the wars, or for civil employments. He added, that they alone deserved the name of men and of fathers, and as such he praised them, promising to prefer them to such offices as they might transmit to their offspring. To the others he made a quite different speech, telling them, That he knew not by what name to call them; not by that of men, for they had performed nothing that was manly; not by that of citizens, since the city might perish for them; nor by that of Romans, for they seemed determined to extirpate the Roman race and name; but by what name soever he called them, their crime, he said, equalled all other crimes put together:

for they were guilty of murder in not suffering those to be born, who should proceed from them; of impiety, in abolishing the names and honours of their fathers and ancestors; of sacrilege, in destroying their species and human nature, which owed its original to the gods, and was consecrated to them: that, by leading a single life, they overturned, as far as in them lay, the temples and altars of the gods, dissolved the government by disobeying its laws, betrayed their country by making it barren and waste, and utterly demolished the city by depriving it of inhabitants. He added, that he was well apprised their leading a single life did not proceed from any sentiments of virtue, but from a looseness and wantonness, which ought not to be encouraged nor suffered in any civil government. Having ended his speech, he doubled the rewards and privileges of such as had children, and laid heavy fines on all unmarried persons, allowing them, however, the term of a year, in which space, if they complied with the law, they were to be freed from the penalty. This law obliged all men to marry at a certain age, established great exemptions and privileges to such as had children, and laid heavy fines on all, who, after a certain age, continued single. It was called the Papian-Popæan law, because enacted by the consuls M. Papius Mutilus and Q. Popæus Secundus, to whom the consuls of this year C. Sulpicius Camerinus and C. Poppæus Sabinus had resigned the fasces, after having held them only six months. It was also called the Julian law, as having been published by Augustus's order, who was of the Julian family. For the further encouragement of marriage, Augustus abrogated the Voconian law (X), forbidding married women to receive any legacies above a certain sum; yet, that he might not seem to discourage any thing that had the appearance of virtue, he bestowed upon such women as had vowed perpetual virginity the same rewards and privileges as upon mothers ^a.

DURING these transactions at Rome, the war broke out anew in Dalmatia and Pannonia, Bato, who had submitted the year before, being the ringleader of the revolt, whether upon some new provocation, or merely from the fickleness of his temper, we know not. Germanicus, who had acquired in the last year's war a perfect knowledge of the country, and of the manner of fighting in use among the rebels, was ordered to lead the same legions against them, which he had commanded the year before. He opened the campaign with the siege of Rætium, a strong city in Dalmatia, where he was in imminent danger of perishing, with the greatest part of his army; for the inhabitants having, after a faint resistance, abandoned the town, and retired into the citadel, Germanicus, at the head of his legions, entered the place, with a design to attack the citadel; but while the Romans were busy in planting their machines and ladders, they saw themselves all on a sudden surrounded by flames, the inhabi- ^b ^c ^d

(X) Nothing was more common, before the publication of this law, than for men to give excessive legacies to women, and to leave them by will the whole estate of a wealthy family. One of the laws of the twelve tables empowered all citizens to appoint whomsoever they pleased to be their heirs, without regard to sex or relations. This law was attended with inconveniencies; debauchery was increased by it, and it became more easy to debauch a sex, who are not always deaf to their interest. Besides, it was no uncommon thing to see women, who were by legacies become richer than their husbands, insulting them, and behaving themselves in their families with great haughtiness. To remedy this evil, Q. Voconius, tribune of the people, drew up a new law, which he at last got passed in the comitia. The chief heads of this law were, 1. Every citizen was forbidden to make any woman whatsoever universal legatee, even an only daughter not excepted. 2. A daughter's fortune, after the death of her father, was to be proportioned to his estate, or to be pro rata of what he had left, according to the estimation of prudent men; and generally speaking, the daughter was allowed only one fourth of her father's estate. 3. It was enacted, that all the legacies of the testator should not exceed one half of his estate (43). This testamentary law had been preceded by another, which C. Furius, tribune of the people, had got passed, and which was thence called the Furian law. It forbade, according to Ulpian, Pomponius, and Justinian, any Roman citizen to leave by legacy above the value of one thousand asses to any one person, and at the same time condemned the legatee to pay four times the sum which was given him above what the law stipulated; so that the Voconian law ought to be looked upon as a supplement to this, which was probably grown out of use in the time of Q. Voconius. Cato the censor made a speech in favour of the Voconian law, which he inserted in his book de originibus, and which was in being in Livy's time. There are some fragments of it still extant in Aulus Gellius. Cicero fixes the passing of the Voconian law to the year of Rome 584, when Quintus Marcius Philippus and Cneius Servilius Cæpio were consuls (44). From that time it continued in force to the reign of Augustus, who revoked it in favour of Livia, to whom he was resolved, as Dion Cassius informs us, to devise by will great part of his estate; but that historian speaks so ambiguously of the Voconian law, that he has given the civilians occasion to put different interpretations upon it.

a inhabitants having filled their houses with all sorts of combustible materials before they abandoned them, and appointed some resolute persons to set fire to them when the Romans were entered. The legionaries, to avoid the fire, crowded round the citadel, which stood at some distance from the houses; but, by avoiding one kind of death, they met with another; for the besieged plyed them with such showers of darts, arrows, and stones from the citadel, that the ground was in an instant covered with heaps of dead bodies. In this extremity the Romans attempted to scale the fortrefs; but met with such a vigorous resistance as quite disheartened them. Nothing therefore now remained but to attempt a retreat through the flames, and this they effected, but with great loss, many of them being crushed by the ruins of the b houses, suffocated by the smoke, or destroyed by the fire, which with great violence flamed out of the houses on either side the street through which they passed. In the night the besieged abandoned the fortrefs, which began to take fire, and concealed themselves in the neighbouring woods. Hereupon Germanicus, having waited till both the city and citadel were reduced to ashes, led his legions against Sertium, another city of great importance in the same country, which he invested, and reduced in a short time, tho' Tiberius had in vain attempted the reduction of it the year before. Being encouraged with this success, and no enemy appearing in the field, he divided his army into several bodies, and laying siege to different places at the same time, made himself master of most of their strong-holds. But, in the mean time, Augustus, impatient to see this war ended, ordered Tiberius to march likewise into Dalmatia, and hasten the final reduction of that country. Tiberius, without losing time in besieging and taking cities, went in search of Bato, who had under his command a considerable body of Pannonians and Dalmatians; and having met him in the neighbourhood of Anderium or Andetrium (Y), a strong castle, situated on a steep and inaccessible rock, offered him battle; but Bato declining an engagement, retired into the castle, and posted his troops on the tops of the neighbouring mountains, where he thought the enemy would scarce venture to attack them. Tiberius boldly advanced through the narrow passages among the mountains to the foot of the rock on which Andetrium stood, with a design to besiege it; but was greatly alarmed, when he saw himself all on a sudden surrounded by the enemy, who, descending from the mountains, had seized on the defiles, and by that means cut off his retreat. He expected to find at Andetrium the Caudine Forks; and truly he must have inevitably perished with his whole army, had the Dalmatians shewed as much bravery and resolution as the Samnites did on the like occasion; but while Tiberius gave all up for lost, as not being able either to retire or advance, the cowardly Dalmatians, seized with a panic, abandoned their posts, and, retreating in disorder to the tops of their mountains, left all the avenues open to the Roman general, who thereupon advancing without opposition to the foot of the rock on which the castle stood, summoned it to surrender. Bato, finding he could not depend upon his men, hearkened to the offers made him, and leaving the castle in the night, delivered himself up to Tiberius, who received him with great demonstrations of kindness, and allowed him to retire to what part of the world he pleased, after he had solemnly promised never to bear arms against the Romans. But the garison of Andetrium still held out, and the place was not taken but after repeated assaults, in which great numbers of the Romans lost their lives. At length they capitulated, and surrendered upon honourable terms, which Tiberius religiously observedⁱ. At the same time, Germanicus made himself master of Arduba, a town no-ways inferior in strength to Andetrium, and defended by as numerous a garison; but the reduction of that important place was more owing

(Y) This city is called by Ptolemy Andecrium, by Dion Cassius Anderium, but that its true name was Andetrium, is manifest from the following inscription to be seen in Spon:

Pliny likewise calls it Andecrium (46); but Strabo, which rendered it almost inaccessible (47). It is now known by the name of Cliffa (48). It stood on a steep rock, and was surrounded on all sides by deep vallies and torrents, to the disagreement which reigned among the inhabitants, than to the valour of the Romans; for the greater part of the citizens being for surrendering and submitting to the yoke, the women, more fond of their ancient laws and liberties than the men, joined some Roman deserters, and falling upon their husbands, made a great slaughter of them. But the men prevailing at length submitted, and the unhappy women, disdaining to outlive the loss of their liberty, either threw themselves headlong from the walls, or setting fire to their houses, consumed themselves and their children in the flames. After this the two Roman generals uniting their forces, overran all Dalmatia and Pannonia, restoring every-where peace and tranquillity, and obliging the inhabitants to deliver up their arms, and return to their former employments. The war being thus ended, to the great satisfaction of Augustus, Tiberius and Germanicus returned to Rome, where they were decreed triumphal honours, and two triumphal arches, which by a decree of the senate were to be erected in Pannonia, and adorned with magnificent trophies. The title of emperor was conferred on Augustus, and Germanicus was allowed to stand for the consulate before he attained the age required in other candidates. and to vote in the senate before the senators of consular dignity. As for Tiberius, it was decreed, that his son Drusus, though he had no share in the war, should be admitted into the senate, and deliver his opinion, after he had executed the office of quæstor, before those who had been prætors. The lieutenants both of Tiberius and Germanicus were rewarded with prætorian honours, that is, were allowed all those honours and privileges which those enjoyed who had been prætors^k.

BUT the joy, which the total reduction of Pannonia and Dalmatia occasioned in Rome, was allayed and changed into the deepest melancholy by the dismal news of the intire defeat of Quintilius Varus by the Germans under the conduct of Arminius, which was brought to Rome five days after the arrival of Germanicus and Tiberius. Quintilius Varus was born, as Velleius Paterculus expresses it, rather of an illustrious than a noble family, had governed Syria, and been removed from thence into Germany to keep those countries in awe, which had been lately subdued by the Romans. When he first entered Syria, he found that province rich, says Velleius, and was himself poor; but when he came away, he was rich, and the province poor. In Germany he pursued the same methods of filling his coffers as in Syria, loading the people with heavy taxes, and selling without distinction to the natives those employments which his predecessors used freely to bestow on such as were nobly born, or had signalized their attachment to the Romans. The Germans before the arrival of Varus had begun to bear the yoke with less reluctance; they had quitted their forests, built some cities, where they lived in a sociable manner, under the protection of the Roman laws, and, forgetting their native savageness, had for some time applied themselves to the peaceable arts of husbandry. But the extortions and rapines of the new governor revived in that warlike nation their ancient love of liberty, estranged their minds from Rome, and inspired them with an eager desire of shaking off a yoke which they could no longer bear. Among the Germans was a young nobleman of extraordinary parts, of uncommon penetration, and great valour, named Arminius. He was the son of Sigismer, one of the most powerful lords of the Catti, had served with great reputation in the Roman armies, and been honoured by Augustus with the privileges of a Roman citizen and the title of knight. But the love he had for his country getting the better of his gratitude, he resolved to improve the general discontent which reigned in the nation, to the advantage of his countrymen, and deliver them from the bondage of a foreign yoke. With this view he engaged underhand, by means of his friends and emissaries, in a conspiracy against the Romans, the chief lords and leading men of all the nations between the Rhine and the Elb; and then, to draw Varus from the neighbourhood of the former river, where he might with great ease and quickness receive succours from Gaul, he suggested to him the necessity of shewing himself to the inhabitants of the more distant provinces, of administering justice among them, and accustoming them by his example to live after the Roman manner, which, he said, would more effectually render them obedient to Rome, than the Roman sword. As Varus was a man of a peaceable temper, indolent, and a great lover of his ease, he readily came into the proposal of the crafty Arminius, and, quitting the neighbourhood of the Rhine, marched into the country of the Cherusci. There he made it his whole business to civilize the barbarians, by introducing a introducing among them the Roman laws and manners. He was continually employed in hearing causes, and deciding civil controversies; inasmuch, that his tent looked more like the tribunal of a prætor, than the prætorium of a general. And indeed this was a more suitable employment to the genius of Varus, than military expeditions; not that he wanted courage, but because he loved his ease, and thought he could better tame the barbarians by acting the law-giver than the general. In the mean time, the conspiracy being ripe for execution, and the Germans ready to rise upon the first notice, Arminius, under pretence of clearing the high-ways of robbers, and keeping some places in awe, as if they designed to revolt, persuaded Varus to send out several detachments, by which means his army being weakened, some distant

b nations in Germany rose up in arms, by Arminius's directions, while those, through which he was to pass in marching against them, pretended to be in a state of profound tranquility, and ready to join the Romans against their rebellious countrymen. Varus upon the first news of the revolt, marched with three legions, a considerable body of horse, and six cohorts, to reduce the rebels, being attended by Arminius and his father Sigimer, who taking upon them to be his guides, led him into a thick forest, surrounded on all sides with steep hills and marshy grounds. There while the legionaries were busy in cutting down trees to open themselves a passage through the forest, and no-ways upon their guard, as not suspecting any treachery, a great body of Germans appeared unexpectedly, and discharging upon them a shower of c darts, killed a great number of them, before they could rally and put themselves in a posture of defence. However, they formed themselves at last in order of battle, so far as the ground would allow; but a heavy rain falling, which rendered their arms almost quite useless, and the barbarians pouring in upon them hourly in vast crowds, they attempted to retire to a neighbouring valley; but finding all the avenues beset with numerous bodies of the enemy, they were forced to continue all that night, and the next day, exposed to the darts and arrows which the barbarians incessantly showered upon them. In this extremity Varus, giving up all for lost, and being dangerously wounded, put an end to his life with his own sword, following therein the example of

d his father and grandfather, who had both fallen by their own hands, the former after the battle of Philippi, and the latter after that of Pharsalia, or, as some writers will have it, after the defeat of Domitius in Africa. Most of the chief officers scorning to outlive their general, or to be made prisoners by the barbarians, laid violent hands on themselves. The greatest part of the cavalry opened themselves a way through the enemy sword in hand, and made their escape; with them Vala Numonius, one of Varus's lieutenants, abandoning the foot, which he commanded, arrived safe at the Rhine, where he soon after perished as a deserter, but of what kind of death our author has not thought fit to acquaint us. Cesonius, another of Varus's lieutenants, after the retreat of the cavalry, and the death of Varus and most of the other officers, was for surrendering at discretion. But this motion cost him dear; for he

e was immediately tried as a coward by the surviving officers, sentenced to death, and executed; to such a degree were cowards abhorred in the Roman armies. And now a very small number of the legionaries, and scarce any officers, being left alive, the enemy abandoned them as it grew dark, and fell upon the baggage. In the mean time, the Roman trumpets sounding, probably to call those together who were dispersed up and down the forest, the barbarians imagined, that Asprenas, who was quartered at a small distance from that neighbourhood, was come to the assistance of his countrymen; and therefore after having plundered the baggage, they retired in the night, and gave the few legionaries, who outlived that fatal day, an opportunity of saving themselves by flight. Thus were three complete legions and six cohorts almost

f intirely cut off, the greatest overthrow, if Velleius is to be credited, the Romans had received ever since the defeat of Crassus by the *Parthians*¹. The legions that perished on this occasion were the best of the whole empire for valour, discipline, and experience; so that the news of this loss threw the city into the utmost consternation, there being few families there that had not a share in the common misfortune. As for Augustus, he set no bounds to his grief, but upon the first news of so dreadful and unexpected an overthrow, he tore his garment, and, like one beside himself, knocked his head against the wall, crying out, Restore the legions, Varus. This he was observed to do in the transports of his grief for several months, letting in the mean time his hair hair and beard grow, and abandoning himself intirely to grief and sorrow. However, he did not forget to provide with all possible care for the safety of Rome and Italy: he placed guards in all the quarters of the city, to prevent tumults and disturbances; he raised new levies, obliging all the Roman youth, who were able to bear arms, to list themselves, confiscating the estates of such as refused to give in their names, and even threatening the most refractory with death: he vowed the great games to Jupiter, as had been formerly done in the wars with the Marfi and Cimbri: in short, Augustus never forgot this fatal day, but observed it the remaining part of his life as a day of mourning. Some time after the news of this misfortune had reached Rome, the head of Quintilius Varus was sent to Augustus by Maroboduus king of the Marcomanni; but what induced him to make that present to the emperor, history does not inform us. From his having the head of the deceased general, it was concluded at Rome, that he had contributed to his destruction. However that be, the emperor, though he had great reason to be displeased with Varus, received his remains with great respect, and caused them to be honourably interred in the tomb of his ancestors^m. Dion tells us, that when news of this defeat was first brought to Rome, no-body doubted there, but the Germans after so complete a victory would pass the Rhine, and invade at the same time Gaul and Italy; but that the fear and consternation which had seized the city were much abated, when they understood, that Lucius Asprenas, nephew to Varus, guarded the banks of the Rhine, and that the barbarians, satisfied with the advantages they had gained, neglected to improve them. However, as the emperor ascribed this fatal overthrow to the anger of the gods, and gave credit to several pretended prodigies (Z), which were related to him, his fears were not quite removed till the ensuing year, when Tiberius, after the election of the new consuls, P. Cornelius Dolabella and C. Junius Silanus, leaving Rome, passed the Alps, and entering Germany, obliged the rebels, though elated with their late success, to retire from the neighbourhood of the Rhine, and lay aside all thoughts of raising disturbances in Gaul. Velleius Paterculus tell us, that he overran great part of the country, that he forced Arminius to fly before him, that he penetrated into the countries of the Catti and Cherusci, which he laid waste with fire and sword, and in short, that he fully revenged the death of Varus, and the slaughter of his legionsⁿ. But whatever that biassed historian may write in commendation of Tiberius, Dion Cassius assures us, that he never attempted to bring back to their duty any of the revolted nations, but kept his troops in the neighbourhood of the Rhine, not daring to stir from that river for fear of some surprize. In the latter end of the year, he celebrated the birth-day of Augustus in his camp with public games, and then returned to Rome^o.

THIS year the ingenious and celebrated poet Ovid was banished to Tomos (A), for seeing some lewd and scandalous action of Augustus, who had not even in his old age renounced

(Z) The temple of Mars was struck with lightning: a swarm of grasshoppers appeared over the city, and were dispersed by the swallows: great rocks fell from the top of the Alps, and fire was seen to issue out of the ground in various places: a statue of Victory on the confines of Germany, with its face towards that country, changed its posture, and turned its face towards Italy. These pretended prodigies gave the old emperor great uneasiness, which was not removed till the next year, when Tiberius entered Germany at the head of a numerous army.

(A) Tomos, Tomi, or Tomis, stood on the Euxine sea, and was the metropolis of Lower Mæsia: for Mæsia extended from the confluence of the Save and the Danube to the Euxine sea, being bounded to the south by the mountains of Dalmatia, and to the north by mount Hæmus; and was divided into the Upper and Lower Mæsia; the former contained all the country that lies between the Ciabus, now the Moravia, and the conflux of the Danube and the Save, and the latter the rest of the country to the Euxine sea; so that the Upper Mæsia comprehended part of Bosnia and Serbia, and the Lower Bulgaria. The ancients comprised under the name of Pontus that part of Lower Mæsia which bordered on the Pontus Euxinus; and hence the city of Tomi is by them called a city of Pontus, though it did not belong to the kingdom of Pontus properly so called, which we have elsewhere described at length (49). The ancient city of Tomos is at present, according to Niger, called Constantia; according to Cælius Calcagnius, Tomiswar; according to Giosanius, Kiow or Kiovia, there being in the neighbourhood of this last city a lake called by the inhabitants Ovidiue jezero, that is, Ovid's lake. Whence it was called Tomos, is well known from the following distich out of Ovid:

a renounced the vices of his youth. That this was the true cause of his disgrace and misfortune, the poet himself tells us in express terms: Why did I see, says he, what I ought not to have seen? Why did I make my eyes criminal?? (B) Fear restrained him, as is evident, from explaining himself any farther, and letting his readers into the particulars of this mystery (C). The pretence Augustus made use of for banishing him was, the poisonous books he had wrote of the art of love, whence Sidonius Apollinaris and others ascribe his disgrace to the lewdness of his muse, as he does himself in several places of his works out of complaisance to Augustus, and to prevent any farther inquiries. But it is very certain, that he was in high favour with Augustus long after he had published his books of love; for which we cannot persuade ourselves, that the emperor would have inflicted so severe a punishment on the poet, after
b he had written himself verses of that nature, some of which have reached our times, and are more scandalous than any we read in Ovid. As for Julia, Augustus's daughter, she had been many years in banishment before Ovid's misfortune, and all the accomplices of her debaucheries punished with the utmost severity. But whatever was the true cause of his disgrace and banishment, he was confined to an inhospitable climate, and there lived, or rather pined, to the hour of his death, without ever being able to prevail upon the emperor, either by his friends, or his affecting letters, to mitigate the rigour of the first sentence by removing him to a more friendly climate (D).

P OVID. Trist. l. ii. ad August.

(B) His words are ;

Cur imprudenti cognita culpa mihi?*

(C) Augustus, though stricken in years, had not yet renounced the vices of his youth, but carried on an amour with a lady of great distinction, whose name has not been transmitted to us. The lady's husband, either out of fear or complaisance, pretended for a long time to be quite unacquainted with the whole affair; but at length the scandal becoming publick, he grew very uneasy, and imparted his concern, and the cause of it, to one Athenodorus, who had been preceptor to Tiberius, and was in great favour with Augustus. Not long after Augustus sent a covered litter for the lady, and Athenodorus, who happened to be with the husband when the messenger arrived, in order to deter Augustus from such scandalous practices, and warn him of the danger, to which they exposed him, disguised himself in the lady's dress, and covering his face, placed himself in the litter, and was conveyed in that attire to the emperor's apartment, who was no less frightened than surprized to see, instead of the lady, whom he impatiently expected, a man with a drawn sword in his hand start out of the litter; but Athenodorus, discovering himself in that instant, You see, said he, to what dangers your unseasonable passion exposes you; an enemy instead of a friend might have laid hold of this opportunity to deprive the republic of so gracious a prince. Augustus took his advice in good part, and returned him thanks; but whether he reformed his conduct we know not (51). Some writers conjecture, that to this adventure was owing Ovid's misfortune, who, as he had free access to the emperor, might have been an eye-witness of his fright and surprize; a conjecture which we dare neither warrant or reject.

(D) Ovid was born in the consulship of Hirtius and Pansa, as he himself attests, and consequently was fifty complete when he was banished. This he designed to tell us in the following lines:

Abstulerat decies præmia victor æges;
Cum maris Euxini positos ad litora Tantis
Quærere me læsæ principis ira jubes.* (52)

That is, as he expresses himself better in his book, In Iben, which he wrote on his first going to Tenens against his accusers;

Tempus ad hoc lustris mihi jam bis quinque peractis.

For by no small mistake he frequently confounds the olympiads, which contained the space of four years, with the Roman lustra, containing the space of five. Had he lived but ten olympiads, he had been only forty, but ten lustra make him fifty. In his third book Tristium, he tells us, that he had passed his first winter in Pontus, that is, the first year of his banishment; for he had spent the former winter in his journey:

Longior antiquis celsa libenti lustris
Imposuamque sibi quæ non bene vertitur hæc, Tempora nocturnis æquæ thærea jactis.*

In the fifth book he speaks of the second year of his banishment:

Discessit tunc præteritæ vix ante patris.* (53)

Fecit et Euxini hæc ante patris.* (54)

In his first book of Pontus he takes notice of the fourth winter he lived in exile in the following lines:

Cæquæ me jactis, quæque fatigant hæc.* (55)

The fifth elegy of the fourth book of Pontus is addressed to Lucius Pungentius, who with Lucius Aspilius was consul the year Augustus died, and in the first of the same book, ascribed to Brutus, he mentions the death of Augustus, and also of Fabius Maximus, who died, as is plain from Varro (56), in the last year of Tiberius's reign, at which time the

Several laws

THE next year, M. Æmilius Lepidus and T. Statilius Taurus being consuls, Augustus published an edict, forbidding all augurs, astrologers, and fortune-tellers, to utter, either in private or in public, predictions concerning the death of any person whatsoever; not that he was under any apprehension himself, says our historian, for he had caused his nativity to be calculated, and publicly exposed, but on account of the disturbances which these impostors had occasioned in some noble families. He likewise revived the edict forbidding any of the equestrian order to fight in the arena, threatening such as should dare to transgress it, with infamy, the confiscation of their estates, and death itself. He extended his care to the distant provinces, ordering, that no publick honours should be bestowed on the governors sent thither, during the time of their administration, nor within sixty days after their departure. The haughty and imperious airs which some proconsuls and proprætors had assumed, gave rise to this edict, the emperor judging that the extraordinary honours, which were often conferred upon them, inspired them with pride, and made them look upon those, over whom they were placed, with an eye of contempt. As there were this year sixteen persons of distinction who stood for the prætorship, Augustus, unwilling to disgust any of the candidates, named them all to that dignity, but the next year reduced their number again to twelve. He raised Drusus, the son of Tiberius by his first wife Vipsania Agrippina, to the quæstorship, though he had not yet attained the age required for the discharge of that employment, and named Germanicus consul for the ensuing year ^p. After this he sent both Tiberius and Germanicus into Germany at the head of two very numerous armies, but, during the whole campaign, they did nothing which historians have thought worth recording: they passed the summer on, or near, the banks of the Rhine, contenting themselves to keep the Germans in awe at a distance, and to prevent them from invading Gaul. About the middle of the autumn, they repassed the Alps, and returned to the capital, without having so much as attempted the reduction of the provinces, which had shaken off the yoke, and brought so dreadful a calamity upon Rome. Upon their return Augustus honoured Tiberius, for what exploits we know not, with a triumph, which he had formerly refused him, when he had a far better claim to it ^q.

Tiberius and Germanicus sent into Germany.

Is assumed by Augustus for his colleague in the sovereign power.

AND now Augustus, not being able, on account of his great age, to bear the whole burden of public affairs, assumed Tiberius, we may say, for his colleague in the sovereign power, investing him with a far more ample and extensive authority, than he had ever granted to his son-in-law and faithful minister Agrippa. The decree which the conscript fathers passed, at the emperor's request, in favour of Tiberius, was couched in the following terms: At the request of the people of Rome we grant to Caius Julius Cæsar Tiberius the same authority over the provinces, and all the armies of the Roman state, which Augustus has held, which he still retains, and which we pray the gods he may long enjoy ^r. This decree, which put Tiberius, in a manner, upon the level with Augustus, was proposed, according to Suetonius, by the consuls ^s, no doubt at the request, or rather by the command, of Augustus. The next year, Germanicus Cæsar and Fonteius Capito being consuls, Augustus, by a special edict, declared the authors of all lampoons, and satirical writings, attacking or blackening the reputation of any person whatsoever, guilty of high treason, and punishable with death. In the times of the poet had passed the fifth year of his banishment, and was then in the sixth, as appears from the following verses;

Jam tempus lustrî transit in alterius.*

The sixth year he mentions also in the beginning of the tenth elegy to Albinovanus;

Littore, pellitos inter agenda Getas.*

And in the thirteenth to Carus:

Sexta relegatum bruma sub axe videt.*

In the same elegy he speaks of a poem, written by him on the apotheosis of Augustus in the language of the Getæ;

*Ab! pudet, & Getico scripsi sermone libellum, Struellaque sunt nostris barbara verba modis.
Et placui, gratare mihi, cæpique poetæ
Inter inhumanos nomen habere Getas.*

He died in the seventh, or, as others will have it, in the eighth, year of his banishment, and was buried near the city of Tomos (58).

of the republic actions indeed were punished; says Tacitus, but words were free; Augustus was the first who brought libels under the penalties of the law of majesty, Libels brought or of treason^t. By the same edict, the ædiles in the city, and the governors in the colonies and municipia were strictly enjoined to make a diligent search after all libels under the laws of majesty, and lampoons, to commit them to the flames; and to proceed with the utmost rigor against the authors of them. This put a stop to the liberty or rather licentiousness of the libellers, but was attended by most dreadful consequences under the succeeding emperors, who abused this wrested law to the destruction of many innocent persons, whom on other accounts they disliked. Towards the end of this year, Augustus wrote two letters, one to the senate, recommending Germanicus to the conscript fathers, Augustus recommends the senate to Tiberius, and Germanicus, to the senate and another to Tiberius, recommending the senate to him, which was generally looked upon as an open declaration on the part of Augustus, that he designed to leave the same authority to Tiberius over the senate, which he himself had enjoyed, but would have all others, those of his own family not accepted, to pay an intire obedience to that venerable body. In his letter to the senate he begged the fathers not to be at the trouble for the future of waiting upon him, according to their custom, at his house, adding, that he hoped they would dispense with him for not attending in the senate-house as formerly, such an attendance being very inconvenient to him by reason of his age; he desired they would appoint him twenty counsellors out of their body, with whom he might advise in matters of importance relating to the state; the senate readily granted him his request, and moreover decreed, that whatever he should resolve upon with the twenty senators assigned him, the consuls for the year, the consuls elect, and his adopted son and nephew, should have the same force as if voted and passed in the senate^u. The following year, when C. Silius and L. Munacius Plancus were consuls, the fourth term of his ten years being near ended, he accepted, though much against his will, says Dion Cassius, of the government of the republic for ten years longer; and at the same time renewed the tribunitial power in favour of Tiberius for the like space of years^w. As for Drusus, the son of Tiberius, he empowered him to stand for the consulate after two years, though he had not yet discharged the office of prætor; but as both he and Germanicus had places in the senate, and it was natural to suppose that their sentiments were those of Augustus, which none of the conscript fathers would dare to contradict, he ordered them not to vote, or any ways declare their opinion, in such matters as were debated by the conscript fathers. Augustus having thus settled matters at home, and made his will, which he delivered to the vestal virgins, resolved once more to attempt the reduction of Germany, and the revenging of the death of Varus, and the loss of his legions. With this view he raised two numerous armies, the one to be commanded by Tiberius, and the other by Germanicus. The latter was ordered to march this very year into Gaul, and from thence to invade the countries, which at the instigation of Arminius had withdrawn their obedience to Rome. As for Tiberius, he was appointed to lead his army into Illyricum, and penetrate on that side into the kingdom of Maroboduus, which the Romans had not yet subdued. Augustus however kept him at Rome all this, and part of the following year, when Sextus Pompeius and Sextus Apuleius were raised to the consulate: the former was grandson to the famous Sextus Pompeius, whose war with Augustus we have described in this volume: his colleague Apuleius was one of Augustus's chief favourites, and is said to have prevailed upon him to change the sentence of death, which he first pronounced against Ovid, into that of perpetual banishment. During their administration, Augustus, taking Tiberius for his colleague in the censorship, made a third census, by which it appeared, that the number of the Roman people amounted to four millions one hundred and thirty-seven thousand, counting women and children as well as men^x. Eusebius makes the number of Roman citizens amount to 9370000, counting probably those who lived both at Rome, and in the provinces^y. While the ceremony was performing in the field of Mars, an eagle was observed to fly several times round Augustus, and then light on a neighbouring temple over the first letter of Agrippa's name. This was looked upon not only by the multitude, but by Augustus himself, as an omen of his approaching end. He therefore ordered his colleague Tiberius to make the vows which were usual at the time of the census, for the safety of the Roman state, and the prosperity of the citizens, saying, that he would not make vows which he should not live to perform^z. He was confirmed

firm'd in this opinion by several other prodigies : the first letter of his name in an inscription on the pedestal of one of his statues was struck off with lightning, and the soothsayers, who were consulted on that occasion, declared, that he had only a hundred days to live, the letter C standing for that number among the Latins ; they added, that after his death he would be ranked among the gods, the word Cæsar, which was the remaining part of his name, signifying a god in the Hetruscan language. To these two omens Dion Cassius adds a third, which in his opinion plainly presaged his imminent death. It had been customary ever since the death of Julius Cæsar, to place his chair with a crown upon it at the public sports. In this chair Augustus used to sit, when he assisted at the shews ; but it happening to be empty while the sports were exhibiting this year in honour of Augustus, a fool placed himself in it, and taking up the crown, put it upon his head ; and hence it was concluded, that the sovereign power, signified by the crown, would soon pass into other hands^b. In the mean time, Augustus wrote a short account of the chief actions of his life, which he caused to be engraved on brass, and placed over his tomb^c. Great part of this valuable monument has been transmitted to us in the Marmor Ancyranum, and is to be seen in the inscriptions of the learned Gruter^d.

As Augustus visibly declined every day both in his health and strength, so that no body could doubt but his end was at hand, some few there were who began to talk of restoring the republic to its former liberty ; but far the greater part, dreading a civil war, were for tamely submitting to the person, whom Augustus should think fit to place over them. All the zealous republicans had been slain in the battles of Philippi and Actium ; their posterity had been long inured to the yoke, there being scarce any living now who had beheld the old free state, and as for the Roman people, they were become a mere mob, addicted to idleness, void of all sentiments of honour or virtue, without any traces of the ancient Roman spirit, or any attachment to the virtuous institutions of their ancestors. The zealous republicans therefore, who were very few, despairing of success, and laying aside all hopes of ever seeing the ancient free state restored, resolved to submit to the heir and successor whom Augustus should name, and bear with patience the evils which it was not in their power to prevent or redress^e.

AND now it being high time for Tiberius to leave Rome, and set out for Illyricum, Augustus, to the great surprize of the whole city, declared his intention of accompanying him as far as Beneventum, and pursuing his journey from thence to Naples in Campania, in order to assist at the solemn sports which were to be exhibited there on his approaching birth-day. As he found his strength decaying apace, he promised himself no small benefit from the wholesome air of Campania, especially of Naples, whither many Romans used to resort, even in those days, for the recovery of their health ; and this was, as is supposed, the true motive of this sudden and unexpected resolution, though he did not think fit to own it. He performed the journey with uncommon chearfulness and alacrity, being attended by his beloved Livia, who, as we may well imagine, was very assiduous about him in so critical a juncture. At Beneventum he parted with Tiberius, and pursued his journey to Naples, where he was received with all possible demonstrations of joy. After he had spent some time at Naples very agreeably, and assisted there at the public sports, he was seized with a diarrhoea, a dangerous distemper in a person of his years. He therefore resolved, before his strength failed him, to return to Rome, and accordingly, leaving Naples, set out for his capital ; but his illness increasing in spite of all the remedies prescribed him by the physicians who attended him, he was obliged to stop at Nola in Campania, and there betake himself to his bed. In the mean time, Livia, well apprised that his end was at hand, dispatched messenger after messenger to Tiberius, acquainting him with the state of the emperor's health, and pressing him to return with all possible expedition. Tiberius, upon the receipt of his mother's letters, immediately left Illyricum, and flew to Nola, not with any private views, says Velleius, but merely out of the great tenderness and filial affection he had for Augustus, whom he found alive, if that author is to be credited, and had long conferences with him ; in one of which, the dying emperor, after having publicly declared him his successor in the sovereign power, desired him to maintain all his acts in their full vigor, and to pursue the same methods of governments which he had used^f. But Tacitus tells us, that a that it was never well known, whether Tiberius on his arrival at Nola found the emperor dead, or still alive, Livia having carefully beset the palace, and all the avenues to it, with detachments of the guards, and given out from time to time good news of the emperor's recovery. He adds, that when she had taken all necessary measures in so nice a juncture, in one and the same moment were published the death of Augustus, and accession of Tiberius ^g. But to return to Augustus; finding his end approaching, he looked death in the face with greater intrepidity than was expected from one who had ever carefully avoided it in the field. He discoursed very cheerfully with his intimate friends and chief favourites, giving them many wise and useful instructions relating to the management of their private affairs, and those of the public. In speaking of his own actions, he told them, that he had found Rome of brick, but left it of marble, alluding by this expression, says Dion Cassius, not so much to the beauty and stateliness of the buildings, as to the majesty, grandeur, and firmness of the empire. And now finding his strength quite failed him, he called for a looking-glass, and having caused his hair to be set in order, and his wrinkled cheeks to be smoothed, as was customary among the stage-players, he asked his friends with a languishing voice, Whether he had acted his part well? and they answering, he had; Then clap me, said he, for I have ended my part. After this fixing his eyes on Livia, who held him in her arms, he desired her to remember their marriage, and the ties which had kept their hearts so long united, and then quietly expired ^h. Thus died the celebrated Augustus on the nineteenth of August, which month was so named from him, the same day on which he had entered upon his first consulship. He had lived seventy-five years, ten months, and twenty-six days, and reigned from his first consulship fifty-six years, but from the battle of Actium only forty-three. Tacitus and Dion Cassius observe one very remarkable circumstance of his death; for he died in the same town, as these two writers tell us, in the same house, and in the same chamber, where his father Octavius died ⁱ. Livia was suspected of having hastened the emperor's death, fearing he might be reconciled on his return to Rome with his grandson Agrippa Posthumus, whom he had privately visited some months before, sailing over to the island of Planasia with Fabius Maximus alone, without the privity of Livia, Tiberius, or any other of his most faithful and trusty favourites. This Fabius disclosed to his wife Martia, and she to Livia, and thence the emperor knew that the secret was betrayed; which so provoked him against Fabius, that he banished him his presence for ever, bidding him, when he came to wait upon him the next morning, an eternal farewell. Fabius did not long survive his disgrace; but soon after laid violent hands on himself ^k. We are told, that in the interview between Augustus and his grandson Agrippa many tears were shed on both sides, and many tokens of mutual tenderness shewn, which gave the unhappy youth hopes of being restored to his own place in his grandfather's family. This Livia dreaded, and in order to prevent it, hastened her husband's death, as some authors write, with poisoned figs ^l. The body of the deceased emperor was carried from Nola to Bovillæ in the neighbourhood of Rome on the shoulders of the chief magistrates of the colonies and municipal towns on the road. At Bovillæ it was received by the Roman knights, and by them conveyed to Rome, and exposed in the porch of the imperial palace on mount Palatine. Tiberius, in virtue of the tribunitial power with which he was invested, appointed the senate to meet the next day, but would suffer no other business to be transacted, except what related to the funeral of his deceased father. In the first place, his last will was brought in by the vestal virgins, and read aloud by Polybius one of Augustus's freedmen. It began thus: Since the gods have been pleased to deprive me of my grand children Caius and Lucius, I declare Tiberius my heir, &c. (E). By the same will Tiberius and Livia

(E) From this preamble it is manifest, that Augustus would never have adopted Tiberius, or appointed him his successor, had those two young princes, or either of them, lived. Some writers tell us, that Augustus was well acquainted with the bad qualities and tyrannical temper of Tiberius, and that on his death-bed he could not help pitying the Roman people, who, to use the expressions ascribed to him, Were to be under so slow a pair of grinders; Miserrum populum Romanum, qui sub tam lentis maxillis erit. What then prompted him to adopt for his son, and name for his successor one whom he knew to be no ways qualified for so great a charge? To this question some writers answer, that the promotion of Tiberius was intirely owing to his mother Livia, who had gained an absolute ascendant over Augustus;

Livia were appointed his first heirs, his grand-children, and their children, his second, and the great men of Rome his third heirs: Livia was adopted into the Julian family, and honoured with the title of Augusta. As for the great men of Rome, Tacitus tells us, that he hated them, but nevertheless named them out of vanity. To the Roman people he left by way of legacy four hundred thousand great sesterces; to the populace thirty-five thousand; to every common soldier of the prætorian guards a thousand small sesterces; and to every soldier of the Roman legions three hundred. His last will being read, Drusus produced to the conscript fathers four small books wrote by the deceased emperor; the first of which contained regulations relating to the ceremony of his obsequies; the second was a journal of the most memorable actions of his life, which by his last will he ordered to be engraved on the pillars of brass, which supported the frontispiece of his stately mausoleum. Great part of this journal has been preserved in an ancient marble found about a hundred and fifty years since in the city of Ancyra^m. The third book contained a summary of the strength and income of the empire, the number of the Romans and auxiliaries in pay, the condition of the navy, of the several kingdoms paying tribute, and of the various provinces and their revenues, with the state of the treasury, the expences of the empire, and the demands upon the public. This register, as we may call it, was all writ with Augustus's own hand. The fourth book was a collection of instructions for the use of Tiberius, and the other governors and magistrates of the republic, whom he advised to lay aside all thoughts of extending the limits of the empire by new conquestsⁿ. But whether this advice was dictated by his love for the public, says Tacitus, or by envy and jealousy of the glory of his successors, is uncertain^o. The funeral honours were next considered, when Afinius Gallus moved, that the funeral should pass through the triumphal gate; Lucius Arruntius, that the titles of all the laws he had made, and the names of all the nations he had conquered, should be carried before the corps; some were of opinion, that on the day of his funeral all the magistrates and knights should in token of their grief wear iron rings instead of their gold ones, and that, to eternalize his memory, not only the month Sextilis, but the whole time he had lived, should bear his name, and be stiled Seculum Augustum, that is, the age of Augustus. Valerius Messala, departing from the matter in question, added, that the oath of allegiance to Tiberius should be renewed every year. Tiberius, surpris'd at this unexpected proposal, asked him, whether he had made that motion at his instigation! I spoke it, answered Messala with a new turn of flattery, as my own opinion,

Augustus, especially in his old age: others say, that he was acted therein by a secret ambition of making his death more regretted by the badness of his successor. But Suetonius cannot persuade himself, that a prince of Augustus's sagacity and prudence could proceed upon motives of this nature, in an affair of so great importance; he is rather inclined to believe, that having weighed both his vices and virtues, he thought the latter overbalanced the former; and hence, when he adopted him, he solemnly declared upon oath, that he was prompted thereunto by no other motive but that of the public welfare, and often commended him in his letters not only as an excellent commander, but as the only stay and support of the Roman people. Out of these letters Suetonius instances some of his expressions: Farewel, says he, in one of them, my dear Tiberius; may you be happy in your enterprizes, fighting, as you do for me and the muses: may I be happy, as you are a most valiant and accomplished commander. Farewel, take care of your summer-quarters; as for my own part, my dear Tiberius, I confidently believe, that amongst so many difficulties and disorders, in the midst of so much remissness and cowardice in the army, no man could have behaved with more prudence than you have done; insomuch, that all those, who have had the honour of attending you, do unanimously acknow- ledge, that this verse cannot more properly be applied to any man living, than to yourself:

Unus homo nobis vigilando restituit rem.

And in another letter; Whether I seriously consider of an affair, or any thing falls out which I ought to resent, I want my Tiberius immediately, and this jaying comes constantly into my mind, By this man's conduct and prudence we might both escape even out of the fire. As often as I am told how much you are fallen away by your indefatigable labour, may I perish if I do not tremble to hear it. Let me desire you therefore to have more care of yourself for the future, lest the first news of your sickness be the death of your mother and me, and the people of Rome be in great danger of losing their empire. I do not value my own health, unless you be well too. I beg the gods to preserve you for our good, if they bear no prejudice or grudge to the Roman people (59). From these letters it plainly appears, that Augustus had a real value and sincere affection for Tiberius, that he looked upon him as the only person capable of supporting with dignity the title of emperor, and consequently that it was not out of complaisance to Livia, nor a secret ambition of enhancing his own reputation with posterity by the badness of his successor that he chose him.

a nor will I ever be controuled by any man in things which concern the welfare of the public, let who will be provoked at my freedom ^p. The senators at length all agreed to carry the body of the deceased emperor to the funeral pile on their shoulders; but this Tiberius would not suffer; nay, he cautioned the people by an edict to refrain their zeal, and not to insist upon having his body burnt, as Julius Cæsar's had been, rather in the forum, than in the field of Mars, which was the place appointed. However, his funeral was performed with the greatest pomp and magnificence, that had ever been seen in Rome. Drusus read from the rostra a short elogium of the deceased emperor, and Tiberius pronounced his funeral oration in the forum, which was received with the applause it well deserved, it being a master-piece of the kind ^q. When fire was set to his pile, an eagle was let loose from the top of it, as it were to carry his soul to heaven.

b Livia and with her some of the chief men among the knights continued for five days together in the field of Mars gathering up the ashes and the bones which the flames had spared. These Livia put into an urn of gold, which she reposed in the magnificent mausoleum, which Augustus had long before built for himself in a grove between the Tiber and the Flaminian way. It was decreed that men should mourn for him according to custom, that is, about three weeks; but women a whole year, probably for Livia's sake. As soon as the funeral was over, divine worship was decreed him with a temple and priests: the house, in which he was born, that in which he died, and most of the houses, in which he had lived, were changed into sanctuaries. Livia, now Julia Augusta, took upon her to be the chief priestess of the new deity, and made a present of ten thousand great sesterces to a senator, named Numerius Atticus, who solemnly declared upon his oath, that he had seen the soul of Augustus ascend up to heaven. This fable, which was a copy of that which Julius Proculus had many ages before published concerning Romulus, was soon spread and credited in all the provinces subject to Rome: temples were every-where erected in honour of the deified Augustus, and a new order of priests instituted. Tiberius consecrated a sanctuary to his deceased father in his own palace, and chose twenty-one priests from among the senators, naming himself, his son Drusus, and his nephew Germanicus, among the first ^r. It was not out of any principle of religion, or any regard to Augustus, as Tacitus well observes, that Tiberius procured the deification of Augustus, but because it nearly concerned him to have all the laws and acts of one who had left him his successor pass for sacred. Besides, in promoting this kind of superstition, he had another view, which was to rivet the public slavery, evidently included in religious worship paid to a prince who had intralled his country.

Augustus was a man of a sound judgment, and great penetration, had a particular turn for business, and a wonderful talent in improving opportunities, and applying the abilities of others to his own ends. In the times of the republic, when valour and eloquence were the only means of rising, and acquiring fame, he would have made but a middling figure; for he was quite destitute of the former, being bold indeed in council, but a coward in the field; and as to his eloquence, it was, according to Tacitus, easy and flowing, such as became a prince, but no ways fit to move or controul the spirit of republicans. He did not make his way to the throne, but found it already made by his great uncle Julius, who happily accomplished what he would never have thought of attempting. He had, 'tis true, powerful enemies to contend with, whom he overcame; but his victories were owing to others, and not to himself. Thus by the bravery of Antony he conquered Brutus and Cassius, and by the valour of Agrippa he conquered Antony. Nor did it require extraordinary abilities to hold the empire, when he had once acquired it, the Roman spirit being entirely broken, and all those cut off either in the battles of Philippi and Actium, or by bloody proscriptions, who had courage enough to stand up in defence of their liberties. He was naturally of a cruel and vindictive temper, and did many mean things to satisfy his revenge, which the great heart of Cæsar would have scorned. We meet with no instances of his so much boasted clemency and moderation, till he had sacrificed to his jealousy all those whom he either feared or suspected. When he had thoroughly mastered the state, utterly extinguished all maxims of liberty, and inhumanly massacred such as he thought capable of thwarting his designs, or disturbing him in the possession of his usurped power, he then governed with great mildness, and discharged all the duties of an excellent prince; which gave rise to the saying, that that he should never have been born, or never have died. As he stuck at no wickedness to gain power, we cannot help thinking but that he would have committed more to maintain it, if he had found more to be necessary. He made, 'tis true, a feint or two to abdicate the sovereignty; had he been in earnest, he might at least have left for a legacy to the Roman people that liberty of which he had robbed them. But instead of restoring to them that dominion over themselves, which none but themselves had any right to exercise, he provided by a long train of successors against any possible recovery of liberty. When he had no longer any heirs of his own blood, whom he liked, he adopted the sons of his wife, and their sons; which plainly shews, that he was determined to intail slavery upon his country, and extend his usurpation even beyond his grave. Some writers to excuse him tell us, that the state was irretrievable, and that it was therefore absolutely necessary the sovereign power should be lodged in one man. But Augustus himself judged otherwise; for by proposing to resign, however insincere this proposal was, he at least shewed, that he thought the resettling of the republic practicable. Drusus, brother to Tiberius, declared his design to effect it; nay, it was what Tiberius himself, after he was emperor, pretended to do. Augustus might, without all doubt, by his absolute authority have reduced the commonwealth to her first principles and firmness. This would have been true glory, the only true use of his absolute power, and the only amends for having assumed it. But instead of restoring the state to its ancient lustre, he did all that lay in his power to perpetuate slavery, to extinguish all maxims of liberty, and to render his successors as absolute as himself. But not to dwell any longer on this subject, we shall conclude with Dion Cassius, that Augustus would have been deservedly esteemed one of the best princes that ever swayed a sceptre, had he not usurped, but received the sovereign power lawfully conveyed to him from his ancestors. But whether the wise laws he published, and the mildness with which he governed, after his sovereignty was thoroughly established, sufficiently atoned for his usurpation, and the many crimes attending it, is what we submit to the judgment of our readers (F).

(F) The news of Augustus's death, when first brought to Rome, gave occasion to various discourses and observations concerning him, which it would be an unpardonable omission in us not to take notice of, since they acquaint us with the sentiments, which his friends as well as his enemies entertained of him, and have been transmitted to us by one of the most judicious and accurate writers of antiquity (60), in whose words we shall deliver them: 'The superstitious multitude, says that writer, admired the fortuitous events of his life, the last day of which and the first of his reign was the same; that he died at Nola, in the same town, in the same house, and in the same chamber, where his father Octavius died. They observed to his glory his many conquests, equal in number to those of Valerius Corvinus and Caius Marius put together; that he had exercised the tribunitial power for thirty-seven years successively; that he had been proclaimed emperor twenty-one times, and that he had enjoyed many honours, some of which had been conferred upon others, and some created for him. Men of penetration entered further into his life, but differed about it. His admirers said, that his filial piety, and the disorders which reigned in the republic, and had got the better of the laws, forced him to enter into a civil war, which can never be carried on without dreadful disturbances; that to be revenged on those who had murdered his father, he had been obliged to comply with the violent temper of his colleagues, Antony and Lepidus, and give up to their revenge and jealousy many illustrious citizens; that when Antony was lost in sensuality, and Lepidus in sloth and idleness, there was no other remedy for the distracted state, rent into parties and factions, but the sovereignty of one: Augustus, however, did never take upon him to rule over his country as king or dictator, but settled the government under the legal title of prince of the senate: he extended the bounds of the empire, and set for its limits the distant ocean, and remote rivers; the several parts and forces of the state, the legions, the provinces, and the navy, were well connected and governed; the citizens lived peaceably under the protection of the laws, the allies respected the Roman name, and Rome herself was adorned with magnificent structures: he had indeed on some occasions exerted his arbitrary power, but in very few, and then only to secure the peace of the whole. In answer to all this, others, who did not entertain so good an opinion of the deceased emperor, urged, that his filial piety, and the distractions of the republic, were mere pretences; but his lust of reigning the true and only motive, which prompted him to kindle a civil war in the bowels of his country; that in order to get the whole power of the state into his hands, he gained over by bribery a body of veterans; and though a private youth, levied an army in defiance of the laws; that for the base purpose of power, he debauched the Roman legions under the command of the consuls, as if he designed to join Pompey's republican party; that soon after, when he had obtained of the senate, or rather usurped, the prætorship, the two consuls, Hirtius and Pansa being slain, he seized both their armies; that it was doubted whether the consuls were killed by the enemy, or their own men, Hirtius in the battle, and Pansa after it, by having poison poured into his wounds, and whether young Cæsar was not the author of this execrable treason; that he exerted the consulship in spite of the senate, and employed against the commonwealth the very arms with which she had trusted him for her defence against Antony. To all this they added, his bloody proscriptions, the massacre of numberless citizens, his robbing the public of so many lands and possessions, and distributing them among his own creatures.

THE first feat of the reign of Tiberius was the murder of young Agrippa, whom Tiberius he caused to be dispatched by a military tribune, in whose custody he was at that time, before he suffered Augustus's death to be made public. Tiberius avoided mentioning this transaction in the senate, and would have the world believe that it was done creatures; a piece of injustice so notorious, that even those who were gainers by it, could not help condemning it. But allowing him to have had no other view in the destructive war he carried on against Brutus and Cassius, but to revenge by their death the murder of the dictator, though it had been more to his reputation to sacrifice his private resentment to the public welfare, did he not betray young Pompey by a deceitful peace? Did he not ensnare Antony first by treaties, viz. of Tarentum and Brundisium, then by a marriage, that of his sister Octavia? And did not this perfidious alliance at length cost Antony his life? After this, 'tis true, there was peace, but a bloody peace in the defeat of Lollius and Varus in Germany; and at Rome the Varrones, the Egnatii, the Julii, illustrious citizens, were put to death. Neither was his domestic life spared on this occasion: he had arbitrarily robbed Nero of his wife, when she was big with child, and in derision of the gods consulted the priests, whether he might marry her before, or was obliged to wait till after her delivery. His favourites, Tedius and Vedius Pollio had lived in excessive luxury: his wife Livia, who had an absolute sway over him had proved a cruel governess to the republic, and a more cruel step-mother to the Julian family: he had even usurped honours peculiar to the gods, and raising temples to himself, would be adored as a deity with all the solemnity of priests and sacrifices: he adopted Tiberius for his successor, not out of affection to him, or any concern for the republic, but having discovered in him a cruel and haughty temper, he sought glory from the comparison of their reigns. Such were the sentiments and observations of the Romans on the deceased emperor. But after all, it must be owned, that Augustus, whether we consider him as a magistrate at the helm of the republic, or, as a private citizen in his domestic life, had many good qualities, which few persons in either station have ever since his time possessed in so eminent a degree. These together with his vices we shall here without any prejudice or partiality expose to the consideration of our readers, that they may the better be able to form a right judgment of the famous and so much celebrated Augustus.

In the first place, when his authority was once thoroughly established, he made it his whole study to redress the public grievances, to suppress the disorders which had been introduced by the licentiousness of the soldiery, during the civil wars, to settle in all the provinces a lasting peace, and to promote the happiness and welfare of his subjects. That he had nothing more at heart than to see the republic flourish, he frequently declared in his private discourse, but more remarkably in one of his edicts in the following words: I wish I may be able to establish the commonwealth on its proper basis, and reap such fruits of my labour as I desire, that I may hereafter be reputed the founder of so excellent a fabric, and carry this hope with me to the grave, that the commonwealth will continue and flourish upon the foundations which I have laid. Some writers have thought, that he would have resigned after his first illness, or at least left Rome free at his death, had he not been persuaded, that other pretenders would have risen up, and involved the republic in new troubles. He enacted many excellent laws for the reformation of manners, and extirpation of vice; and it may be truly said, that virtue was never more countenanced than in his reign. His sumptuary laws, his laws against bribery, adultery, unnatural lust, and all kind of incontinence, wrought a great change in the city, where vice had long appeared bare-faced, and triumphed. After he had reformed the manners of the citizens, he applied himself wholly to the embellishing of the city. In order to this, he raised many public buildings, among which the chief were, the forum, or court of justice, the temple of Mars the avenger, the temple of Apollo in Palatio, the temple of Jupiter the thunderer in the capitol, the portico of Lucius and Caius, the palaces of Livia and Octavia, and the theatre of Marcellus. He repaired many old temples, and rebuilt many, which had been destroyed either by time or fire, enriching both them and the rest with most magnificent presents. To the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, not to mention others, he gave at once sixteen thousand pound weight of gold, besides jewels and precious stones, to the value of fifty millions of sesterces. He often exhorted the principal and most wealthy citizens to repair or erect some monument or other, which might serve as an ornament to the city: and upon his persuasion Marcius Philippus built the temple of Hercules Musarum, L. Cornificius, the temple of Diana, Asinius Pollio the court of liberty, Munatius Plancus the temple of Saturn, Cornelius Balbus a theatre, Statilius Taurus an amphitheatre, and Marcus Agrippa a great number of most stately and magnificent structures. In order to secure the city, thus embellished, against fires and inundations, to which it was subject, he divided it into fourteen regions or wards, appointing a peculiar magistrate for each ward, and committing the care of each street to some citizen of distinction. These had under their command guards and watchmen, who were to patrol all night to prevent fires, robberies, and other disorders: against the inundations of the Tiber, which often laid the lower parts of the city under water, he cleansed and enlarged the bed of that river, which had been long choaked up with rubbish, and the ruins of houses; and that the city might be the more accessible on all sides, he took upon himself the reparation of the Flaminian way as far as Ariminum, leaving the rest of the public ways to be mended by such as had triumphed, and the charges to be defrayed out of the spoils of the enemy.

He shewed high regard for the Roman name, and was sparing in admitting foreigners to the rights of citizens; whereof we have the two following instances: Tiberius, having desired him to grant the citizenship of Rome to a certain Greek, who was one of his clients, he wrote him this answer; that he would not comply with his request, unless he came himself, and satisfied him of the justice of it: in like manner Livia interceding for a Gaul, he peremptorily rejected her petition, but granted the Gaul an exemption from his tribute with this declaration; that he would rather condescend to a diminution of the public revenue, than to prostitute the honour of the Roman name. As he had a particular veneration for the memory of those heroes who had contributed to the advancement of the Roman empire, he repaired all their monuments, retaining their old titles and inscriptions, and dedicating their statues in the two portico's of his forum; on which occasion he declared in an edict, that his design was to propose them as a pattern and example, by which he himself, and the princes, who should succeed him, might frame themselves, and regulate their conduct.

As he had no great talent for war, he commanded the army in person but twice against a foreign enemy, done by the command of Augustus, as if he had transmitted orders to the tribune who guarded the youth, to dispatch him upon the first intelligence of his death. The better to support this story, when the tribune, according to the custom of the army, acquainted Tiberius, that his commands were executed, he answered, that he had given no such commands, and that he should be answerable to the senate for what he had

viz. in Dalmatia, when he was but young, and in his expedition against the Cantabrians. The other wars he managed by his lieutenants, who under his auspices reduced the Cantabrians, Aquitans, Dalmatians, Pannonians, Illyrians, Rhætians, Vindelicians, Salassians, and the Germans inhabiting the countries between the Rhine and the Elbe. He held it for an infallible maxim, that war was never to be undertaken, nor a battle fought, but when the advantage hoped for was apparently greater than the loss feared; for those who hazard much, said he, to gain but little, are like men who fish with hooks of gold, the loss of which will hardly be repaired by what they catch. He used to say, that rashness and precipitancy were the greatest faults in a general; whence he had this saying frequently in his mouth, Festina lente, which is much the same in sense with our common proverb, No more haste than good speed. He was very severe in keeping the soldiers to their duty, not suffering, but with much difficulty, even his lieutenants to quit the camp, and return to Rome; and that only when the troops were in winter quarters. A Roman knight, having cut off the thumbs of two of his sons to disable them from serving, he condemned him to be sold for a slave, and confiscated his estate. He disbanded the tenth legion only for betraying an unwillingness to obey his commands, and dismissed others, without the rewards due to veterans for having demanded their discharge. If in an engagement any cohort or legion gave ground, or were even put into confusion, he ordered every tenth man by lot to be executed, and allowed the rest nothing but barley. The centurions and tribunes likewise, abandoning their posts, were immediately punished with death. For small offences he contented himself with condemning them to stand all day before his prætorium, sometimes ungirt in their tunics only, and sometimes with long poles in their hands. After the civil wars he never called those who served under him fellow-soldiers, but only soldiers, nor would he suffer his own or his wife's children to call them otherwise, thinking it inconsistent with military discipline, with the tranquillity of those times, and the grandeur of his family, to treat them with familiarity.

He was no less careful in administering justice, than severe in exacting military discipline: for he not only appointed such judges as were men of known integrity, but was himself very assiduous in hearing causes, often sitting up with great patience the best part of the night: when he was by any indisposition confined to his palace, he used then to hear causes in his own room lying upon a couch, thinking the administration of justice the chief and indispensable duty of a prince. Notwithstanding his assiduity in hearing causes, and continual application, he was at all hours ready to give audience even to the meanest of the people, to hear their complaints, and receive their petitions; and because one presented him his request somewhat timorously, he pleasantly rebuked him, saying, That he had delivered his petition to him, as if he had been presenting something to an elephant. To encourage persons of all ranks to recur freely to him, he carefully avoided all outward appearance of grandeur; hence he very seldom entered, or left any city, but in the night-time, to avoid all formalities, and the attendance of the inhabitants. He never went to the senate without saluting all the senators, in the order they sat, each of them by his own name; and at his departure took his leave of them in the same manner. He assisted in person at all public and private feasts and entertainments till he began to be in years, and could no longer bear the inconveniencies of a croud. He had so great an aversion to the title of dominus or lord, that he looked upon it as a reproach, and even published an edict, forbidding any one, his own children and grand children not excepted, to give him that title. In the assemblies held for the election of magistrates, he gave his vote in his own tribe, as if he had been one of the people; and in the courts of judicature, he not only suffered himself to be interrogated, but allowed the judges and advocates of the adverse party to object against his deposition. How great and powerful soever his favourites were in Rome, he would not allow them any exemption from the judiciary laws, nor even recommend them to the judges. Of all the criminals and accused persons in his time, he saved but one, by whose means he had discovered a conspiracy formed against him, and him he preserved by prevailing with his intreaties upon his accuser to withdraw his accusation. The ancients give us several instances even of his clemency, after his authority was thoroughly established. One Junius Novatus published a letter full of bitter invectives against him in the name of young Agrippa, for which offence Augustus only laid a small fine upon him. One Cassius Patavinus declared boldly at a public entertainment, that he neither wanted will nor courage to rid Rome of her new monarch; and Augustus contented himself only with ordering him to depart Rome. Æmilius Ælianus being accused among other things of speaking of him with great contempt, the emperor turning to the informer, and pretending to be in a great rage, I wish with all my heart you could prove it, said he: if you did, I would make Ælianus know, that I have a tongue as well as he, and can say twice as much of him; and resented it no further. Tiberius likewise complaining in a letter to him of the insolence of Ælianus, he returned him this answer; Do not, my dear Tiberius, indulge too much in this case your passion; let us despise words, and think ourselves happy if they can do us no greater harm.

As for his liberality, it knew no bounds; he constantly supplied with corn above a hundred thousand families, which he caused to be distributed monthly among them: he frequently presented the people with large sums; giving them sometimes two, sometimes three, and sometimes four hundred sesterces a head, not excluding even the children. He was always ready to lend without interest, any sum to such persons as were able to secure him his principal by double the value. When he published the law excluding from the senate such as were not worth twelve hundred thousand sesterces, out of compassion for many noble families, he made up that sum with his own money. He exhibited at an immense charge twenty-four shows in his own name, and twenty-three for other magistrates, who were either absent, or not able to bear the expence attending them.

Thus far of Augustus as a public magistrate: as to his domestic and private life, Suetonius represents him as a tender and careful parent, a constant friend, and both a severe and gentle master. He brought up his daughter and her children with the utmost care, not allowing any but persons of unblemished characters characters to have access to them: his grandchildren he taught himself the rudiments of learning, promising himself great happiness from his issue, and the care he took of their education; but he was therein, to his inexpressible grief, greatly disappointed, as we have related in the history of his reign. His friendship, when once acquired, was firm and constant: he not only rewarded his friends services, but patiently bore with their faults. Of all of them none ever received any ill treatment at his hands, except Salvidienus Rufus, and the famous poet Cornelius Gallus, who well deserved it, as we have related above. The rest of his favourites flourished in honour and riches to the end of their lives. As to his domestics, he conferred honourable employments, and heaped riches upon such of them as behaved well; but Proculus, a freedman, and one of his chief favourites, he caused to be put to death, for carrying on intrigues with married women. Thallus, another freedman, and his amanuensis, having betrayed some secrets for five hundred denarii, had his legs broke by his order. Several of his grandson Caius's attendants he ordered to be thrown headlong into a river, and drowned, for levying money in their master's province without his knowledge. He chose rather to turn into mirth the timorousness of Diomedes, another of his freedmen, than to impute it to any malicious design, when walking with him alone, a wild boar coming suddenly upon them, Diomedes, to secure himself, made bold to thrust his master to the boar.

He applied himself from his youth to the study of eloquence, and other liberal arts. During the war of Modena he is said not to have passed a day in the midst of his most important affairs without reading, writing, and declaiming. He wrote several books upon different subjects; viz. An answer to Brutus's Cato; exhortations to the study of philosophy; the history of his life to the Cantabrian war in thirteen books, an epic poem intitled Sicilia, and a book of epigrams, which he composed for the most part in his baths: he began a tragedy in a lofty style, but finding he could not hold out at that rate, he expunged what he had wrote, and being asked by his friends what was become of Ajax, who was the subject of the performance, he answered, Ajax has dispatched himself with a sponge. Though he was well acquainted with the Greek tongue, yet he neither spoke it readily, nor ever ventured to compose any thing in it; when he was obliged to use that language, he first wrote down in Latin what he had a mind to say, and then gave it to another to translate into Greek. In perusing the authors of both languages, his chief observation was what precepts and examples he might collect for the public or private instruction of his subjects and friends; when he thought any of them proper, he copied them word for word, and sent them to his domestics, the governors of the provinces, or the magistrates of the city, as any of them wanted admonition; nay, sometimes he read whole books to the senate, and recommended them afterwards to the people by proclamation. His generosity to men of learning knew no bounds, and hence so many famous writers flourished in his time, that the age of Augustus will ever be looked upon as the age of elegance and politeness; and every admirer of the poets and historians, who flourished in those days, will be an admirer of Augustus, who was so generous to them, and is the chief subject of their panegyrics.

But his virtues were not without the alloy of some vices highly unbecoming a person in his station. He abandoned himself to all manner of lewdness, without renouncing even in his old age the vices of his youth: his severe laws against adultery were no check upon him, no more than the sacred ties of friendship; for he did not spare the wife even of his own favourite, and faithful counsellor Mecenas. It was not extreme prudence in so great a politician to be daily violating his own laws, especially after he had, by sentencing those to death, who were guilty of adultery, declared how heinous and unpardonable a crime he thought it. Marc Antony in one of his letters to him before they quarrelled, rallies him upon his intrigues with several married women of great distinction, whom he names. His friends, to excuse these scandalous practices, which were too notorious to be denied, pretended, that he courted the favour of the wives to discover by their means the plots and designs of their husbands. He is said to have divorced Scribonia for resenting the authority of one of his concubines: as for Livia, the out of policy indulged his vicious inclinations so far, as to make it her business to bring him acquainted with such women as she thought he might like: he employed many of his friends in the same vile ministry, which gave occasion to several lampoons, and sharp satires. Marc Antony reproached him with having gained the favour of his great uncle Julius Cæsar at the expence of his modesty; and his brother Lucius Antonius charged him with abandoning himself, while he was in Spain, to the will of A. Hirtius, who was afterwards consul, for three hundred thousand sesterces; hence the people at a comedy not only interpreted to his dishonour, but applauded the following expression spoke of a priest of Cybele, playing upon his timbrel, as if it had been spoken of him, Videsne ut cinædus orbem digito temperet? Don't you see how the catanite governs the world with one finger? Some writers have also represented him as covetous of rich furniture, especially of Corinthian vessels; and tell us, that in the time of the proscription the following pasquinade was writ under his statue, Pater argentarius, ego Corinthiarius, that is, My father dealt in money, and I in Corinthian vessels; for it was supposed, that several persons had been proscribed for their plate, and that his father had been a banker, which last supposition was intirely groundless, for his father was raised very early to the highest honours in the republic. As for his immoderate desire of rich furniture, Suetonius clears him from this imputation, by telling us, that the goods and furniture of his house, which were still to be seen in his time, were not rich enough for a private person of any taste, and adding, that at the taking of Alexandria, of all the queen's rich furniture, he reserved for himself only a porcelain cup. He was given to gaming, and took great pleasure in playing at dice, which gave occasion to the following distich, which was made during the war in Sicily:

Aliquando ut vincat, ludit assidue aleam.*

That is, having lost his fleet twice at sea, he plays daily, that he may at last win. But Suetonius tells us, that he played only for his diversion, and not out of a desire of winning his friends money; to this purpose he quotes one of his letters to Tiberius, wherein he tells him, that he had passed the feast of Minerva merrily, and played every day at dice; Your brother, says he to Tiberius was at first a great loser, but in the end came off pretty well, having recovered himself beyond expectation: I lost twenty thousand sesterces; but had I exacted what was owing to me, or kept what I gave away, I should have won above fifty thousand. He was naturally very superstitious, a great observer of dreams, and looked upon the flight or chattering of birds as infallible presages. If in the morning his shoes were given him wrong, or the right foot shoe presented to him for the left, he counted it ominous. If it rained when he was setting out on a journey, he reckoned it a sign of a speedy and happy return: he would never begin a journey the day after the nundinae, nor undertake any business of consequence upon the nones; he was so afraid of thunder and lightning, that he carried a

had done. This alarmed Crispus Sallustius (G), who was privy to all the secret counsels of Tiberius, and had sent the tribune the warrant: he knew it was equally dangerous to confess the truth, and charge the emperor, or to clear the emperor, and accuse himself. In this perplexity he had recourse to Livia, advising her, by no means to divulge the secrets of the palace, the counsels of the ministers, or the services of the soldiery, adding, that Tiberius should beware of weakening the sovereign authority by referring all things to the senate, the nature of absolute power being such as could not be preserved intire but in one person*. Livia followed the advice of Sallustius, and no farther mention was made of the murder of the young prince (H).

As soon as the death of Augustus was known at Rome, the consuls, senators, and knights, ran headlong into slavery, as Tacitus expresses it. With servile flattery they took care to frame their faces so as to reconcile false joy for the accession of Tiberius with feigned grief for the loss of Augustus. The two consuls Sextus Pompeius and Sextus Apuleius took first the oath of fidelity to Tiberius, and then administered it to the senate, the people and the soldiery; for Tiberius affected to derive all his authority from the consuls and senate, as if the ancient republic still subsisted, and he were yet in suspense about accepting or rejecting the sovereign power: he even owned in his edict for summoning the senate, that he issued it in virtue of the tribunitial power granted him under Augustus, and that he claimed no other authority, no other title for having a share in the public administration. But notwithstanding this pretended modesty, from the moment Augustus expired, he assumed all the prerogatives of an absolute prince, gave the word to the prætorian cohorts, placed guards about his person, went guarded in the streets, and to the senate, and writ letters to the several armies in the undisguised style of one who was already master of the Roman empire, and had under his command all its forces. This he did to prevent the armies in distant provinces from declaring for Germanicus, who was then in Germany at the head of seven legions, and a great body of allies. But with the senate he proceeded in a quite different manner: when the conscript fathers offered him the government, he pretended to refuse it, though he had already secured it to himself, and with a great deal of artifice began to discourse of the greatness of the Roman empire, and in modest terms of his own insufficiency; telling them, That the divine genius of Augustus seal's skin always about him, imagining as was then generally believed, that it had we know not what secret virtue against thunder; but nevertheless, for his greater security, upon the least apprehension of an extraordinary storm, he used to seek for shelter in a vault or cellar under-ground.

Such were the virtues, such the vices of the famous Augustus. As for his conduct during the civil war, it was such as brought, we may say, disgrace upon usurpation itself. He stuck at no crime, however heinous; but after he had either by public proscriptions, or private assassinations, cut off all those who gave him umbrage, he reigned with moderation over the rest. He reigned long, and established a lasting peace, a great relief after so long and destructive a war. In this long tranquillity, the calamities which had been occasioned by the war were forgot, and Augustus cried up as the author of the blessings they enjoyed in a profound peace at home. Besides, the badness of his successors was a signal advantage to his name and memory; for in proportion as they were detested, he was regretted.

(G) Crispus Sallustius was born of an equestrian family, great-nephew by a sister to the famous historian Caius Sallustius, and by him adopted; he might have risen to the greatest honours in the state, but in imitation of Mecænas, whom he proposed to himself for his pattern, he contented himself with the title of a Roman knight, though he excelled in power many, who had been distinguished with consulships and triumphs. In Mecænas's life-time he was next in favour with Augustus, and upon the death of that faithful counsellor, he became the chief confident first of Augustus, and afterwards of Tiberius, who reposed an intire confidence in him: he was extreme nice in his dress, expensive in his manner of living, and no ways inferior in luxury and magnificence to Mecænas himself; but could, upon any exigency, exert a vigour equal to the greatest affairs, which he concealed under the appearance of indolence and sloth (62).

(H) Suetonius tells us, that Agrippa was killed by a military tribune, in whose custody he was at that time, after he had read the warrant for his execution to him; which warrant, adds that writer, whether left by Augustus when he died, to prevent any troubles which might happen upon his death, or contrived by Livia in Augustus's name, with or without the privy of Tiberius, is a thing uncertain to this day (63). But Tacitus tells us in express terms, that Augustus never dipt his hands in his own blood; neither does he think it credible, that he would barbarously sacrifice the life of his grandson to the security of his step-son. It is therefore more probable, says that author, that this hasty murder was purely the work of Tiberius and Livia, and that the young prince fell thus untimely to satiate the hatred which Livia bore him, and to deliver Tiberius from a troublesome rival. Though the assassin, who was charged with the execution of this cruel order, was a bold and resolute centurion or tribune, as Suetonius calls him, and found young Agrippa unarmed, and little apprehending such a destiny, yet it was with the utmost difficulty that he dispatched him. In him ended the family of Augustus.

gustus alone was equal to so great a charge; that as for himself, he knew by experience, ^{He affects to} having borne part of Augustus's cares, how many difficulties, contingencies and dangers, ^{decline the so-} are inseparably annexed to rule and sovereignty; that since the city was so happily replenished ^{vereign power.} with great numbers of illustrious patriots, they ought not to lay the whole burden of the administration upon one person, but divide it among many, &c. When he had ended his speech, the senators, who dreaded nothing so much as to seem to understand him, burst into tears, and throwing themselves at his feet, embraced his knees, begging him in the most low and servile manner imaginable not to abandon them, but to take upon him a charge, to which none but himself was equal. Then Tiberius, pretending to yield to their importunity, I am, said he, unequal to the weight of the whole government; but if you think fit to intrust me with any particular part, what ever it be, I am ready to undertake it. Hereupon Asinius Gallus (I) rising up, I beg to know, Cæsar, said he, what part of the government you desire for your share? This unexpected demand startled Tiberius, who for a while stood mute; but recovering himself, answered, that it ill became his modesty to chuse or reject any particular branch of the administration, when he desired to be excused from the whole. Gallus, perceiving him offended, as readily replied, that he did not offer that question, as if he designed to divide what was in itself indivisible, but to convince him by his own confession, that the commonwealth was but one body, and consequently could not be governed but by the wisdom of one person: then continuing his speech, he made a long descant upon the great merits and accomplishments of Tiberius, of his many victories and conquests, of the civil employments he had long borne with great credit and reputation, &c. but this did not assuage the wrath of Tiberius, who had long hated Gallus for having married Vipsania Agrippina, the daughter of Agrippa, whom Tiberius had been obliged by Augustus to divorce, to make room for his daughter Julia. He suspected that Asinius Gallus by this match designed to raise himself above the rank of a subject, and therefore upon this new provocation resolved to seize the first opportunity of delivering himself from his fears by the death of his supposed rival. Lucius Arruntius (K), Quintus Haterius, and Mamercus Scaurus, likewise incurred on this occasion the displeasure of Tiberius; Arruntius by a speech not much unlike that of Gallus; Hirtius, by asking him, How long, Cæsar, will you suffer the commonwealth to remain destitute of a head? and Scaurus for saying by way of raillery, There is room to hope, that Tiberius will at length yield to the intreaties and prayers of the senate, since he has not opposed, as he might, in virtue of his tribunitial power, the motion of the consuls in his behalf. The ill-timed pleasure, which these illustrious citizens took in shewing themselves well apprised of Tiberius's real intentions, cost them dear; for he afterwards sacrificed them all, under various pretences, to his jealousy and suspicions. Several senators incur his displeasure.

(I) Asinius Gallus was the son of the famous Asinius Pollio, the favourite of Augustus, and great patron of learning, and men of letters. He had been consul eleven years before, with Caius Marcius Censorinus, and had also borne the office of triumvir monetalis, or overseer of the coinage, as appears from one of Augustus's medals with this legend on the reverse, C. Asinius Gallus III. vir. A. A. A. F. F. that is, triumvir, auro, argento, ære, flando, feriundo. At first the consuls took upon themselves the care of the mint, and joined two senators with them in this office; but afterwards the heads of the republic were eased of this trouble, and sometimes two, sometimes three, sometimes four persons were appointed to direct and inspect the coinage, and were called, according to their number, duumviri, triumviri, quatuorviri monetales, æris, argenti, auri flatores, (64). These magistrates are sometimes described on medals which were probably the current coin of the Romans, thus; Cur. X. Fl. that is, Curatores denariorum flandorum, and they were so called till the triumviri monetales were created. But to return to Asinius Gallus, Suetonius ascribes to him a small performance, containing a parallel or comparison of Cicero and his father Asinius Pollio, in which he gave the preference to the latter; in answer to this work, the emperor Claudius published a book, which he

(K) A. Lucius Arruntius was descended of an ancient and noble family, indowed with extraordinary talents, possessed of great wealth, and in high favour with the people. Augustus was well acquainted with his abilities, and not long before his death, in a familiar conversation with his friends, declared his opinion of him; for the discourse turning upon the great men in Rome, who were equal to the supreme power, and some naming Marcus Lepidus, others Asinius Gallus, and some Lucius Arruntius; Marcus Lepidus, replied Augustus, is indeed capable of the supreme power, but will not, in my opinion, accept of it; Asinius Gallus will aspire at it, but is not qualified for it; as for Lucius Arruntius, he is both equal to so great a charge, and will not fail, upon a proper occasion, to seize it (65). That he spoke thus of Lepidus and Asinius is agreed on all hands, but some writers, quoted by Tacitus, instead of Arruntius name Cneius Piso, of whom we shall have frequent occasion to speak in the course of this reign. All these great men, except Lepidus, were soon cut off by Tiberius's orders, being charged with various crimes feigned by him on purpose to get rid of all competitors to the sovereign power (66).

Some other senators spoke still more boldly; and yet we do not find that Tiberius ever resented the liberty they had taken; they were not, in all likelihood, so considerable, either for their birth or talents, as to give him any umbrage. Of these one, no longer able to bear the ambiguity of his answers, with which he held the senate in suspense, who were all the while at his feet, cried out, Let Tiberius either accept of the empire, or declare in plain terms that he rejects it. Another boldly addressing him, Other men, said he, perform slowly what they readily promise; but you promise slowly what you have already performed. And indeed he reigned already, having from the moment Augustus expired assumed all the prerogatives of a sovereign; but in this mysterious way of dealing with the senate, he had two things in view; the first was to make the world believe that he had been by the common wealth chosen, and called to the empire, which was more glorious for him than to owe it to the intrigues of a woman, or to the adoption of a superannuated prince; the second thing he had in view was to discover the designs and intentions of the great men, and by that means be able to distinguish his friends from his foes. At length pretending to be overcome by the importunities of the conscript fathers, and complaining of the heavy burden they laid upon him, he began to yield by degrees to their request, and in the end accepted the government, but so as to give them hopes that he would one day resign it; his words were, I accept the empire, and will hold it till such time as you conscript fathers, in your great prudence shall think fit to give repose to my old age. Thus was Tiberius Claudius Drusus Nero (L), in the fifty sixth year of his age, raised to the empire, and invested

(L) The Claudian family, of which Tiberius was descended, was one of the most illustrious families of Rome. They were originally of Regillum, a city of the Sabines, whence, according to some writers, they removed to Rome, in the time of Romulus, being invited thither by Titus Tatius, who reigned jointly with him, according to others, whom we have followed (67), in the fourth consulship of Poplicola, when they were brought to Rome by Attius Clausus, chief of the family, and received into the number of the patricians by the senate, who assigned them a certain portion of land beyond the Anio, and a burying place under the capitol. Attius Clausus, on his arrival at Rome, whether he came with five thousand families of his friends and dependents, changed his name to Appius Claudius, and was immediately admitted into the senate. In process of time the Claudian family was honoured with twenty-eight consulships, five dictatorships, seven censorships, six triumphs, and two ovations. They were distinguished among themselves by several names and surnames, but they agreed absolutely to renounce the name of Lucius, which was common in their family, two of that name having been condemned and executed, and to take the name of Nero in its stead, which in the Sabine language signifies strong and valiant. Of this family were the famous Appius Cæcus, Appius Claudius Caudex, Appius Claudius Nero, Appius Claudius, the decemvir, Appius Claudius Drusus, Appius Claudius Pulcher, of whom we have spoken at length in different places of this work. Of the same family were the two celebrated Claudias, one of whom disengaged the vessel, which was stranded at the mouth of the Tiber, and laden with the sacred image and the utensils of the great mother of the gods; the other was arraigned of high treason before the people which had never happened before to any woman for saying as she passed in her chariot through the streets which were much crowded, I wish my brother Pulcher were alive, that by losing another sea-fight, he might clear the streets of that throng, and make more room for my chariot: for Claudius Pulcher, as we have related elsewhere (68), having engaged the Carthaginians at sea contrary to the opinion of all his officers, was by them entirely defeated with the loss of ninety galleys, and twenty-eight thousand men, killed, drowned, or taken prisoners. P. Claudius, the declared enemy of Cicero, was likewise of this family; but in order to obtain the tribuneship, and by the power annexed to that office enabled himself effectually to destroy the Roman orator, he renounced his nobility, and got himself adopted by a mean plebeian into a very low family. The rest were all patricians, and had ever been the principal assertors of the power and dignity of that order. Tiberius was of the patrician family of the Claudii both by the father's side, who was descended from Tiberius Nero, the son of Appius Cæcus, and by the mother's, who was the daughter of Appius Pulcher, brother to the said Tiberius Nero. He was also allied to the family of the Livii by the adoption of his mother's grandfather. The Livian family was indeed plebeian, but nevertheless honour'd with eight consulships, two censorships, one dictatorship, and three triumphs. To this family Rome was indebted for many citizens of great prowess and renown, among whom we may well reckon Livius Salinator, and Livius Drusus; of Livius Salinator we have spoke elsewhere (69); as to Livius Drusus, he is said to have killed in a single combat a general of the enemy named Drusus, and to have in memory of that exploit assumed and transmitted to his posterity the name of Drusus. In his prætorship he recovered according to some writers, and brought back the gold which had been given to the Senones, when they besieged the capitol. The father of Tiberius, was quæstor to Julius Cæsar, and commanded his fleet in the Alexandrian war; after which he was by the dictator rewarded for his eminent services, and appointed first pontifex in the room of Pablius Scipio, and afterwards honoured with the command of the colonies which were sent into Gaul. However, when the dictator was slain, and most of the senators, apprehensive of new troubles, were passing an act of oblivion, Tiberius, not thinking that enough, moved, that rewards might be bestowed on the tyrannicides. In the Perusian war he sided with Lucius Antonius against Octavianus, and though

Tiberius had no sooner accepted the empire, than the senators, to curry favour with their new sovereign, were for heaping extraordinary honours on his mother: some proposed decreeing her the general title of mother, others that of mother of her country, and almost all moved; that to the name of Tiberius should be added, the son of Livia. But Tiberius, jealous of his mother's glory, answered; that public honours ought to be conferred upon women warily; and with a sparing hand, adding, that he would use the same moderation in receiving the honours which should be offered to himself. He could not be prevailed upon to suffer so much as a lictor to be decreed her, tho' every vestal enjoyed that mark of distinction; nay, he prohibited the raising her an altar in memory of her late adoption into the Julian family; or paying her any honours of the like nature. Thus from the very beginning of his reign, he requited with the utmost ingratitude the infinite obligations he owed to his mother; being ashamed, as was commonly believed, to acknowledge himself indebted for the empire to the intrigues of a woman^w. He proved a no less cruel husband; than an undutiful son. Julia had been long since banished by her father into the island of Pandataria on account of her scandalous lewdness; and from thence some years after removed to the city

though the rest abandoned Lucius, yet he could never be prevailed upon to forsake him; so that he was the only person who continued with him to the last. When the city of Perusia surrendered, he found means to make his escape first to Præneste, and from thence into Campania, where he armed the slaves with a design to make a stand against Octavianus; but his undisciplined troops betaking themselves to flight at the approach of Octavianus's victorious legions, he was forced to shelter himself in Sicily, where he staid a very short time, being disgusted with Pompey, who neither deigned to admit him into his presence; nor would allow him to have the fasces carried before him, though the time of his prætorship was not yet expired. From Sicily he retired into Greece; where he was kindly received by Marc Antony, and entertained by him in a manner suitable to his rank; till a peace being concluded between Antony, Octavianus, and Pompey, and a general amnesty granted; he returned to Rome with the rest of the exiles; where Augustus, falling in love with his wife Livia Drusilla, obliged him to yield her to him, though she had already brought him children, among the rest Tiberius, and was then big with child. He died soon after; leaving behind him two sons, Tiberius and Drusus, surnamed Nero's, as we have related above.

Some authors have written, that Tiberius was born at Fundi, a city of the Aufones between Terracina and Formia; but the most credible writers assure us, that he was born at Rome on mount Palatine, the sixteenth day before the calends of December, M. Æmilius Lepidus being consul the second time with L. Munatius Plancus. In his infancy he suffered great hardships, and was exposed to frequent dangers, his parents having taken him along with them in their flight and exile; nay, his mother Livia, in their painful journeys round Sicily and Greece, is said to have carried him great part of the way in her arms, her husband being abandoned by all his friends, and even his domestics, on account of his steady adherence to the republican party. Some time after his return to Rome one, M. Gallius, a senator, adopted him by his last will; and appointed him his heir: Tiberius accepted of the estate, but declined assuming the name of his benefactor, because he had been formerly a zealous stickler for the republican party. He made a funeral oration for his father, when he was but nine years old, which was received with great applause. In Augustus's triumph for his victory over Antony at Actium, he attended him on horse-back with Marcellus the son of Octavia. He afterwards commanded the young noblemen in the Trojan solemnities, or tournament called Troy, which were celebrated in the circus, presided in the Ætiac games, instituted in memory of Augustus's victory at Actium, and exhibited several combats of gladiators in honour of his father Tiberius, and grandfather Drusus, in one of which he engaged with three hundred thousand sesterces, some of the rudarii, or gladiators who had been discharged and exempted from fighting, to return to the arena. He entertained the people with several other magnificent shews, partly at the expence of his mother, and partly of his father-in-law. His first wife was Agrippina, the daughter of Agrippa, and granddaughter of the famous Titus Pomponius Atticus, by whom he had his son Drusus; but though she was with child again, he was obliged much against his will to divorce her, and marry Julia, the daughter of Augustus, by whom he had one son, who died while he was yet an infant. Julia had, in her first husband's life-time, expressed a great passion for Tiberius; but after their marriage she despised him, and was, as it is commonly believed, with her scandalous and lewd life, the chief cause of his sudden retreat to Rhodes.

He first served under Augustus in quality of military tribune in the Cantabrian war; some time after he was appointed commander in chief of the army which was sent into Armenia to place Tigranes on that throne. On his return from that expedition Augustus raised him to the prætorship, and took him with him into Gaul, whence he sent him against the Rhætians and Vindelicians, whom he conquered, reducing their country to a Roman province, as we have related above. He was no less successful in his expeditions against the Pannonians and Germans, whom he obliged to sue for peace. Augustus rewarded his victories with a triumph, which he obtained in his second consulship. But in the height of his glory he left Rome, and retired to Rhodes, whence after seven years banishment, as we may call it, he was allowed to return to Rome, reinstated in the favour of Augustus by the interest of his mother Livia, appointed to command the armies in Pannonia, Dalmatia, and Illyricum, made in some degree partner of the empire with Augustus, and in his last will named his chief heir (70).

city of Rhegium on the streights of Sicily, where she suffered a less painful exile. Tiberius in Augustus's life-time had shewn great tenderness and compassion for his unhappy wife, and often solicited the prince to recall her, and reinstate her in his favour. But he was no sooner declared emperor, than he stopt the small pension which her father paid her yearly for her support; so that the unfortunate princess, after a long series of miseries, died of want in the fifteenth year of her banishment (M)*. At the same time Sempronius Gracchus, one of her chief favourites, was by Tiberius's orders put to death in the island of Cercina, to which he had been confined by Augustus. He was descended of one of the most illustrious families in Rome; had a lively wit, great eloquence, and an engaging address and behaviour. With these parts he had captivated the heart of Julia, and debauched her while she was yet Agrippa's wife; neither did he break off his intrigues with her, after she was married to Tiberius; nay, he is supposed to have inspired her with contempt and aversion for her new husband, and to have dictated the letters, which she wrote to her father, full of bitterness against Tiberius, and painting him in the most odious colours. He had therefore been banished by Augustus to the island of Cercina, where he had suffered great miseries for fourteen years. But Tiberius, not judging banishment an adequate punishment for the injuries Sempronius had done him, sent or ordered Lucius Asprenas, proconsul of Africa, to send a band of assassins to dispatch him. These upon their landing found the unhappy exile on the shore, who without betraying any fear or surprize, went to meet them, and intreat them, being well apprised of their design, to suspend the execution of Cæsar's orders, till he wrote a letter to his wife Alliaria, to acquaint her with his last will; which he had no sooner done, than he offered his neck to the sword of the assassins with a constancy and intrepidity worthy of the Sempronian name, though he had in his life-time shamefully degenerated from the glory of his ancestors. Some authors have written, that the assassins were not sent directly from Rome, but from Africa, the crafty tyrant having committed the execution of his orders to Lucius Asprenas, governor of that province, in order to screen himself by that means from the imputation of putting to death an illustrious citizen of Rome, whom his father Augustus had only condemned to banishment, and cast the odium of such an action on Asprenas†. But Tiberius's principal care in the beginning of his reign was to engage in his interest his nephew Germanicus, who on account of his extraordinary parts, and sweet temper, was equally adored by the people and soldiery. In order to this, though he hated Germanicus in his heart, yet pretending a tender affection for him, after he had forbid the senate to confer any particular honours on Livla, he recommended to them his nephew, and even asked for him the proconsular power; which being granted, he immediately dispatched into Germany persons of the first rank to acquaint him therewith, and condole with him in his name for the death of Augustus‡ (N). He then named twelve candidates for the prætorship, among whom were Velleius Paterculus the historian, and his brother; the senate desired him to appoint more, but as that number had been settled by Augustus, he not only refused to comply with their request, but bound himself by an oath never to depart from the regulations of his predecessor. The people had hitherto enjoyed the privilege of creating magistrates, or at least shared it with the emperor, one half of the magistrates being named by

(M) Augustus had confined her only to the city of Rhegium, but Tiberius would not allow her the liberty of going out of the house in which she lodged, nor suffer any of the inhabitants to converse with her, or come near her. He deprived her, according to Suetonius (71), of the small pension which Augustus had allowed her for her maintenance, under pretence of an exact and religious observance of the last will of her father, in which no mention was made of her. But Dion Cassius tells us (72), that he left her a small legacy, though he ordained, that neither she nor her daughter should be laid in his mausoleum; and Tacitus says, that he caused her to perish with want, supposing that her tragical death,

(N) Germanicus had been invested with the proconsular power three years before by Augustus, as Dion informs us; the power therefore, which was now conferred upon him at the request of Tiberius, was, no doubt, a confirmation of the proconsular authority for his life, such as had been formerly granted to Augustus. In virtue of this new dignity, Germanicus had an almost absolute authority over all the Roman forces both in the provinces and the city, and was every-where to be acknowledged as commander in chief; and under Tiberius generalissimo of the empire.

a by him, and the other by the tribes, assembled in the field of Mars (O); but Tiberius in the first elections, deprived them of their ancient rights, and transferred them to the senate: the people complained of this innovation, but no disturbances ensued, the senate being well pleased with the change, since by it they were delivered from the charge of buying votes, and the shame of begging them^a.

Tiberius had scarce taken possession of the sovereign power, or, as we may well call it, the throne, when news was brought him, that the armies in Pannonia and Germany had mutinied. In Pannonia three legions, viz. the eighth, the ninth, and the thirteenth, being allowed by their general Julius Blæsus a relaxation for some days from their usual duties, either to mourn, according to the Roman custom, for the death of Augustus, or to rejoice for the accession of Tiberius, they grew wanton, quarrelsome and turbulent, began to hearken to seditious discourses, to be fond of an easy and idle life, and to have an utter aversion to the toils and discipline of the camp. They were headed and inflamed by one Percennius, a common soldier, who, before he served in the army, had made it his whole business to raise disturbances, and form parties in the theatres and play-houses to hiss or applaud such players as he disliked or favoured (P). As he had by this practice acquired a notable talent in speaking to a croud, and inflaming the mob, in the dusk of the evening, when those whom he distrusted were withdrawn to their tents, he used to assemble the most turbulent, stir them up to mutiny, inflame them against their officers, and encourage them to lay hold of the present occasion, while the emperor's authority was yet wavering, to prevail upon him either by force or intreaties to redress their grievances. How long, Percennius insaid he, shall we obey, like slaves, a few centurions and tribunes? When shall we have flames them.
courage enough to demand a redress of our grievances, if we let slip the present opportunity? What hinders us from laying our complaints before the new emperor, and obliging him either by our prayers or menaces to listen to them? Are we doomed to be for ever miserable? Many of us have already served thirty or forty years, are decrepit with age, and maimed with wounds; and yet either cannot obtain our discharge, or after having obtained it, are still kept in the camp under the honourable title of veterans (Q), and obliged

(O) Suetonius tells us, that Julius Cæsar shared the power of creating magistrates with the people, except in the election of consuls, one half of the magistrates being declared by them, and the other by himself, which he signified by billets sent to the tribes in these words; I recommend such or such a person to you, that by your suffrage he may be admitted into such or such an office (74). The same writer in the life of Augustus informs us, that he restored to the assemblies of the people the ancient rights, having first enacted severe laws against all sorts of bribery, and corrupt acquisition of offices. But whether Suetonius by ancient rights meant those which the people enjoyed in the times of liberty, or only the privilege of chusing one half of the magistrates, which they were allowed in the dictatorship of Cæsar, and afterwards deprived of during the triumvirate, is matter of dispute among the learned (75). As to the consuls, they were both named by Cæsar the dictator, and afterwards by Augustus, at least in the first years of his reign. Dion seems to insinuate, that Tiberius named the consuls himself, but allowed the senate to chuse the other magistrates, reserving to himself the recommendation of some who were to be elected without opposition: on the other hand, Tacitus tells us, that as to the consular elections, he can scarce affirm any thing, there being in this particular a great disagreement among the historians of those times, and a seeming contradiction in the speeches of Tiberius himself, always reserved, always mysterious (76).

(P) In the circus and theatres there were in the Roman times parties and factions, some favouring one actor, and some another: the opposite parties often came to blows; nay, much blood was sometimes shed in these frays. Suetonius tells us, that the emperor Nero took great pleasure in these theatrical battles; and that being conveyed in his litter into the theatre, he not only beheld from the upper part of the proscenium the opposite parties quarrelling about the players, but set them together by the ears; and when they were engaged, took great delight in throwing stones, and pieces of broken benches, among the croud, with which he once wounded a prætor in the head (77).

(Q) In the times of the republic those were called veterans, who had served twenty years, after which they were discharged, and allowed to retire, if they pleased, as Suidas informs us: this discharge was called Missio. But under the emperors the veterans, that is, those who had served twenty years, were still kept in the camp till they received the rewards which were due to them on account of their past services, and in the mean time were exempted from all manner of drudgery, and only obliged to fight. This discharge or exemption from military toils was called by the ancients exauſoratio, which we must carefully distinguish from what they called Missio; for after the former they often continued many years under their colours, whereas the latter was an absolute discharge granted to them after they had received their rewards. Suetonius tells us, that Tiberius very rarely discharged his veterans, that he might be a gainer by their death (78); for the rewards due to them were not paid to their heirs. The same writer informs us, that Caligula in reviewing his army discharged several centurions, who had very near served their time, under pretence that they were too old, and unfit for the service (79). Thus some of the emperors declined discharging their soldiers after they had served their time, and others discharged them before; all with the same view, to defraud them of their rewards.

obliged to undergo the same hardships, the same labours. But suppose any of us should escape a so many dangers, and outlive so many calamities, how in the end shall we be rewarded? Under the name of lands we shall be doomed to drain bogs and marshes, or to till barren mountains in countries far remote from our native soil. Could our pay afford us a comfortable subsistence, we should not have so much reason to complain of the poorness of our rewards. But our persons and lives are valued only at ten asses a day, and out of this we must buy cloaths, tents, and arms; out of this we must bribe our cruel centurions, and redeem ourselves from their blows: for so poor a price we must patiently suffer stripes, wounds, hard winters, laborious summers, bloody wars, or a barren peace. For these miseries there is no other remedy left us, than that we refuse to serve but upon certain conditions fixed by ourselves particularly, that our pay be a denarius, or sixteen asses a day (R); that sixteen years be the utmost term of serving, that when this time is expired, we be no longer kept under the colours, but have our rewards paid us in ready money in the camp where we earned it. Do the prætorian cohorts, who receive two denarii a day, and are discharged after sixteen years service, undergo greater dangers than we? I do not mean to detract from the merit of the city guards, but only say, that we are placed in the midst of barbarous nations, and cannot look out of our camp without seeing the enemy. This harangue was received with great applause by the enraged multitude: some of them immediately proposed the incorporating of the three legions into one; but every one claiming for his own legion the prerogative of denominating the other two, this project was defeated; however, they agreed to place the three eagles of the legions with the standards of the cohorts all together, and to raise with turf a tribunal, according to the Roman custom (S), for the new general they designed to chuse. While they were thus busy, Blæsus arrived; and having severely rebuked some, and threatened others, Dip your hands rather in my blood, he cried with a loud voice to all; for to murder your general will be a less crime than to revolt from your prince; for I am determined, if I fall not by your hands, to keep you in your obedience; if you think fit to murder me, I hope at the sight of my blood you will repent of your crime, and return to your duty. This discourse did not affect the mutinous soldiery, who continued their work, till it was breast-high, when at length, being overcome by the constancy and intrepidity of their general, they forbore. When their fury was somewhat assuaged, Blæsus, who was an able speaker, remonstrated to them, that sedition and mutiny were not the proper means of conveying their claims to the emperor; that their demands were new and extraordinary, such as no armies had in former times made to their generals, nor they themselves to the deified Augustus; besides, that they were ill-timed, since princes in the beginning of their government are taken up and imbarassed with various cares. However, if they expected to gain in peace what the conquerors, even after the civil wars, had never had the confidence to demand, why should they use violence, and trample upon the rules of military discipline? that they might appoint deputies, and in his presence give them their instructions. At these words they all cried out with one voice, that they were willing to send deputies; and that the son of Blæsus, who was a tribune, should be immediately dispatched to the emperor to demand in their name, that they might

(R) The Roman denarius was a piece of silver first coined in the year of Rome 484, Q. Ogulnius Gallus and Q. Fabius Pictor being consuls. It was at first worth ten asses, and therefore marked with the numeral letter X. It underwent in process of time many changes and reductions; but in the age we are now writing of, it was valued at sixteen asses, and hence the mutineers demanded, that their pay might be raised from ten asses to a denarius. Lipsius in his notes upon Tacitus pretends, that the denarius at this time was worth twelve asses only; but that he was therein mistaken, is manifest from Gronovius's learned observations on the money of the ancients (100.) The soldiers pay was at first five asses a day; but it was afterwards, at what time precisely we know not, raised to ten. Out of these ten asses they were to buy cloaths, tents and arms, as is manifest from this passage of Tacitus, contrary to the law published by Gracchus, enacting, that the soldiers should be supplied with arms, cloaths, tents,

&c. at the public expence. This law was probably revoked, when their pay was increased; but nevertheless some of the succeeding emperors clothed their soldiers at the expence of the public, namely Alexander Severus, who, as Ælius Lampridius tells us in the life of that emperor, gave his soldiers shoes, boots, breeches, coats and cloaks.

(S) The tribunal, from whence the emperors used to harangue their troops, was still, nay, and many ages after, raised with turf. Flavius Vopiscus, speaking of the elevation of the emperor Probus, The whole army, says he, cried out unanimously, Probus we salute Probus our sovereign. The gods save you! Then they erected a tribunal of turf, and proclaimed him emperor. This custom obtained likewise among foreign nations, especially in Britain, as Xiphilinus informs us, who, in speaking of the famous queen Boadicea, says, that she ascended a tribunal raised with turf after the Roman manner. Frequent mention is made of these tribunals by the ancient poets (1).

a might be absolutely discharged after sixteen years service; they added, that when he had obtained this, they would trust him with their further pretensions.

In the mean time, some manipuli or companies, which had been sent, before the sedition, to Nauportum (T), to mend the roads, being informed of the tumult in the camp, plucked up their standards, and falling upon the neighbouring villages, plundered them, and Nauportum itself. The centurions endeavoured to restrain their violence, but the mutineers, instead of listening to their remonstrances, or betraying any fear at their menaces, first derided them, afterwards abused them with most outrageous language, and at length came to blows. They were chiefly incensed against Aufidienus Rufus, who, as he had been long a common soldier, and had raised himself by his courage and bravery to the post of præfectus castrorum (U), was a severe observer of the primitive discipline, which he exacted from others with the more rigor, as he had himself borne with patience the hardships attending it. Upon him the furious multitude first vented their rage; they dragged him from his chariot, loaded him with baggage, and driving him before the first ranks, asked him by way of insult, how he liked such burdens? how such marches? Upon the arrival of these mutinous companies in the camp, the sedition broke out anew with more fury than ever; the seditious, casting off all obedience, roved about the country without controul, ravaging it on all sides. Upon their return, Blæsus, who was still obeyed by the centurions, and the legionaries of any reputation, caused those, who were most loaded with plunder, to be beaten with rods, and cast into prison (W). But the furious multitude, flying to the relief of the criminals, rescued them out of the hands of the lictors, and, breaking open the prison, set all the prisoners at liberty. After so bold an attempt the mutineers grew more outrageous, and the mutiny more general. One Vibulenus, a common soldier, being raised on the shoulders of his comrades, before the tribunal of Blæsus, addressed those who had delivered the prisoners, thus: I cannot sufficiently commend the zeal you have shewn for these innocent and unhappy sufferers: you have restored them to their liberty: but who will restore life to my brother? who my brother to me? He was sent from the army in Germany with proposals for our common good: but our cruel general caused him to be butchered last night by his gladiators (X), whom he entertains and arms for our destruction. Then turning to Blæsus, Tell me, Blæsus, said he, where have you thrown his mangled body? Even the most cruel enemies do not deny burial to the slain. When I shall have satisfied my grief with a thousand kisses, and a flood of tears, commanded me also to be massacred, that our fellow-soldiers may bury my brother and me together, both inhumanly murdered for consulting the common good of the legions. When Vibulenus had ended his speech, he threw himself at the feet of his companions, and beating his breast, tearing his face, and shewing all the symptoms of the deepest sorrow, he endeavoured to raise at the same time pity and fury in the minds of the multitude, and indeed with good success; for they fell immediately

(T) Nauportum was a city of Upper Pannonia, and is placed by Strabo, who calls it Naupontus, in the country of the Taurisci, three hundred and fifty furlongs from Aquileia. It was so called from the river Nauportus, on which it stood (2). Cluverius is of opinion, that Nauportum stood on the spot where the present city of Oberlauback in Carniola was afterwards built.

(U) This was, without all doubt, a new office, instituted probably by Augustus; for no mention is made of the præfectus castrorum by any author, who wrote in the times of the republic. It was his province to pitch upon the ground for incamping, and lay it out, to distribute the quarters and pavilions, and to direct the workmen in raising the ramparts, digging the ditches, &c. He had also under his care all the military engines, carriages, and iron tools belonging to the army (3). Each legion had a præfectus castrorum, at least when they incamped separately; for Tacitus, speaking of one Pænius Posthumus, calls him præfectus castrorum secundæ legionis (4). The same writer seems to place them in rank above the tribunes; for in describing Vitellius's entry into Rome, he tells us, that before their several eagles marched first the præfecti castrorum, next to them the tribunes, and after the tribunes the chief centurions (5). Vespasianus Pollio, the grand-father of the emperor Vespasian, was præfectus castrorum. But we must not on that account confound, as a modern writer has done whom Lipsius confutes, the præfectus castrorum with the præfectus prætorii, an officer of a much superior rank.

(W) From this passage it is manifest, that the Romans built prisons in their camp, and also from the following lines of Juvenal:

Lævaque, si longe castrorum in carcere mansit* (6).

These criminals were dragged along with the army in chains, when they decamped.

(X) Most of the governors of provinces, generals, and other great men, maintained vast numbers of gladiators at an immense charge for the public shews. We must not therefore imagine, that the gladiators mentioned in this place were listed in the legions: they belonged to the general, and not to the army.

ately upon Blæsus's gladiators and domestics, and having bound them; dispersed themselves about the camp and the neighbouring fields in quest of the supposed corps, which if they had found, Blæsus himself would have been in great danger; but as they could find no corps, and it manifestly appeared from the depositions of Blæsus's slaves upon the rack, and of other credible witnesses, that the whole was a calumny maliciously invented, and that Vibulenus never had any brother, they spared their general; but nevertheless in the height of their rage, fell upon the præfektus castrorum, and the tribunes, drove them out of the camp, and plundered their baggage: they put to death the centurion Lucilius, whom they hated above all the rest on account of his severity, and had by way of sarcasm nicknamed Cedo alteram, Reach me another, because when he had broke one rod, or vine-twigg, which was made use of on such occasions, upon the back of a soldier, he was wont to call for another, and then a third (Y). The other centurions withdrew, and absconded, all except Julius Clemens, whom, as he was a man of parts, the mutineers detained with a design to commit the management of their affairs to him. Another centurion, nicknamed Sirpicus (Z), had like to have occasioned a bloody quarrel between the eighth and fifteenth legion, the former insisting upon his being put to death, and the latter protecting him; but the ninth legion, what with intreaties, what with menaces, composed the difference ^b.

Tiberius no sooner received intelligence of this mutiny, than he dispatched his son Drusus to the rebellious legions at the head of the prætorian cohorts, the prætorian horse, and the main body of the German horse, at this time the emperor's guards (A). The prætorian cohorts were on this occasion reinforced with an extraordinary addition of chosen men. Among the persons of distinction who were ordered to attend and assist Drusus in bringing back the revolted legions to their duty, were Cneius Lentulus, an officer of great fame and experience, and Ælius Sejanus, who had been lately joined with his father Strabo in the commission of præfektus prætorii, that is, in the command of the prætorian guards (B). Sejanus was appointed governor to the young prince; and as his credit with the emperor was known to be great, it was hoped he might either with promises or intreaties bring the seditious to a sense of their duty. When news was brought to the camp that Drusus approached, the legions in token of respect marched out to meet him, not with their usual gaiety and shouts of joy, but in a sullen silence, displaying in their countenances marks of sadness mixed with fierceness and rage. As soon as Drusus entered the camp, he placed guards at all the gates and parties under arms in several quarters to be ready against any surprise. Drusus immediately ascended the tribunal, and having made a sign with his hand to the crouds that surrounded it to be silent, he read to them his father's letter; the substance of which was, that he would take a particular care of the brave legions with whom he had successfully carried on so many wars; that as soon as his grief was allayed, he would treat with the senate about their demands; that in the mean time,

(Y) We have another instance of a nick-name made up of different words in the life of the emperor Aurelianus wrote by Flavius Vopiscus, who tells us, that there being two Aurelians in the army, and both tribunes at the same time, the soldiers used by way of distinction to call the Aurelian who was afterwards emperor, Aurelianus Manus ad ferrum, because he was on all occasions ready to draw his sword.

(Z) The word Sirpicus may be derived from the ancient verb Sirpare, which signifies to bind, and is used in that signification by Varro (7). The centurion was perhaps called Sirpicus, because he had frequently in his mouth that obsolete verb; perhaps because he kept the soldiers to their duty with great severity, and caused them to be bound and cast into prison for the least breach of military discipline.

(A) Suetonius tells us, that Augustus, after the defeat of Varus, who was cut off with three legions in Germany, disbanded all his German guards (8).

But Tiberius, it seems, set that corps on foot again, in the very beginning of his reign.

(B) The præfektus prætorii was the chief commander of the emperor's guards called Prætorians from the Latin word Prætorium, which at first signified the general's quarters in the camp, the word prætor being in the first ages of the republic common to all magistrates, whether civil or military. In the times of the emperors, by prætorium was meant the emperor's quarters in the camp, and his house in the city: hence in prætorium accipi, is to be listed among the prætorian soldiers, or the emperor's guards (9). Augustus was the first, as Dion informs us (10), who gave the title of præfektus prætorii to the chief officer of his guards. The præfektii prætorii under Constantine the Great, and his successors, were the first officers of the empire, and had quite different functions from those of the præfektii prætorii appointed by Augustus.

(7) Varro: l. iv. ling. Latin. (8) Suet. in Aug. c. 48. (9) Vide Tacit. hist. l. iv. c. 48. (10) Dion, l. iv. p. 555.

a time, he had sent them his son, and impowered him to make them forthwith such concessions as could be made without further consultation; but as to other demands, they were to be referred to the senate, whom he would not by any means deprive of the right of distributing rewards and punishments. When Drusus had read his father's letter, the assembly appointed the centurion Julius Clemens to be their speaker; who accordingly began with proposing to Drusus their demands, which were, that they should be discharged after sixteen years service; that they should upon that discharge receive the rewards which they claimed; that their pay should be increased to a Roman denarius, and that the veterans should be no longer detained under their ensigns. To these demands Drusus answered, that they exceeded his power, and therefore ought to be laid before the senate and his father. He had scarce uttered these words, when the multitude cried out with one voice, To what end then are you come, since you can neither increase our pay, nor redress our grievances? Every officer is allowed to punish us with blows, and even death; and the son of the emperor has not power to relieve us by one beneficent action! Drusus, we find, has already attained to a great perfection in the arts and policy of his father, who, to frustrate the requests of the soldiers, used to refer all to Augustus. It is surprising, that the emperor should take upon himself the command and whole direction of the army, and at the same time refer the soldiery to the senate for their rewards! Why should he not in like manner consult the senate, when a battle is to be fought, or a soldier to be punished? Are punishments to be inflicted without any controul or restraint, and rewards not bestowed without the consent and approbation of many? Having thus spoke, they left the tribunal, threatening and insulting all those they met belonging to Drusus, either as friends or guards, in order to pick a quarrel with them, and have some pretence to fall upon them sword in hand. They were chiefly enraged against Cneius Lentulus, who they suspected had hardened the young prince against their complaints, and encouraged him to despise the menaces of the soldiery. Of this Lentulus was well apprised, and therefore resolved, before their fury broke out, to quit the camp, and return to his winter quarters. But as he was departing, the mutineers surrounding him, asked, whither he went? to the emperor or senate, to oppose their advantages with them as he had done in the camp with Drusus? These words were followed with a shower of stones, and he had been soon dispatched, had not the troops that attended Drusus, who was with him, rescued him already covered with wounds and blood. As the enraged multitude seemed now determined to keep no measures, Drusus was under dreadful apprehensions of the following night, which every one believed would prove fatal to many, perhaps to Drusus himself. But it happened quite otherwise. Ignorance and superstition that very night put an end to the revolt, restored calm to the alarmed camp, and quieted the minds of the soldiery, after they had so long continued deaf to reason, and trampled upon all the laws of military discipline. The moon all on a sudden began to darken in the midst of a clear sky, till she was by degrees totally eclipsed (C). The soldiery, ignorant of the natural causes of this phenomenon, and imagining that the gods were angry with them on account of their revolt, and the crimes attending it, began to shew some signs of repentance. Drusus did not fail to improve this their disposition; he immediately sent the centurion Julius Clemens, and other officers and soldiers, in whom he could confide, to mix with the mutineers, and try whether they could, while they were thus alarmed, inspire them with a love of their duty. These, pursuant to the prince's orders, going round from tent to tent, and insinuating themselves everywhere, first prevailed upon the legionaries to abandon the veterans, and the three legions to separate. After this the love of duty and obedience returning by degrees, those who guarded the gates to keep Drusus, as it were, besieged, retired from their posts; the eagles and other ensigns, which, in the beginning of the tumult, had been thrown together, were carried back each to its proper place; and, after so dreadful a storm, calm and tranquillity restored to every quarter of the camp.

EARLY next morning, Drusus, having summoned an assembly ascended the tribunal, and though unskilled in speaking, yet with a haughtiness natural to the Claudian family, inveighed against their past, and commended their present behaviour. After this great debates arose in his council, some advising him to suspend all proceedings

ings till the return of the deputies, whom he had allowed them to send with their petitions to Tiberius, while others were for immediately condemning and executing the ring-leaders of the sedition. Drusus, as he was naturally inclined to severity, followed the advice of the latter; and having summoned Vibulenus and Percennius before his tribunal, he condemned them, and caused them immediately to be executed. Some writers say, that they were privately executed, and buried in Drusus's tent; others, that their bodies were ignominiously thrown over the infrenchments to strike terror into the rest. The other ring-leaders of the sedition were discovered sculking about the camp, and either slain by the centurions and prætorian guards, or delivered up to Drusus by their comrades as a proof of their sincere repentance. After this they were terrified anew with dreadful storms, and such violent rains, that they could not stir out of their tents; which they looking upon as sent by the angry gods, resolved to abandon a camp, which they had polluted with so many crimes, and return to their several garisons. Accordingly the eighth legion departed first, and then the fifteenth, though earnestly pressed by the ninth to wait till the return of their deputies: at length the ninth likewise, their courage failing them after they were deserted by the other two, abandoned the camp, and quietly followed them. Drusus, seeing tranquillity thus restored, returned to Rome to acquaint Tiberius with the success of his negotiations, which indeed was more owing to chance than his address^c.

volt.

ALMOST at the same time, and for the same causes, the legions in Germany revolted with far greater fury, as they were far more numerous. On the Rhine were quartered two armies, the one called the Upper, commanded by Caius Silius, the other the Lower, by Aulus Cæcina; but the chief command of both was vested in Germanicus, who was then busy in collecting the tribute in Gaul. The legions under Silius, however discontented, waited for the success of the revolt, which the Lower army had begun. The latter, consisting of four legions, viz. the first, the fifth, the twentieth, and the one and twentieth, were incamped on the borders of the Ubii (D); where they no sooner received the news of Augustus's death, than the recruits lately raised in Rome, men accustomed to the softness and gaieties of the city, and impatient of military labour and discipline, began to stir up the rest with seditious harangues, insinuating, that a favourable opportunity offered at length for the veterans to demand an absolute discharge, for the soldiers who had not served out their time, to insist upon larger pay, and for all to obtain by some means or other a mitigation of their miseries. We could not have wished for a more favourable conjuncture, said they, to be revenged on the centurions for their cruelties: the fate of Rome depends upon us:

(D) The Ubii in Cæsar's time dwelt on the other side of the Rhine, as is manifest from his commentaries, where he speaks of them thus: The country of the Suevi is bounded on the other side by that of the Ubii, who possess a large and flourishing city, and are a people far more polite than the other Germans, because lying nearer the Rhine, they have more commerce with merchants, and conversation with the Gauls; with these the Suevi had many disputes; and tho' the Ubii were so experienced soldiers, so powerful and so numerous a people, that they could not expel them the country, yet they made them their tributaries, and reduced them to a very low condition (11). And elsewhere; The Ubii, says he, the only people on the other side of the Rhine, who had sent ambassadors to Cæsar, had entered into an alliance with him, and delivered hostages, earnestly desired him to assist them against the oppressions of the Suevi; if the state of affairs did not permit him to go in person, they begged, that he would only send his army into Germany; for so great was the reputation which the Romans had acquired by defeating Ariovistus, that if they appeared in defence of the Ubii, if they owned them for their allies, their name alone would be sufficient to defend them from the insults of the remotest Germans (12). For their sake chiefly, Cæsar resolved to cross the Rhine, and not thinking it either safe to transport his army in boats, or suitable to his character, and the dignity of the Roman name, he built the famous bridge, which he minutely describes in his commentaries. As the Ubii continued faithful to Rome, and were on that account greatly harassed by their German neighbours, they were allowed by the Romans to settle on the opposite bank of the Rhine. This migration happened, according to Strabo, in the reign of Augustus; for that writer, speaking of the Treviri, adds, Next to them dwelt the Ubii, whom Agrippa, agreeably to their inclination, placed on this side of the Rhine (13). Dion Cassius mentions two expeditions of Agrippa into Gaul, the first in his first consulship, the second eighteen years after in the consulship of C. Sentius and Q. Lucretius (14). It is most likely, that the migration of the Ubii happened in the first expedition; for then he built, as Dion informs us, a bridge cross the Rhine. Tacitus, speaking of the Ubii, says, that they came from beyond the Rhine, and that for the many proofs of their fidelity, they were settled upon the bank of that river, not to be there guarded, but to guard and defend that boundary against the rest of the Germans. The country allotted to them comprehended the greater part of the present duchy of Juliers, and almost the whole archbishoprick of Cologne.

a we have enlarged the empire with our victories: to us the Cæsars are indebted for the glorious surname of Germanicus. As Cæcina, instead of exerting his authority, betrayed fear, and gave way to their fury, they fell at once upon the centurions, the chief objects of their resentment, and, dragging them to the ground, discharged upon each of them sixty blows, that is, as many as there were centurions in a legion (E). They fall upon their centurions. Then, thus bruised and near expiring, they drove them ignominiously out of the camp, nay, some they threw into the Rhine. One Septimius fled for refuge to the tribunal of Cæcina; but the general was forced to deliver him up to the incensed multitude. Cassius Chærea, another centurion, afterwards famous for the murder of the emperor Caligula, boldly opened himself a way, sword in hand, through the croud. After this the mutineers, despising the authority of their tribunes and their præfetti castrorum, set and relieved the centries themselves, appointed the guard, and gave such orders as they judged proper in the present conjuncture.

In the mean time, Germanicus, who, as we have hinted above, was collecting the tribute in Gaul, no sooner heard of this insurrection, than he flew to the camp. The legions, as he drew near, marched out to meet their general, expressing their dissatisfaction with hideous clamours; nay some, taking him by the hand, as if they designed to kiss it, thrust his fingers into their mouths, to shew him they had with age lost all their teeth; others desired him to behold their hoary heads, the wounds they had received, &c. Germanicus, instead of returning any answer to particulars, as soon as he had entered the intrenchments, ordered them to range themselves into manipuli, and place before them their several ensigns, as was customary when the general assembled and harangued his troops. They obeyed slowly and with reluctance; then Germanicus beginning his speech with an encomium upon Augustus, proceeded to the many victories of Tiberius, enlarging on the glorious exploits he had achieved in Germany with those very legions; he then acquainted them, that all Italy, both the Gauls, and every province of the empire had received and acknowledged Tiberius for emperor, without betraying the least disaffection. Thus far they listened to him with attention; but when he began to expostulate with them about their seditious behaviour, the scene changed; Germanicus was interrupted with loud clamours and a general uproar: some stripping themselves shewed him the scars of the many wounds they had received; others the marks of the stripes inflicted on them by the merciless centurions; they urged their scanty pay, their great labours, the hardships attending a military life, &c. Above all, from the veterans arose a dreadful cry; they enumerated thirty years of service and upwards, and begged, that to men quite spent and worn out he would at length grant some respite, that he would not suffer them to be indebted to death for their relief, but discharge them forthwith, and allow them a comfortable maintenance. Some demanded the money which had been bequeathed to them by Augustus, mixing with their demands zealous vows and omens of happiness for Germanicus; nay, some went so far as openly to declare, that they would stand by him to the last, if he would himself assume the empire. At these words Germanicus, struck with horror, leaped from the tribunal and attempted to make his escape, lest he should be stained with their treason: but the seditious legionaries, drawing their swords, stopt him, and even threatened to kill him, if he offered to withdraw. Then the generous Germanicus, protesting, that he would rather die than betray the trust reposed in him, drew his sword, and would have sacrificed his life to his fidelity; had not those who stood next to him seized his hand, and restrained him by force. There were not, however, some wanting in the assembly, who cried out to him to strike and not spare himself; nay, one Calpurnius, a common soldier, offered him his naked sword, saying, Take this, Germanicus, it is perhaps sharper than your own; a behaviour which was highly condemned by the rest as savage and barbarous. In the mean time, the friends of Germanicus had time to convey him out of the croud to his tent, and there to consult about the most proper measures in so critical a juncture. For Germanicus was informed, that the ring-leaders of the sedition were preparing to dispatch messengers to the Upper army, in order to draw them

(E) There were in a complete legion thirty manipuli or companies: each company consisted of a hundred and twenty men, and was divided into two bands, or, as the ancients style them, orders; each order consisted of sixty men, and had its peculiar centurion; so that there were in a complete legion sixty centurions; and each centurion had sixty men under his command (15).

them too in the revolt; that they designed to plunder the city of the Ubii (F); and that the Germans, already acquainted with the sedition in the Roman army, were ready to invade Gaul, as soon as the banks of the Rhine were left unguarded. In the council, which Germanicus held in his own tent, various measures were proposed, and at last the following resolution unanimously agreed to, viz. that letters should be feigned from Tiberius, with directions, that those who had served twenty years should be finally discharged; that such as had served sixteen should be deemed veterans; and that the legacy, which they demanded, should not only be paid, but doubled. But the mutineers, suspecting these concessions to be forged purely to gain time, insisted on their being forthwith executed. The tribunes therefore were obliged to discharge immediately the veterans; but as to the payment of the legacy, Germanicus would have fain put it off, till they were retired to their winter-quarters; and indeed the first legion and the twentieth trusted him upon his word, but the fifth and the one-and-twentieth refused to stir from the camp, till they were satisfied; so that he was obliged to raise the sum out of the money which he and his friends had brought with them, to defray the expences of their journey, which they no sooner received, than they retired quietly to their winter-quarters. Germanicus then hastened to the upper army under the command of Silius, and easily prevailed upon the second, the thirteenth, and the sixteenth, to swear allegiance to Tiberius; the fourteenth shewed some hesitation, but Germanicus discharging forthwith the veterans, and paying the rest the money bequeathed them by Augustus, cut off all occasion of complaints.

BUT a party of veterans (G) belonging to the mutinous legions, and then in garrison in the country of the Chauci (H), began a sedition there, which was at first quelled by Memmius, præfect of the camp, who, though not vested with any such power (I), put instantly two of the ring-leaders of the sedition to death. But the tumult breaking out afterwards with fresh fury, Memmius was obliged to withdraw himself from their rage and lie concealed: the mutineers discovered him, and then Memmius declaring that these outrages were not offered to him, but to Germanicus and Tiberius, who would not fail to resent them, he snatched the colours, faced about towards the Rhine, and boldly threatening those, who should dare to abandon their ranks, with the punishments due to deserters, he led them back to their winter-quarters. In the mean time, deputies sent either by Tiberius or the senate, probably to quell

(F) By the city of the Ubii Tacitus means Colonia Agrippinensis, which he calls the city of the Ubii, either because it was their metropolis, or because they had not yet built any other. They probably laid the foundations of this city upon their first settling on this side of the Rhine. It was afterwards made a Roman colony, and peopled by veterans in the consulship of C. Antistius and M. Silius, at the request of Agrippina, the daughter of Germanicus and wife of the emperor Claudius, who was born there. From her it was called Colonia Agrippinensis, and in after-ages Agrippina; which has made some writers doubt, whether it borrowed its name from Agrippina, or from her grandfather Agrippa, who brought the Ubii over the Rhine. But to Lipsius this doubt seems quite groundless, since the colony, had he been the founder of it, would have been called Colonia Agrippensis, and not Agrippinensis. What name it bore before it was made a Roman colony we find no where mentioned; for Tacitus calls it constantly the city of the Ubii.

(G) The veterans formed a corp apart, and had their peculiar standard called Vexillum, whence they are commonly styled by the ancients Vexillarii and also Emeriti, from their being exempted from all manner of drudgery, and only obliged to fight the enemy. In this condition they continued till they received the rewards due for their service; and their final discharge, which the emperors used, under various pretences, to put off for many years, in order to defraud them of the promised lands or money.

(H) The Chauci inhabited East-Friesland, the counties of Hoy and Oldenburg, the duchy of Bremen, and part of Lauenburg. Tacitus describes the situation of their country and the manners of the people, thus: Germany extends northward a great way; first of all occurs the nation of the Chauci, who, though they begin immediately at the confines of the Frisians, and possess part of the shore, extend so far as to border upon the several people, of whom I have already spoken, till they reach quite to the borders of the Catti; so vast a country the Chauci not only possess, but fill! They are the most noble people of Germany, and chuse rather to maintain their grandeur by justice than violence: they live quietly, free from the ambition of possessing more, and of domineering over others. They give no occasion to wars, they ravage no countries: without wronging or oppressing others, they are come to be superior to all (16). However, they drove out the Anfibarii, and seized on their country, and made incursions into Lower Germany, as Tacitus himself informs us elsewhere (17).

(I) The power of life and death was at first lodged only in the commander in chief of the whole army, but afterwards extended by Augustus to his lieutenants, and by the other emperors to the proconsuls, proprætors, and all the governors of provinces: but no such power was ever granted to the præfects of the camp, to the tribunes, or other inferior officers.

a quell the sedition, meeting Germanicus near the altar of the Ubii (K), gave occasion to new disturbances. The first and the twentieth legions, who were incamped there with those legionaries, who had been lately placed under the standard of the veterans, apprehending that these deputies were come to revoke the concessions, which they had extorted by their sedition, and imputing the imaginary decree to Munatius Plancus, who had been consul the year before and was at the head of this deputation, they resolved to vent their rage chiefly upon him; which he being aware of, fled for refuge to the quarters of the first legion, and there embracing the eagle and other ensigns, hoped the veneration, which the soldiers paid them, would restrain their fury. But had not Calpurnius the eagle-bearer, with great bravery and resolution, repulsed the audacious multitude, the Roman camp had been stained with the blood of an ambassador of the Roman people. This disorder happened in the night, and early next morning Germanicus entering the camp, ascended the tribunal, and placing Plancus by himself on the tribunal, inveighed against the horrible disorders of the preceding night, acquainted the soldiery with the true purposes of that embassy, complained in an affecting manner of the unheard-of outrages offered to Plancus without any provocation, aggravated the disgrace which the violating of the sacred person of an ambassador brought upon the legions, &c. But as the assembly shewed no great tokens of repentance, he first dismissed the deputies under a strong guard of auxiliary horse, and then, at the motion of his friends, solicited his wife Agrippina, who had attended him with her son Caius, at that time an infant, into Germany, and was big with child, to withdraw out of the camp, and not expose herself to the fury of an outrageous multitude. Agrippina was unwilling to leave him, urging, that it was below her, who was the grand-daughter of Augustus, to betray any fear, or abandon her husband in time of danger. But Germanicus, tenderly embracing her and their little son, prevailed upon her at length by his tears and intreaties to depart. As she was attended by many women of distinction, wives of the chief officers in the camp, who it seems in those days accompanied their husbands in all their military expeditions, their tears, cries, and lamentations, in parting with their husbands, occasioned a great uproar in the camp, and drew together the soldiers from all quarters. This was so melting a scene, that the most obstinate among the rebellious legionaries were touched with it. They could not behold, without being at the same time seized with shame and compassion, so many women of rank travelling thus forlorn without a centurion to attend them, or a soldier to guard them, and their general's wife among them, carrying in her arms her little child, and repairing, like an exile, for shelter against the fury of the Roman legions to Treves, as if she reposed greater confidence in foreigners, than in her own countrymen. This made so deep an impression on their minds, that some ran to stop her, while the rest recurring to Germanicus, earnestly conjured him to recall her, that it might not be said, to their eternal shame and disgrace, that the daughter of Agrippa, the grand-daughter of Augustus, the daughter-in-law of Drusus, whose memory they adored, had been frightened from the Roman camp, and obliged to seek sanctuary among foreigners. Germanicus, observing both their sentiments and countenances changed, resolved to improve their present disposition; and accordingly in a long and affecting harangue, which in the height of his grief he uttered with great vehemence, he painted to them the blackness of their guilt in such lively colours, that they not only confessed, that all his reproaches were true, but, their minds being quite changed, they earnestly besought him to punish the authors of the late sedition, by whom they had been misled, and offered to march forthwith against the enemy, provided he would recall his wife and his son. Germanicus, finding them intirely reclaimed, answered, that his son should return, but against the recalling of Agrippina he alledged the season already far advanced, and her approaching delivery; and as to the punishing the authors of the sedition, he told them, that he left that to them. He had scarce uttered these words, when the legionaries ran to seize the chief authors of the sedition, and dragged them in chains to Caius Cetronius, commander of the first legion, who judged and punished them in the following manner: The legions with their drawn swords surrounded the tribunal,

Germanicus sends away his wife Agrippina, and his son Caius.

Their departure affects the soldiery.

Germanicus improves this opportunity.

(K) This altar was probably raised in honour of Augustus, and seems to have been at a small distance from Cologne: Cluverius is of opinion, that the city of Bon, called by the ancients Bonna, was built in the place where this altar stood; but he is therein contradicted by Lipsius and others, who from several passages out of Tacitus shew pretty plainly, that the altar of the Ubii stood in the neighbourhood of their city, that is, of Cologne, whereas Bonna was twelve miles distant from it.

banal, from whence the prisoner was exposed to their view; if they pronounced him guilty, he was immediately thrown down headlong, and cut in pieces by his comrades. As Germanicus did not order, but only permitted, this new method of condemning and executing, he did not forfeit by it the reputation he had acquired of a humane and good-natured commander. The veterans followed the example of the legionaries, punishing the most seditious of their corps in the same manner. But, notwithstanding these signs of remorse and pledges of fidelity, Germanicus, glad to get rid of them, ordered them into Rhætia to defend that province against the Suevi, who were said to be in motion. After this he made a strict inquiry into the conduct and characters of the centurions, who were all cited before him to give each an account of his country, rank, the years of his service, his exploits in war, military presents, &c. If the tribunes or his legion were satisfied with his conduct, he kept his post, if they charged him with cruelty or avarice, he was immediately discharged. Thus were the first and the twentieth legion intirely reclaimed, and brought back to a sense of their duty. But the fifth and twenty-first, who were in winter-quarters sixty miles off in a place called Vetera, that is, the old camp (L), continued obstinate in their revolt, nor was there any wickedness which they did not commit. Against them therefore Germanicus resolved to lead the legions that had returned to their duty, and give them battle, if he could not reclaim them by fair means. With this view he prepared vessels and arms, and drew together his troops; but before he put them on board the vessels which were to convey them down the Rhine, judging it proper to allow the mutineers time to return to themselves, he wrote a letter to Cæcina who commanded them, acquainting him, that he approached with a powerful army, resolved to put them all to the sword without distinction, if they did not prevent him by taking vengeance themselves on the guilty. This letter Cæcina communicated only to the chief officers, and such of the soldiers as had all along disapproved of the revolt, exhorting them at the same time to enter into an association against the seditious, and redeem themselves from death and ignominy, by putting those to the sword who had brought them into the present danger. The officers approved of the proposal, and having, by sounding the legionaries and veterans, found, that the majority disapproved of the conduct of their comrades, they privately acquainted them with the contents of Germanicus's letter, and easily prevailed upon them to concur with their commanders, in sacrificing to their own safety the chief authors of the sedition. The time therefore was settled for falling sword in hand upon the most notoriously guilty and turbulent; and when it came, upon a signal agreed on before-hand, the faithful legionaries, rushing into the tents of the most seditious, massacred them without mercy, before they were aware of their danger: nothing was to be heard but dreadful outcries and groans in all the quarters of the camp; nothing to be seen but streams of blood and heaps of dead bodies. Neither Cæcina, nor any of the tribunes, offered to stop the fury of the enraged soldiery; so that the slaughter was general, and the camp in an instant turned into a shambles: comrades were butchered by comrades, and friends by friends, in the same tents where they used to eat and sleep together. The massacre was scarce ended, when Germanicus arrived, who, as he was naturally inclined to pity and mercy, could not behold the camp streaming with blood and filled with carcases, without bursting into tears, and crying out, This is not a remedy; but slaughter and desolation. After he had with a flood of tears given vent to his grief, he caused the bodies of the slain to be burnt, and celebrated their obsequies with the usual pomp^d. Thus was this dangerous sedition intirely quelled, discipline re-established, the rebellious legions thoroughly reclaimed, and the supreme power secured to Tiberius, by the address and intrepidity of the brave Germanicus; who, had his unbounded greatness of mind and a unshaken loyalty suffered him to second the ardent wishes of the soldiery, might have easily seized it for himself; for he was the darling of the soldiers, and adored by the people, both on account of his own merit, and that of his father Drusus, whose memory was dear to every true Roman, no-body doubting, but he would have restored the republic to her former state, had he succeeded to the empire; nay, the letter he wrote to his brother Tiberius about compelling Augustus to restore the public liberty, was commonly believed to have been the occasion of his death, as we have observed above. Of Germanicus they entertained the same hopes, and thence their zeal for his safety and advancement; but the noble youth himself was the only person who defeated all their measures, and resolutely opposed his own promotion. We shall soon see what return Tiberius made him for his unalterable attachment to his person and interest (M).

(L) This place began, no doubt, to be styled the old camp, after the Romans had formed a new camp in the country of the Ubii, or their neighbours the Vangiones. Tacitus often mentions this camp in his history (18); whence Cluverius concludes, that it was not a naked camp, but a considerable town, built on occasion of the stay the Romans made there. As it was distant sixty miles from the camp between Cologne and Bon, the above-mentioned writer thinks that the present city of Santen stands on the same spot of ground; in which opinion he is confirmed by the description Tacitus gives us of the old camp (19), which, he says, perfectly agrees with the situation of Santen.

b IN the mean time; such of the veterans and legionaries as had been no-ways concerned in the late sedition, in order to give Germanicus new proofs of their fidelity, begged him to lead them against the enemy, who had enjoyed some respite, first by the death of Augustus, and afterwards by the intestine tumult in the camp. Germanicus complied with their request, and laying a bridge cross the Rhine, marched over twelve thousand legionaries, twenty-six cohorts of the allies, and eight alæ (N) of horse. With these he traversed the Cælian forest (O), and other woods lying between him and the enemy; and being informed on his march, that the Germans were celebrating that night a festival with great mirth and revelling, he advanced with such expedition, having sent Cæcina before with the cohorts, to clear a passage through the forest, that he reached the villages of the Marfi, before the inhabitants had recovered themselves from their debauch. Here he divided his army into four bodies, and giving them full liberty to make what havock they pleased, sent them into different quarters of the unhappy canton, that no part of it might be exempt from ravage and devastation. We may well imagine what slaughter they made of those unfortunate wretches, whom they found scattered here and there and asleep, some in their beds, others lying by their tables; no sex or age was spared; places sacred and profane were equally plundered and laid in ashes, and among them the temple of Tanfana (P), the tutelar god of the German nation. In short, the country was wasted with

(M) Tacitus tells us, that Tiberius was highly blamed at Rome for not going in person to quell the sedition of the mutinous legions. "The rebellion," said they, speaking both of the Pannonian and German legions, has gathered too much strength to be suppressed by two young princes, whose authority the soldiery despises. Why does he not go himself to awe the mutineers with his uncontrouled power? They would, no doubt, return to their duty at the bare sight of their emperor, a man of great experience in war, and in whose power alone it is to punish with severity, and liberally to reward, every one according to his deserts. How many journies did Augustus take into Germany, even in his old age? And shall Tiberius, in the vigor of his, continue unactive and idle in the city, without any other employment, but to cavil at the speeches of the senators?" Tiberius, tho' not ignorant of these complaints, was determined not to leave Rome, judging his presence more necessary in the capital, where all affairs were transacted, than in the camp. Besides, he was at a loss to which army he should repair first, and at the same time afraid, lest the last he visited should think themselves affronted, and thence become more outrageous. To treat them therefore both equally, and maintain the majesty of an emperor, which is ever most revered at a distance, he thought it safest to visit neither, but to send to the one his natural, to the other his adopted, son. Moreover he considered, that the two young princes might well refer many things to him, which would be gaining time; and that if the mutineers despised them, his own authority still remained to awe them into obedience; whereas if they contem-

ned, in the first transports of their rage, the emperor himself, no authority was left to controul them. However, to obviate the complaints and clamours of the people, he gave out, that he designed to visit the rebellious armies; and even chose his attendants, provided his equipage, and prepared a fleet; but sometimes pretending business, sometimes alledging the approach of winter, he deceived not only the common people, but even the wisest senators.

(N) An ala, which we may call a squadron, consisted of three hundred horsemen, and was divided into turmæ and decuriæ, each turma consisting of thirty men, and each decuria of ten; so that there were in every ala ten turmæ, and in every turma three decuriæ.

(O) The Cælian forest was part of the Hercynian, and is placed by Cluverius partly in the duchy of Cleves, partly in Westphalia between Wesel and Koefeld. Some modern critics think, that it was called by the ancient Germans, not the Cælian, (for this, say they, is a Roman name) but the Hesian forest, from Hesus, the god of war amongst the ancient Germans and Gauls.

(P) Gronovius derives the name of this German deity from the words tan, or than, signifying in the German language a fir-tree, and fachna or fan, which in the ancient Gotho-Teutonic tongue signifies Lord or God; so that the import of Tanfana is the lord or the god of fir-trees. That author concludes, that the Tanfana of the Germans was the same as the Sylvanus of the Romans, and called the god Tanfana, or the god of firs, because his chief temple was in a forest of fir-trees (20), as Jupiter was styled by the Romans, Fagutalis, from a grove of beeches consecrated to him. the word fagus signifying in Latin a beech (21).

with fire and sword fifty miles round, without the loss, nay, without the wound, of a single man on the side of the Romans^e. This general massacre roused the Brueteri (Q), the Tubantes (R), and the Usipetes (S), who besetting the passes of the forest through which the Roman army was to return, fell upon their rear, and put the light-armed cohorts into disorder; but Germanicus, riding up to the twentieth legion, and crying out, That the time was come for them to redeem their reputation, and cancel the memory of their late sedition, by falling upon the enemy, they attacked them so briskly, that the Germans were broke at the first onset, and driven out of the wood into the neighbouring plain, where great numbers of them were cut in pieces. In the mean time, the van-guard, passing the forest, had time to form a camp, whither the rest of the army retired to rest themselves that night after so fatiguing a march. The next day they pursued their rout uninterrupted, and arrived, loaded with booty, at the place appointed for their winter quarters^f. The fame of these exploits soon reached Rome, and filled the city with joy. As for Tiberius, he was highly pleased to hear, that the sedition was suppressed, and the beginning of his reign signalized by so remarkable a victory. But his joy was not without alloy: Germanicus, by finally discharging the veterans, by shortening the term of service for the rest, and by liberally distributing money among them, had gained the affections of the army, and besides, great glory by his late expedition. This gave the jealous and suspicious emperor great uneasiness, which, however, he artfully disguised, giving the senate a pompous account of the exploits of his nephew, and bestowing upon him the highest encomiums. He commended at the same time the address of his son Drusus in quelling the sedition of the Pannonian legions in few words, but which seemed dictated by his heart and more sincere^g. In short, he spoke of Germanicus like an orator, but of Drusus like a father. However, he approved whatever Germanicus had done, and, to gain the affections of the Pannonian legions, extended to them all the privileges which Germanicus had granted to his own.

THESE disorders in Germany and Pannonia and the great veneration which the soldiery, as well as the people, had for Germanicus, were a great restraint upon Tiberius, who now with wonderful art disguised those vices, which afterwards displayed themselves so openly. He acted in most things like a truly generous, good-natured, and clement prince. Of the many and extraordinary honours that were offered him, he accepted but few, and those of the meanest sort. He forbade any priests or temples to be decreed for him, or statues erected but by his own permission, which he granted sometimes, upon condition that they should be placed, not among the images of the gods, but the ornaments of their houses. He refused the title of father of his country, and never took upon him the name of Augustus, though it was hereditary,

Lipsius derives the name of Tanfana from the Flemish word taensanct, signifying the principal or first cause of things; so that the Germans, under the name of Tanfana, adored, according to him, the supreme being.

(Q) The Brueteri are placed by most geographers next to the Frisii, between the Amisia, now the Ems, and the lake Flevus, now the Suydersee. Tacitus speaks of them thus. "Next to the Teneteri dwelt the Brueteri, in whose room the Chamavi and Angriarii are said to have settled, after having driven out and utterly extirpated the Brueteri, with the concurrence of the neighbouring nations, either in detestation of their pride, or enticed by the love of booty, or through the special favour of the gods towards the Romans. They were even pleased to indulge us the pleasure of seeing the battle, in which there fell above sixty thousand men, without a blow struck by the Romans, &c. May the gods continue and perpetuate among these nations, if not any love for us, yet by all means their animosity and hatred to each other, since fortune cannot more signally befriend us, than in sowing divisions amongst our enemies." As to the time of this general slaughter of the Brueteri mentioned here by Tacitus, we are quite in the dark; for this nation was still in being in Tiberius's reign, nay, and many years after Tacitus's time, but probably at a greater distance from the Rhine; for they are mentioned by Eumenius and Nazarius in their panegyrics upon Constantine, and also by the poet Claudian (22). The slaughter therefore was not so general as is by Tacitus supposed (23).

(R) The Tubantes possessed great part of Westphalia. Cluverius places the ancient city of Tecla mentioned by Ptolemy, now Teklenburg, on the borders of the Tubantes and Chamavi.

(S) The Usipites, Usipii, or Usipetæ, are placed by Rhenanus between the Rhine and the mountains of Hesse. In Cæsar's time they bordered upon the countries of the Sicambri and Teneteri, of whom we have spoken above. Dion Cassius seems to place them between the Rhine and the Lupias, now the Lippe, and the Sicambri beyond the latter of these rivers; for, in describing Drusus's expedition into Germany, he tells us, that he passed the Rhine, and having subdued the Usipetes, laid a bridge over the Lupias, and entered the country of the Sicambri (24).

tary, but in his letters to foreign potentates. For flattery he had an utter aversion. If, in private conversation or public speeches, any thing was said to his praise, he immediately not only interrupted, but rebuked, the speaker. One calling him Domini- nus or Lord, he desired him not to mention him any more in derision. Another calling his employments sacred, he entreated him to change his epithet, and to style them troublesome. He would not permit the senate to swear to the observation of his acts, urging against it the instability of all mortal things, and that the higher he was raised, the more he was exposed to danger. All slanderous reports, libels, and lampoons ^{His extraordi-} upon him and his administration he bore with extraordinary patience, saying, That ^{nary patience} in a free city, the thoughts and tongues of every man ought to be free; and when the senate would have proceeded against some, who had published libels against him, he would not consent to it, saying, We have not time enough to attend such trifles: if you once open a door to such informations, you will be able to do nothing else; for, under that pretence, every man will revenge himself upon his enemies by accusing them to you. Being informed that one had spoke very detractingly of him; If he speaks ill of me, said he,
I will give him as good an account of my words and actions as I can; and, if that is not sufficient, I will satisfy myself with having as bad an opinion of him as he has of me. His carriage towards the senate was very respectful; nothing of moment was transacted ^{His respect} without their advice and approbation. To them were referred the collecting of the ^{for the senate,} taxes and tributes, the building and repairing of all public edifices, the raising or disbanding of forces, the mustering of the legions and auxiliaries, the prolonging or granting commissions upon any extraordinary war, the returning of answers to the letters of kings, &c. He never entered into the senate with any attendants but once, when he was brought in, on account of an indisposition, in a litter; and then he immediately ordered his company to withdraw. In the senate he allowed every one to speak his mind with great freedom. Having one day dissented in his opinion from Q. Ha- terius; Pardon me, I beseech you said he, if as a senator I speak against you with more freedom than ordinary. Then turning to the whole assembly, he addressed them thus;
Most venerable fathers, what I say now I have often said before; a good and prudent prince, to whom you have given so great and absolute a power, ought to be serviceable, not only to the senate and the body of the city, but to every particular citizen: nor do I repent of any thing I have said of this nature, having always accounted you, as I still do, my good, just, and most gracious lords. If in the senate any thing was decreed against his judgment, he did not complain, nor seem the least displeased. He allowed the con- ^{And the} suls so much power, that certain ambassadors from Africa had recourse to them, ^{consuls.}
desiring they would return them a speedy answer, since Cæsar, to whom they had been sent, put them off from day to day. When the consuls came into the senate, the theatre, or any other place where he was, he always rose up to them, and turned out of the way, if he met them in the streets. He often assisted at the trials in the courts of justice, especially if any criminal was reported to be like to escape by favour or connivance; he then appeared unexpectedly, and with a grave air put the judges in mind of the laws and the crimes before them. He applied himself with ^{Applied him-} great care to the reformation of manners, and made many excellent regulations, by ^{self to the re-} which he restrained the immoderate expences of plays and public shews, retrenched ^{formation of} the salaries of the players, and reduced the gladiators to a fixt number. The prices ^{manners.} of Corinthian vessels growing extravagant, and the luxury of entertainments to such an excess, that thirty thousand sesterces were paid for three mullets, he complained of these disorders to the senate, and got a law passed, setting bounds to the expences in furniture, and ordaining, that the prices of provisions in the markets should be annually regulated by the senate. As to the eating-houses and taverns, which at this time were very numerous in Rome, they were all, by Tiberius's orders, utterly suppressed; and that he might, by his own example, countenance frugality and parsimony ^{His frugality.}
in others, he had, at his public and most solemn entertainments, meat served up, which had been dressed and cut up the day before, contrary to the custom which then obtained, saying, that every part had the same taste as the whole. To check the progress of vice, he drove out of Rome a great number of young noblemen, and also some women of distinction, who were noted for their debaucheries; and at the same time revived an ancient law, empowering all parents to punish their daughters, even after they were married, if, by their debauched lives, they brought disgrace upon their families. In this particular he was so strict, that by proclamation he prohibited the kisses that were, according to custom, given by way of salutation. He seemed intirely averse from loading his people with any new taxes ; and when some governors of provinces advised him to raise their taxes, he answered, that it was the duty of a good shepherd to shear, not to slay, his flock, and was so far from hearkening to the remonstrances of his presidents and governors, that, instead of raising, he lessened the tributes that were annually remitted to Rome from the provinces^h. Such was the deportment of Tiberius, while his authority was yet wavering ; but we shall soon see him pull off the mask, and abandon himself without controul to those vices, which he now so artfully disguises with the opposite virtues. But to return to the brave Germanicus :

Germanicus
invades and ravages the
Catti.

THE following year, Drusus Cæsar and Caius Norbanus being consuls, Germanicus made vast preparations, with a design to pursue the war against the Germans, and revenge the death of Varus and the slaughter of his legions. He had indeed no thoughts of attempting any thing till the summer ; but being informed, that violent diffentions reigned among the enemy, he resolved early in the spring to make an irruption into the country of the Catti (T). These intestine broils, of which Germanicus resolved to take advantage, were occasioned by the opposite parties of Arminius and Segestes, the former the incendiary of Germany, and chief author of the insurrection in which Varus perished with his legions ; the latter a sincere and faithful friend to the Romans ; nay, he had even given Varus notice of the intended revolt, and advised him to secure himself, Arminius and the other chiefs assuring him, that, without their leaders, the multitude would not dare to attempt any thing. But the Roman general despised his advice, which cost him dear, as we have related above. Segestes, tho' forced to join his countrymen in that general revolt, yet remained at constant variance with Arminius ; and at this time their animosities were heightened by a domestic quarrel, Arminius having carried away by force the daughter of Segestes, named Thusneldes, and married her, though already betrothed to another. This attempt gave rise to an open rupture between the two chiefs, of which Germanicus no sooner had intelligence, than he put four legions, five thousand auxiliaries, and some German troops drawn suddenly together, under the command of Cæcina, ordering him to scour the country, while he himself, at the head of as many legions and double the number of allies, advanced with incredible expedition into the country of the Catti ; and falling upon the enemy before they were apprised of his march, put vast numbers of them to the sword, without distinction of sex or age. Most of their youth escaped by swimming over the Adrana (U), and attempted to prevent the Romans from lay-

^h SUEP. in Tiber. c. 26—36. TACIT. ibid.

(T) The Catti or Chatti possessed, as we have hinted above, part of the duchy of Brunswick, of the bishopric of Hildesheim, of Thuringen, Hesse, and the territories of Fulda, with the counties of Schauen-wemberg, Waldeck, and Mansfeld, Tacitus speaks of them thus : “ The territories of the Catti begin at “ the Hercynian forest, and consist not of such wide “ and marshy plains as those of the other commu“ nities contained within the vast compass of Ger“ many ; but of hills, which, for a long tract, run “ high and contiguous, then by degrees sink. More“ over, the Hercynian forest attends for a while its “ native Catti, and then forsakes them. They are “ distinguished with more hard and robust bodies, “ compact limbs, stern countenances, and a more “ sprightly vigor of mind. For Germans, they “ are men of much sense and address. They com“ mit the government to chosen men, and listen to “ them when set over them. They know how “ to maintain their ranks, to discern occasions, to “ restrain their own ardour, how to employ the “ day, how to intrench themselves by night. They “ reckon fortune among uncertain things, and va“ lour among such as are secure ; and, what is very “ rare, and never learnt but by men inured to di“ scipline, they repose more confidence in the con“ duct of the general, than in the strength of the “ army. Their whole strength consists in foot, “ who, besides their arms, carry iron tools and their “ provisions. Other Germans take the field equip“ ped for a battle ; but the Catti equipped for a “ war. They seldom make excursions, or expose “ themselves to the dangers of casual encounters. It “ is peculiar to cavalry suddenly to conquer, or sud“ denly to fly. Such haste and expedition borders “ upon fear : wariness and deliberation are more a“ kin to intrepidity.” Tacitus adds, that a custom, “ practised only by some particular persons of other “ German nations, universally obtained among the “ Catti ; which is, to let their hair and beards grow “ till they have slain an enemy, being persuaded,

“ that only by the death of a foe they can acquit “ themselves of the debt and duty contracted by their “ birth, and render themselves worthy of their coun“ try and parents ; so that the cowardly and unwar“ like among them were easily distinguished by their “ long hair and beards. The most brave likewise
“ wear an iron ring, which is a mark of great disho-“ nour in that nation, as a chain or badge of slavery, “ till they set themselves, as it were, at liberty, by “ killing an enemy (25). However, as Germanicus
“ came upon them unawares, they were forced either “ to submit, or shelter themselves in the woods, that “ is, in the Hercynian forest, which, as Tacitus has

ing a bridge over that river; but their efforts proving unsuccessful, some of them submitted to Germanicus; but the greater part, abandoning their villages, took refuge in the woods; so that the Romans, without opposition, laid waste all the open country, set fire to their dwellings, laid Mattium (W) their capital in ashes, and then began their march back to the Rhine. The Cherusci alone made some motions, as if they designed to assist the Catti and fall upon the Romans in their retreat, but were restrained by Cæcina, who, with his army of observation, moved about from place to place, and had even defeated the Marfi (X), who had dared to engage him¹.

Germanicus had scarce reached his camp, when deputies arrived from Segestes, praying relief for that faithful friend to the Romans against his and their declared enemy Arminius, who had besieged him in his camp. At the head of this embassy was Segimundus, the son of Segestes, whom, though he had formerly revolted from the Romans, Germanicus received with great kindness; but sent him, as he could no longer depend upon his fidelity, under a strong guard to the frontiers of Gaul (Y). As to his request, he readily complied with it, led back his army without loss of time to the relief of Segestes, engaged the besiegers, put them to flight, and rescued that faithful friend of the Romans out of the hands of his most inveterate enemy. On this occasion the Romans took a great many prisoners, among whom was Thusneldis, the wife of Arminius and daughter of Segestes, who had been the chief occasion of the present rupture between the two illustrious families (Z). She was then big with child, and seemed to be concerned only for the fate of her unhappy babe destined to be born in slavery. As for her own captivity, she bore it with the intrepidity of a true heroine, without shedding a tear, or uttering a word in the style of a suppliant. Among the booty were found

(W) Tacitus in this place styles Mattium the capital of the Catti; but elsewhere (26) distinguishes the Mattiaci from the Catti: The army, says he, was composed of Catti, Usipii, and Mattiaci. Their country, according to the accounts of the ancient geographers, was inclosed on all sides by the territories of the Catti; whence they are often confounded with them. Cluverius and Cellarius think, that the situation of Mattium, or, as Ptolemy calls it, Mattiacum, agrees with that of the present city of Marburg; for it stands on the road leading from mount Taunus, now known to the natives by the names of Der Heyrick and Die Hobe, over-against Mentz, to the Adrana or the Eder, which was the rout Germanicus took in this irruption, as Tacitus informs us. Pliny mentions the hot baths of Mattium (27), which all modern geographers take for the hot waters of Wiesbaden over-against Mentz or Moguntiacum, as it was called by the ancients; so that the territories of the Mattiaci extended at least from the Rhine to the Eder. Whether they reached beyond that river, and how far, we know not. Tacitus tells us, that the Mattiaci in his time were friends to the Romans. The Roman people, says he, have carried the awe and esteem of their empire beyond the Rhine and the ancient boundaries. Thus the Mattiaci, living on the opposite bank, enjoy a settlement of their own; but by inclination are Romans (28).

(X) Part of Westphalia and of the bishoprick of Paderborn were, according to most of our modern geographers, the ancient habitation of the Marfi.

(Y) Segimundus had been greatly favoured by the Romans, and by them appointed priest of the altar of the Ubii, of which we have spoken above; but when his countrymen revolted, he rent the sacerdotal tiara and fled to the revolters. Hence, when his father declared to him his intention of putting him at the head of the embassy which he was sending to Germanicus, he desired at first to be excused; but afterwards trusting to the clemency of the Roman general he undertook the execution of his father's orders, and was favourably received by Germanicus, but not suffered to return among his countrymen. What became of him afterwards, Tacitus does not tell us; but Strabo names him among the illustrious captives, who marched before the chariot of Germanicus, when he entered Rome in triumph (29). If he did not join the rebels a second time, Germanicus acted contrary to the law of nations in thus seizing the person of an ambassador, and treating him as if he had been taken in war.

(Z) Tacitus tells us, that the Germans carried about with them in all their wars their wives and children, whom they placed near the field of battle, that, by the tears of their wives and the cries of their tender infants, they might be the more encouraged to exert themselves in the defence of those interesting pledges of nature. Their armies, when yielding and ready to fly, have been often prevailed upon to maintain their ground and stand the shock of the enemy, by the importunity and intreaties of their women, presenting their breasts, and putting them in mind of their impending captivity; an evil which they far more dreaded in their women than in themselves. When any of them happened to be so wounded in battle, that they could not continue the fight, they retired to their mothers or wives, who, without being shocked, sucked their bleeding wounds. The wife among them brought no dowry to the husband, but the husband to the wife, viz. a couple of oxen yoked together, a horse accoutred, a shield, a javelin, and a sword. The woman on her part too made her husband a present of some arms. By the mutual approbation and acceptance of these gifts, in the presence of their parents and relations, they were married. The oxen joined in the same yoke, the horse ready equipped, and the present of arms, served to put the woman in mind, that she came to her husband as a partner of his hazards and dangers in war as well as in peace, and that she was not exempt from fighting and exerting her courage in battle for the defence of her husband or country (30).
